Message of the President.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

MESSAGE

OF THE

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

In obedience to the command of the Constitution, it has now become my duty "to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures" as I judge to be "necessary and expedient."

But first, and above all, our thanks are due to Almighty God for the numerous benefits which He has bestowed upon this people; and our united prayers ought to ascend to Him that He would continue to bless our great Republic in time to come as He has blessed it in time past. Since the adjournment of the last Congress our constituents have enjoyed an unusual degree of health. The earth has yielded her fruits abundantly, and has bountifully rewarded the toil of the husbandman. Our great staples have commanded high prices, and, up till within a brief period, our manufacturing, mineral, and mechanical occupations have largely partaken of the general prosperity. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country, in its monetary interests, is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want. The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced, whilst the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount.

Under these circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session; but this, although deeply to be regretted, would prove to be only a slight misfortune when compared with the suffering and distress prevailing among the people. With this the Government cannot fail deeply to sympathize, though it may be without the power to extend relief.

It is our duty to inquire what has produced such unfortunate results, and whether their recurrence can be prevented? In all former revulsions the blame might have been fairly attributed to a variety of cooperating causes; but not so upon the present occasion. It is apparent that our existing misfortunes have proceeded solely from our extravagant and vicious system of paper currency and bank credits, exciting the people to wild speculations and gambling in stocks. These revulsions must continue to recur at successive intervals so long as the amount of the paper currency and bank loans and discounts of the country shall be left to the discretion of fourteen hundred irresponsible banking institutions, which, from the very law of their nature, will consult the interest of the stockholders rather than the public welfare.

The framers of the Constitution, when they gave to Congress the power "to coin money and to regulate the value thereof," and prohibited the States from coining money, emitting bills of credit, or making anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, supposed they had protected the people against the evils of an excessive and irredeemable paper currency. They are not responsible for the existing anomaly, that a Government endowed with the sovereign attribute of coining money and regulating the value thereof, should have no power to prevent others from driving this coin out of the country and filling up the channels of circulation with paper which does not represent gold and silver.

It is one of the highest and most responsible duties of Government to insure to the people a sound circulating medium, the amount of which ought to be adapted with the utmost possible wisdom and skill to the wants of internal trade and foreign exchanges. If this be either greatly above or greatly below the proper standard, the marketable value of every man's property is increased or diminished in the same proportion, and injustice to individuals, as well as incalculable evils to the community, are the consequence.

Unfortunately, under the construction of the Federal Constitution, which has now prevailed too long to be changed, this important and delicate duty has been dis severed from the coining power, and virtually transferred to more than fourteen hundred State banks, acting independently of each other, and regulating their paper issues almost exclusively by a regard to the present interest of their stockholders. Exercising the sovereign power of providing a paper currency, instead of coin, for the country, the first duty which these banks owe to the public is to keep in their vaults a sufficient amount of gold and silver to insure the convertibility of their notes into coin at all times and under all circumstances. No bank ought ever to be chartered without such restrictions on its business as to secure this result. All other restrictions are comparatively vain. This is the only true touchstone, the only efficient regulator of a paper currency—the only one which can guard the public against over-issues and bank suspensions. As a collateral and eventual security it is doubtless wise, and in all cases ought to be required, that banks shall hold an amount of United States or State securities equal to their notes in circulation, and pledged for their redemption. This, however, furnishes no adequate security against over-issues. On the contrary, it may be perverted to inflate the currency. Indeed, it is possible by this means to convert all the debts of the United States and State governments into bank notes, without reference to the specie required to redeem them. However valuable these securities may be in themselves, they cannot be converted into gold and silver at the moment of pressure, as our experience teaches, in sufficient time to prevent bank suspensions and the depreciation of bank notes. In England, which is to a considerable extent a paper-money country, though vastly behind our own in this respect, it was deemed advisable, anterior to the act of Parliament of 1844, which wisely separated the issue of notes from the banking department, for the Bank of England always to keep on hand gold and silver equal to one third of its combined circulation and deposits. If this proportion was no more than sufficient to secure the convertibility of its notes, with the whole of Great Britain, and to some extent the continent of Europe, as a field of its circulation, rendering it almost impossible that a sudden and immediate run to a dangerous amount should be made upon it, the same proportion would certainly be insufficient under our banking system. Each of our fourteen hundred banks has but a limited circumference for its circulation, and in the course of a very few days the depositors and note-holders might demand from such a bank a sufficient amount in specie to compel it to suspend, even although it had coin in its vaults equal to one third of its immediate liabilities. And yet I am not aware, with the exception of the banks of Louisiana, that any State bank throughout the Union has been required by its charter to keep this or any other proportion of gold and silver compared with the amount of its combined circulation and deposits. What has been the consequence? In a recent report made by the Treasury Department on the condition of the banks throughout the different States, according to returns dated nearest to January, 1857, the aggregate amount of actual specie in their vaults is $58,349,838; of their circulation, $214,778,822; and of their deposits, $230,351,352. Thus it appears that these banks, in the aggregate, have considerably less than one dollar in seven of gold and silver, compared with their circulation and deposits. It was palpable, therefore, that the very first pressure must drive them to suspension, and deprive the people of a convertible currency, with all its disastrous consequences. It is truly wonderful that they should have so long continued to preserve their credit, when a demand for the payment of one seventh of their immediate liabilities would have driven them into insolvency. And this is the condition of the banks, notwithstanding that four hundred millions of gold from California have flowed in upon us within the last eight years, and the tide still continues to flow. Indeed, such has been the extravagance of bank credits that the banks now hold a considerable less amount of specie, either in proportion to their capital or to their circulation and deposits combined, than they did before the discovery of gold in California. Whilst in the year 1848 their specie in proportion to their capital was more than equal to one dollar for four and a half, in 1857 it does not amount to one dollar for every six dollars and thirty-three cents of their capital. In the year 1848 the specie was equal, within a very small fraction, to one dollar in five of their circulation and deposits; in 1857 it is not equal to one dollar in seven and a half of their circulation and deposits.

From this statement it is easy to account for our financial history for the last forty years. It has been a history of extravagant expansions in the business of the country, followed by ruinous contractions. At successive intervals the best and most enterprising men have been tempted to their ruin by excessive bank loans of mere paper credit, exciting them to extravagant importations of foreign goods, wild speculations, and ruinous and demoralizing stock gambling. When the crisis arrives, as arrive it must, the banks can extend no relief to the people. In a vain struggle to redeem their liabilities in specie, they are compelled to contract their loans and their issues; and at last, in the hour of distress, when their assistance is most needed, they and their debtors together sink into insolvency.

It is this paper system of extravagant expansion, raising the nominal price of every article far beyond its real value, when compared with the cost of similar articles in countries whose circulation is wisely regulated, which has prevented us from competing in our own markets with foreign manufacturers, has produced extravagant importations, and has counteracted the effect of the large incidental protection afforded to our domestic manufactures by the present revenue tariff. But for this the branches of our manufactures composed of raw materials, the production of our own country—such as cotton, iron, and woolen fabrics—would not only have acquired almost exclusive possession of the home market, but would have created for themselves a foreign market throughout the world.

Deplorable, however, as may be our present financial condition, we may yet indulge in bright hopes for the future. No other nation has ever existed which could have endured such violent expansions and contractions of paper credits without lasting injury; yet the buoyancy of youth, the energies of our population, and the spirit which never quails before difficulties, will enable us soon to recover from our present financial embarrassments, and may even occasion us speedily to forget the lesson which they have taught.

In the mean time, it is the duty of the Government, by all proper means within its power, to aid in alleviating the sufferings of the people occasioned by the suspensions of the banks, and to provide against a recurrence of the same calamity. Unfortunately, in either aspect of the case, it can do but little. Thanks to the Independent Treasury, the Government has not suspended payment, as it was compelled to do by the failure of the banks in 1837. It will continue to discharge its liabilities to the people in gold and silver. Its disbursements in coin will pass into circulation, and materially assist in restoring a sound currency. From its high credit, should we be compelled to make a temporary loan, it can be effected on advantageous terms. This, however, shall, if possible, be avoided; but if not, then the amount shall be limited to the lowest practicable sum.

I have therefore determined that whilst no useful Government works already in progress shall be suspended, new works, not already commenced, will be postponed, if this can be done without injury to the country. Those necessary for its defense shall proceed as though there had been no crisis in our monetary affairs.

But the Federal Government cannot do much to provide against a recurrence of existing evils. Even if insurmountable constitutional objections did not exist against the creation of a national bank, this would furnish no adequate preventive security. The history of the last Bank of the United States abundantly proves the truth of this assertion. Such a bank could not, if it would, regulate the issues and credits of fourteen hundred State banks in such a manner as to prevent the ruinous expansions and contractions in our currency which afflicted the country throughout the existence of the late bank, or secure us against future suspensions. In 1825 an effort was made by the Bank of England to curtail the issues of the country banks under the most favorable circumstances. The paper currency had been expanded to a ruinous extent, and the bank put forth all its power to contract it, in order to reduce prices, and restore the equilibrium of the foreign exchanges. It accordingly commenced a system of curtailment of its loans and issues, in the vain hope that the joint-stock and private banks of the kingdom would be compelled to follow its example. It found, however, that as it contracted they expanded, and at the end of the process, to employ the language of a very high official authority, "whatever reduction of the paper circulation was effected by the Bank of England [in 1825] was more than made up by the issues of the country banks."

But a bank of the United States would not, if it could, restrain the issues and loans of the State banks, because its duty as a regulator of the currency must often be in direct conflict with the immediate interest of its stockholders. If we expect one agent to restrain or control another, their interests must, at least in some degree, be antagonistic. But the directors of a bank of the United States would feel the same interest and the same inclination with the directors of the State banks to expand the currency, to accommodate their favorites and friends with loans, and to declare large dividends. Such has been our experience in regard to the last bank.

After all, we must mainly rely upon the patriotism and wisdom of the States for the prevention and redress of the evil. If they will afford us a real specie basis for our paper circulation by increasing the denomination of bank notes, first to twenty, and afterwards to fifty dollars; if they will require that the banks shall at all times keep on hand at least one dollar of gold and silver for every three dollars of their circulation and deposits; and if they will provide, by a self-executing enactment which nothing can arrest, that the moment they suspend they shall go into liquidation, I believe that such provisions, with a weekly publication by each bank of a statement of its condition, would go far to secure us against future suspensions of specie payments.

Congress, in my opinion, possess the power to pass a uniform bankrupt law applicable to all banking institutions throughout the United States, and I strongly recommend its exercise. This would make it the irreversible organic law of each bank's existence, that a suspension of specie payments shall produce its civil death. The instinct of self-preservation would then compel it to perform its duties in such a manner as to escape the penalty and preserve its life.

The existence of banks and the circulation of bank paper are so identified with the habits of our people, that they cannot at this day be suddenly abolished without much immediate injury to the country. If we could confine them to their appropriate sphere, and prevent them from administering to the spirit of wild and reckless speculation by extravagant loans and issues, they might be continued with advantage to the public.

But this I say, after long and much reflection: if experience shall prove it to be impossible to enjoy the facilities which well-regulated banks might afford, without at the same time suffering the calamities which the excesses of the banks have hitherto inflicted upon the country, it would then be far the lesser evil to deprive them altogether of the power to issue a paper currency and confine them to the functions of banks of deposit and discount.

Our relations with foreign Governments are, upon the whole, in a satisfactory condition.

The diplomatic difficulties which existed between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain at the adjournment of the last Congress have been happily terminated by the appointment of a British Minister to this country, who has been cordially received.

Whilst it is greatly to the interest, as I am convinced it is the sincere desire, of the Governments and people of the two countries to be on terms of intimate friendship with each other, it has been our misfortune almost always to have some irritating, if not dangerous, outstanding question with Great Britain.

Since the origin of the Government we have been employed in negotiating treaties with that Power, and afterwards in discussing their true intent and meaning. In this respect, the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, has been the most unfortunate of all; because the two Governments place directly opposite and contradictory constructions upon its first and most important article. Whilst, in the United States, we believed that this treaty would place both Powers upon an exact equality by the stipulation that neither will ever "occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion" over, any part of Central America, it is contended by the British Government that the true construction of this language has left them in the rightful possession of all that portion of Central America which was in their occupancy at the date of the treaty; in fact, that the treaty is a virtual recognition on the part of the United States of the right of Great Britain, either as owner or protector, to the whole extensive coast of Central America, sweeping round from the Rio Hondo to the port and harbor of San Juan de Nicaragua, together with the adjacent Bay Islands, except the comparatively small portion of this between the Sarstoon and Cape Honduras. According to their construction, the treaty does no more than simply prohibit them from extending their possessions in Central America beyond the present limits. It is not too much to assert, that if in the United States the treaty had been considered susceptible of such a construction, it never would have been negotiated under the authority of the President, nor would it have received the approbation of the Senate. The universal conviction in the United States was, that when our Government consented to violate its traditional and time-honored policy, and to stipulate with a foreign Government never to occupy or acquire territory in the Central American portion of our own continent, the consideration for this sacrifice was that Great Britain should, in this respect at least, be placed in the same position with ourselves. Whilst we have no right to doubt the sincerity of the British Government in their construction of the treaty, it is at the same time my deliberate conviction that this construction is in opposition both to its letter and its spirit.

Under the late Administration negotiations were instituted between the two Governments for the purpose, if possible, of removing these difficulties; and a treaty having this laudable object in view was signed at London on the 17th of October, 1856, and was submitted by the President to the Senate on the following 10th of December. Whether this treaty, either in its original or amended form, would have accomplished the object intended without giving birth to new and embarrassing complications between the two Governments, may perhaps be well questioned. Certain it is, however, it was rendered much less objectionable by the different amendments made to it by the Senate. The treaty, as amended, was ratified by me on the 12th March, 1857, and was transmitted to London for ratification by the British Government. That Government expressed its willingness to concur in all the amendments made by the Senate, with the single exception of the clause relating to Roatan and the other islands in the Bay of Honduras. The article in the original treaty, as submitted to the Senate, after reciting that these islands and their inhabitants "having been by a convention bearing date the 27th day of August, 1856, between her Britannic Majesty and the Republic of Honduras, constituted and declared a free territory, under the sovereignty of the said Republic of Honduras," stipulated that "the two contracting parties do hereby mutually engage to recognize and respect, in all future time, the independence and rights of the said free territory as a part of the Republic of Honduras."

Upon an examination of this convention between Great Britain and Honduras of the 27th August, 1856, it was found that, whilst declaring the Bay Islands to be "a free territory under the sovereignty of the Republic of Honduras," it deprived that Republic of rights without which its sovereignty over them could scarcely be said to exist. It divided them from the remainder of Honduras, and gave to their inhabitants a separate government of their own, with legislative, executive, and judicial officers, elected by themselves. It deprived the Government of Honduras of the taxing power in every form, and exempted the people of the islands from the performance of military duty except for their own exclusive defense. It also prohibited that Republic from erecting fortifications upon them for their protection—thus leaving them open to invasion from any quarter; and, finally, it provided "that slavery shall not at any time hereafter be permitted to exist therein."

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Message of the President.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Had Honduras ratified this convention, she would have ratified the establishment of a State substantially independent within her own limits, and a State at all times subject to British influence and control. Moreover, had the United States ratified the treaty with Great Britain in its original form, we should have been bound "to recognize and respect in all future time" these stipulations to the prejudice of Honduras. Being in direct opposition to the spirit and meaning of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty as understood in the United States, the Senate rejected the entire clause, and substituted in its stead a simple recognition of the sovereign right of Honduras to these islands in the following language:

"The two contracting parties do hereby mutually engage to recognize and respect the Islands of Roatan, Bonaco, Utila, Barbareta, Helena, and Morat, situate in the Bay of Honduras, and off the coast of the Republic of Honduras, as under the sovereignty and as part of the said Republic of Honduras."

Great Britain rejected this amendment, assigning as the only reason, that the ratifications of the convention of the 27th August, 1856, between her and Honduras, had not been "exchanged, owing to the hesitation of that Government." Had this been done, it is stated that "her Majesty's Government would have had little difficulty in agreeing to the modification proposed by the Senate, which then would have had in effect the same signification as the original wording." Whether this would have been the effect; whether the mere circumstance of the exchange of the ratifications of the British convention with Honduras prior in point of time to the ratification of our treaty with Great Britain would, "in effect," have had "the same signification as the original wording," and thus have nullified the amendment of the Senate, may well be doubted. It is, perhaps, fortunate that the question has never arisen.

The British Government, immediately after rejecting the treaty as amended, proposed to enter into a new treaty with the United States, similar in all respects to the treaty which they had just refused to ratify, if the United States would consent to add to the Senate's clear and unqualified recognition of the sovereignty of Honduras over the Bay Islands, the following additional stipulation:

"Whenever and so soon as the Republic of Honduras shall have concluded and ratified a treaty with Great Britain, by which Great Britain shall have ceded, and the Republic of Honduras shall have accepted, the said islands, subject to the provisions and conditions contained in such treaty."

This proposition was, of course, rejected. After the Senate had refused to recognize the British convention with Honduras of the 27th August, 1856, with full knowledge of its contents, it was impossible for me, necessarily ignorant of "the provisions and conditions" which might be contained in a future convention between the same parties, to sanction them in advance.

The fact is, that when two nations like Great Britain and the United States, mutually desirous as they are, and I trust ever may be, of maintaining the most friendly relations with each other, have unfortunately concluded a treaty which they understand in senses directly opposite, the wisest course is to abrogate such a treaty by mutual consent, and to commence anew. Had this been done promptly, all difficulties in Central America would most probably be thus have been adjusted to the satisfaction of both parties. The time spent in discussing the meaning of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty would have been devoted to this praiseworthy purpose, and the task would have been the more easily accomplished because the interest of the two countries in Central America is identical, being confined to securing safe transits over all the routes across the isthmus.

Whilst entertaining these sentiments, I shall nevertheless not refuse to contribute to any reasonable adjustment of the Central American questions which is not practically inconsistent with the American interpretation of the treaty. Overtures for this purpose have been recently made by the British Government in a friendly spirit, which I cordially reciprocate; but whether this renewed effort will result in success I am not yet prepared to express an opinion. A brief period will determine.

With France our ancient relations of friendship

still continue to exist. The French Government have in several recent instances, which need not be enumerated, evinced a spirit of good will and kindness towards our country which I heartily reciprocate. It is, notwithstanding, much to be regretted that two nations whose productions are of such a character as to invite the most extensive exchanges, and freest commercial intercourse, should continue to enforce ancient and obsolete restrictions of trade against each other. Our commercial treaty with France is, in this respect, an exception from our treaties with all other commercial nations. It jealously levies discriminating duties both on tonnage and on articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the one country, when arriving in vessels belonging to the other.

More than forty years ago, on the 3d of March, 1815, Congress passed an act offering to all nations to admit their vessels laden with their national productions into the ports of the United States upon the same terms with our own vessels, provided they would reciprocate to us similar advantages. This act confined the reciprocity to the productions of the respective foreign nations who might enter into the proposed arrangement with the United States. The act of May 24, 1828, removed this restriction, and offered a similar reciprocity to all such vessels without reference to the origin of their cargoes. Upon these principles, our commercial treaties and arrangements have been founded, except with France; and let us hope that this exception may not long exist.

Our relations with Russia remain, as they have ever been, on the most friendly footing. The present Emperor, as well as his predecessors, have never failed, when the occasion offered, to manifest their good will to our country; and their friendship has always been highly appreciated by the Government and people of the United States.

With all other European Governments, except that of Spain, our relations are as peaceful as we could desire. I regret to say that no progress whatever has been made since the adjournment of Congress towards the settlement of any of the numerous claims of our citizens against the Spanish Government. Besides, the outrage committed on our flag by the Spanish war frigate Ferolana on the high seas, off the coast of Cuba, in March, 1855, by firing into the American mail steamer El Dorado, and detaining and searching her, remains unacknowledged and unredressed. The general tone and temper of the Spanish Government towards that of the United States are much to be regretted. Our present Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Madrid has asked to be recalled; and it is my purpose to send out a new Minister to Spain, with special instructions on all questions pending between the two Governments, and with a determination to have them speedily and amicably adjusted, if this be possible. In the mean time, whenever our Minister urges the just claims of our citizens on the notice of the Spanish Government, he is met with the objection that Congress have never made the appropriation recommended by President Polk in his annual message of December, 1847, "to be paid to the Spanish Government for the purpose of distribution among the claimants in the Amistad case." A similar recommendation was made by my immediate predecessor in his message of December, 1853; and entirely concurring with both in the opinion that this indemnity is justly due under the treaty with Spain of the 27th October, 1795, I earnestly recommend such an appropriation to the favorable consideration of Congress.

A treaty of friendship and commerce was concluded at Constantinople on the 13th of December, 1856, between the United States and Persia, the ratifications of which were exchanged at Constantinople on the 13th of June, 1857, and the treaty was proclaimed by the President on the 18th August, 1857. This treaty, it is believed, will prove beneficial to American commerce. The Shah has manifested an earnest disposition to cultivate friendly relations with our country, and has expressed a strong wish that we should be represented at Teheran by a minister plenipotentiary; and I recommend that an appropriation be made for this purpose.

Recent occurrences in China have been unfavorable to a revision of the treaty with that Empire of the 3d July, 1844, with a view to the security and extension of our commerce. The twenty-fourth article of this treaty stipulated for a revision of it, in case experience should prove this to be requisite; "in which case the two Governments will, at the expiration of twelve years from the date of said convention, treat amicably concerning the same, by means of suitable persons appointed to conduct such negotiations." These twelve years expired on the 3d July, 1856; but long before that period it was ascertained that important changes in the treaty were necessary; and several fruitless attempts were made by the Commissioner of the United States to effect these changes. Another effort was about to be made for the same purpose by our Commissioner, in conjunction with the Ministers of England and France, but this was suspended by the occurrence of hostilities in the Canton river between Great Britain and the Chinese Empire. These hostilities have necessarily interrupted the trade of all nations with Canton, which is now in a state of blockade, and have occasioned a serious loss of life and property. Meanwhile the insurrection within the Empire against the existing imperial dynasty still continues, and it is difficult to anticipate what will be the result.

Under these circumstances, I have deemed it advisable to appoint a distinguished citizen of Pennsylvania Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to proceed to China, and to avail himself of any opportunities which may offer to effect changes in the existing treaty favorable to American commerce. He left the United States for the place of his destination in July last in the war steamer Minnesota. Special Ministers to China have also been appointed by the Governments of Great Britain and France.

Whilst our Minister has been instructed to occupy a neutral position in reference to the existing hostilities at Canton, he will cordially coöperate with the British and French Ministers in all peaceful measures to secure, by treaty stipulations, those just concessions to commerce which the nations of the world have a right to expect, and which China cannot long be permitted to withhold. From assurances received, I entertain no doubt that the three Ministers will act in harmonious concert to obtain similar commercial treaties for each of the Powers they represent.

We cannot fail to feel a deep interest in all that concerns the welfare of the independent Republics on our own continent, as well as of the Empire of Brazil.

Our difficulties with New Granada, which a short time since bore so threatening an aspect, are, it is to be hoped, in a fair train of settlement in a manner just and honorable to both parties.

The isthmus of Central America, including that of Panama, is the great highway between the Atlantic and Pacific, over which a large portion of the commerce of the world is destined to pass. The United States are more deeply interested than any other nation in preserving the freedom and security of all the communications across this isthmus. It is our duty, therefore, to take care that they shall not be interrupted either by invasions from our own country or by wars between the independent States of Central America. Under our treaty with New Granada of the 12th December, 1846, we are bound to guaranty the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama, through which the Panama railroad passes, "as well as the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over the said territory." This obligation is founded upon equivalents granted by the treaty to the Government and people of the United States.

Under these circumstances, I recommend to Congress the passage of an act authorizing the President, in case of necessity, to employ the land and naval forces of the United States to carry into effect this guarantee of neutrality and protection. I also recommend similar legislation for the security of any other route across the isthmus in which we may acquire an interest by treaty.

With the independent Republics on this continent it is both our duty and our interest to cultivate the most friendly relations. We can never feel indifferent to their fate, and must always rejoice in their prosperity. Unfortunately, both for them and for us, our example and advice have lost much of their influence in consequence of the lawless expeditions which have been fitted out against some of them within the limits of our country. Nothing is better calculated to retard our steady material progress, or impair our character as a nation, than the toleration of such enterprises in violation of the law of nations.

It is one of the first and highest duties of any independent State, in its relations with the members of the great family of nations, to restrain its people from acts of hostile aggression against their citizens or subjects. The most eminent writers on public law do not hesitate to denounce such hostile acts as robbery and murder.

Weak and feeble States, like those of Central America, may not feel themselves able to assert and vindicate their rights. The case would be far different if expeditions were set on foot within our own territories to make private war against a powerful nation. If such expeditions were fitted out from abroad against any portion of our own country, to burn down our cities, murder and plunder our people, and usurp our Government, we should call any Power on earth to the strictest account for not preventing such enormities.

Ever since the administration of General Washington, acts of Congress have been in force to punish severely the crime of setting on foot a military expedition within the limits of the United States, to proceed from thence against a nation or State with whom we are at peace. The present neutrality act of April 20, 1818, is but little more than a collection of preëxisting laws. Under this act the President is empowered to employ the land and naval forces and the militia "for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories and jurisdiction of the United States;" and the collectors of customs are authorized and required to detain any vessel in port when there is reason to believe she is about to take part in such lawless enterprises.

When it was first rendered probable that an attempt would be made to get up another unlawful expedition against Nicaragua, the Secretary of State issued instructions to the marshals and district attorneys, which were directed, by the Secretaries of War and the Navy, to the appropriate Army and Navy officers, requiring them to be vigilant, and to use their best exertions in carrying into effect the provisions of the act of 1818. Notwithstanding these precautions, the expedition has escaped from our shores. Such enterprises can do no possible good to our country, but have already inflicted much injury both on its interests and its character. They have prevented peaceful emigration from the United States to the States of Central America, which could not fail to prove highly beneficial to all the parties concerned. In a pecuniary point of view alone, our citizens have sustained heavy losses from the seizure and closing of the transit route by the San Juan between the two oceans.

The leader of the recent expedition was arrested at New Orleans, but was discharged on giving bail for his appearance in the insufficient sum of two thousand dollars.

I commend the whole subject to the serious attention of Congress, believing that our duty and our interest, as well as our national character, require that we should adopt such measures as will be effectual in restraining our citizens from committing such outrages.

I regret to inform you that the President of Paraguay has refused to ratify the treaty between the United States and that State, as amended by the Senate, the signature of which was mentioned in the message of my predecessor to Congress at the opening of its session in December, 1853. The reasons assigned for this refusal will appear in the correspondence herewith submitted.

It being desirable to ascertain the fitness of the river La Plata and its tributaries for navigation by steam, the United States steamer Water Witch was sent thither for that purpose in 1853. This enterprise was successfully carried on until February, 1855, when, whilst in the peaceful prosecution of her voyage up the Parana river, the steamer was fired upon by a Paraguayan fort. The fire was returned; but, as the Water Witch was of small force, and not designed for offensive operations, she retired from the conflict. The pretext upon which the attack was made, was a decree of the President of Paraguay of October, 1854, prohibiting foreign vessels of war from navigating the rivers of that State. As Paraguay, however, was the owner of but one bank of the river of that name, the other belonging to Corrientes, a State of the Argentine Confederation, the right of its Government to expect that such a decree would be obeyed, cannot be acknowledged. But the Water Witch was not, properly speaking, a vessel of war. She was a small steamer engaged in a scientific enterprise, intended for the advantage of commercial States generally. Under these circumstances, I am constrained to consider the attack upon her as unjustifiable, and as calling for satisfaction from the Paraguayan Government.

Citizens of the United States, also, who were established in business in Paraguay, have had their property seized and taken from them, and have otherwise been treated by the authorities in an insulting and arbitrary manner, which requires redress.

A demand for these purposes will be made in a firm but conciliatory spirit. This will the more probably be granted, if the Executive shall have authority to use other means in the event of a refusal. This is accordingly recommended.

It is unnecessary to state in detail the alarming condition of the Territory of Kansas at the time of my inauguration. The opposing parties then stood in hostile array against each other, and any accident might have relighted the flames of civil war. Besides, at this critical moment, Kansas was left without a Governor by the resignation of Governor Geary.

On the 19th of February previous, the Territorial Legislature had passed a law providing for the election of delegates, on the third Monday of June, to a convention to meet on the first Monday of September, for the purpose of framing a constitution preparatory to admission into the Union. This law was in the main fair and just; and it is to be regretted that all the qualified electors had not registered themselves and voted under its provisions.

At the time of the election for delegates, an extensive organization existed in the Territory, whose avowed object it was, if need be, to put down the lawful government by force, and to establish a government of their own under the so-called Topeka constitution. The persons attached to this revolutionary organization abstained from taking any part in the election.

The act of the Territorial Legislature had omitted to provide for submitting to the people the constitution which might be framed by the convention; and in the excited state of public feeling throughout Kansas, an apprehension extensively prevailed that a design existed to force upon them a constitution in relation to slavery against their will. In this emergency it became my duty, as it was my unquestionable right, having in view the union of all good citizens in support of the territorial laws, to express an opinion on the true construction of the provisions concerning slavery contained in the organic act of Congress of the 30th May, 1854. Congress declared it to be "the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." Under it Kansas, "when admitted as a State," was to "be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission."

Did Congress mean by this language that the delegates elected to frame a constitution should have authority finally to decide the question of slavery, or did they intend, by leaving it to the people, that the people of Kansas themselves should decide this question by a direct vote? On this subject, I confess, I had never entertained a serious doubt; and, therefore, in my instructions to Governor Walker, of the 28th of March last, I merely said, that when "a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

In expressing this opinion it was far from my intention to interfere with the decision of the people of Kansas, either for or against slavery. From this I have always carefully abstained. Intrusted with the duty of taking "care that the laws be faithfully executed," my only desire was that the people of Kansas should furnish to Congress the evidence required by the organic act, whether for or against slavery; and in this manner smooth their passage into the Union. In emerging from the condition of territorial dependence into that of a sovereign State, it was their duty, in my opinion, to make known their will by the votes of the majority, on the direct question whether this important domestic institution should or should not continue to exist. Indeed, this was the only possible mode in which their will could be authentically ascertained.

The election of delegates to a convention must necessarily take place in separate districts. From this cause it may readily happen, as has often been the case, that a majority of the people of a State or Territory are on one side of a question, whilst a majority of the representatives from the several districts into which it is divided may be upon the other side. This arises from the fact that in some districts delegates may be elected by small majorities, whilst in others those of different sentiments may receive majorities sufficiently great not only to overcome the votes given for the former, but to leave a large majority of the whole people in direct opposition to a majority of the delegates. Besides, our history proves that influences may be brought to bear on the representative sufficiently powerful to induce him to disregard the will of his constituents. The truth is, that no other authentic and satisfactory mode exists of ascertaining the will of a majority of the people of any State or Territory on an important and exciting question like that of slavery in Kansas, except by leaving it to a direct vote. How wise, then, was it for Congress to pass over all subordinate and intermediate agencies, and proceed directly to the source of all legitimate power under our institutions!

How vain would any other principle prove in practice! This may be illustrated by the case of Kansas. Should she be admitted into the Union, with a constitution either maintaining or abolishing slavery, against the sentiment of the people, this could have no other effect than to continue and to exasperate the existing agitation during the brief period required to make the constitution conform to the irresistible will of the majority.

The friends and supporters of the Nebraska and Kansas act, when struggling on a recent occasion to sustain its wise provisions before the great tribunal of the American people, never differed about its true meaning on this subject. Everywhere throughout the Union they publicly pledged their faith and their honor, that they would cheerfully submit the question of slavery to the decision of the bona fide people of Kansas, without any restriction or qualification whatever. All were cordially united upon the great doctrine of popular sovereignty, which is the vital principle of our free institutions. Had it then been insinuated from any quarter that it would be a sufficient compliance with the requisitions of the organic law for the members of a convention, thereafter to be elected, to withhold the question of slavery from the people, and to substitute their own will for that of a legally-ascertained majority of all their constituents, this would have been instantly rejected. Everywhere they remained true to the resolution adopted on a celebrated occasion recognizing "the rights of the people of all the Territories—including Kansas and Nebraska—acting through the legally and fairly-expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

The convention to frame a constitution for Kansas met on the first Monday of September last. They were called together by virtue of an act of the Territorial Legislature, whose lawful existence had been recognized by Congress in different forms and by different enactments. A large proportion of the citizens of Kansas did not think proper to register their names and to vote at the election for delegates; but an opportunity to do this having been fairly afforded, their refusal to avail themselves of their right could in no manner affect the legality of the convention.

This convention proceeded to frame a constitution for Kansas, and finally adjourned on the 7th day of November. But little difficulty occurred in the convention except on the subject of slavery. The truth is, that the general provisions of our recent State constitutions are so similar—and, I may add, so excellent—that the difference between them is not essential. Under the earlier practice of the Government, no constitution framed by the convention of a Territory, preparatory to its admission into the Union as a State, had been submitted to the people. I trust, however, the example set by the last Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota "should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State," may be followed on future occasions. I took it for granted that the convention of Kansas would act in accordance with this example, founded, as it is, on correct principles; and hence my instructions to Governor Walker, in favor of submitting the constitution to the people, were expressed in general and unqualified terms.

In the Kansas-Nebraska act, however, this requirement, as applicable to the whole constitution, had not been inserted, and the convention were not bound by its terms to submit any other portion of the instrument to an election, except that which relates to the "domestic institution" of slavery. This will be rendered clear by a simple reference to its language. It was "not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." According to the plain construction of the sentence, the words "domestic institutions" have a direct, as they have an appropriate, reference to slavery. "Domestic institutions" are limited to the family. The relation between master and slave and a few others are "domestic institutions," and are entirely distinct from institutions of a political character. Besides, there was no question then before Congress, nor indeed has there since been any serious question before the people of Kansas or the country, except that which relates to the "domestic institution" of slavery.

The convention, after an angry and excited debate, finally determined, by a majority of only two, to submit the question of slavery to the people, though, at the last, forty-three of the fifty delegates present affixed their signatures to the constitution.

A large majority of the convention were in favor of establishing slavery in Kansas. They accordingly inserted an article in the constitution for this purpose, similar in form to those which had been adopted by other territorial conventions. In the schedule, however, providing for the transition from a territorial to a State government, the question has been fairly and explicitly referred to the people, whether they will have a constitution "with or without slavery." It declares that, before the constitution adopted by the convention "shall be sent to Congress for admission into the Union as a State," an election shall be held to decide this question, at which all the white male inhabitants of the Territory above the age of twenty-one are entitled to vote. They are to vote by ballot; and "the ballots cast at said election shall be indorsed 'constitution with slavery,' and 'constitution with no slavery.'" If there be a majority in favor of the "constitution with slavery," then it is to be transmitted to Congress by the president of the convention in its original form. If, on the contrary, there shall be a majority in favor of the "constitution with no slavery," "then the article providing for slavery shall be stricken from the constitution by the president of this convention;" and it is expressly declared that "no slavery shall exist in the State of Kansas, except that the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with;" and in that event it is made his duty to have the constitution thus ratified transmitted to the Congress of the United States for the admission of the State into the Union.

At this election every citizen will have an opportunity of expressing his opinion by his vote "whether Kansas shall be received into the Union with or without slavery," and thus this exciting question may be peacefully settled in the very mode required by the organic law. The election will be held under legitimate authority; and if any portion of the inhabitants shall refuse to vote, a fair opportunity to do so having been presented, this will be their own voluntary act, and they alone will be responsible for the consequences.

Whether Kansas shall be a free or a slave State must eventually, under some authority, be decided by an election; and the question can never be more clearly or distinctly presented to the people than it is at the present moment. Should this opportunity be rejected, she may be involved for years in domestic discord, and possibly in civil war, before she can again make up the issue now so fortunately tendered, and again reach the point she has already attained.

Kansas has for some years occupied too much of the public attention. It is high time this should be directed to far more important objects. When once admitted into the Union, whether with or without slavery, the excitement beyond her own limits will speedily pass away, and she will then for the first time be left, as she ought to have been long since, to manage her own affairs in her own way. If her constitution on the subject of slavery, or on any other subject, be displeasing to a majority of the people, no human power can prevent them from changing it within a brief period. Under these circumstances it may well be questioned whether the peace and quiet of the whole country are not of greater importance than the mere temporary triumph of either of the political parties in Kansas.

Should the constitution without slavery be adopted by the votes of the majority, the rights of property in slaves now in the Territory are reserved. The number of these is very small; but if it were greater the provision would be equally just and reasonable. These slaves were brought into the Territory under the Constitution of the United States, and are now the property of their masters. This point has at length been finally decided by the highest judicial tribunal of the country—and this upon the plain principle that when a confederacy of sovereign States acquire a new territory at their joint expense, both equality and justice demand that the citizens of one and all of them shall have the right to take into it whatsoever is recognized as property by the common constitution. To have summarily confiscated the property in slaves already in the Territory, would have been an act of gross injustice, and contrary to the practice of the older States of the Union which have abolished slavery.

A territorial government was established for Utah by act of Congress, approved the 9th September, 1850, and the Constitution and laws of the United States were thereby extended over it "so far as the same, or any provisions thereof, may be applicable." This act provided for the appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of a Governor, who was to be ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs, a secretary, three judges of the supreme court, a marshal, and a district attorney. Subsequent acts provided for the appointment of the officers necessary to extend our land and our Indian system over the Territory. Brigham Young was appointed the first Governor on the 20th September, 1850, and has held the office ever since. Whilst Governor Young has been both Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs throughout this period, he has been at the same time the head of the church called the Latter-Day Saints, and professes to govern its members and dispose of their property by direct inspiration and authority from the Almighty. His power has been, therefore, absolute over both Church and State.

The people of Utah, almost exclusively, belong to this church; and believing with a fanatical spirit that he is Governor of the Territory by Divine appointment, they obey his commands as if these were direct revelations from Heaven. If, therefore, he chooses that his government shall come into collision with the Government of the United States, the members of the Mormon church will yield implicit obedience to his will. Unfortunately, existing facts leave but little doubt that such is his determination. Without entering upon a minute history of occurrences, it is sufficient to say that all the officers of the United States, judicial and executive, with the single exception of two Indian agents, have found it necessary for their own personal safety to withdraw from the Territory, and there no longer remains any government in Utah but the despotism of Brigham Young. This being the condition of affairs in the Territory, I could not mistake the path of duty. As Chief Executive Magistrate, I was bound to restore the supremacy of the Constitution and laws within its limits. In order to effect this purpose I appointed a new Governor and other Federal officers for Utah, and sent with them a military force for their protection, and to aid as a posse comitatus, in case of need, in the execution of the laws.

With the religious opinions of the Mormons, as long as they remained mere opinions, however deplorable in themselves and revolting to the moral and religious sentiments of all Christendom, I had no right to interfere. Actions alone, when in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, become the legitimate subjects for the jurisdiction of the civil magistrate. My instructions to Governor Cumming have therefore been framed in strict accordance with these principles. At their date a hope was indulged that no necessity might exist for employing the military in restoring and maintaining the authority of the law, but this hope has now vanished. Governor Young has, by proclamation, declared his determination to maintain his power by force, and has already committed acts of hostility against the United States. Unless he should retrace his steps, the Territory of Utah will be in a state of open rebellion. He has committed these acts of hostility, notwithstanding Major Van Vliet, an officer of the army, sent to Utah by the commanding general to purchase provisions for the troops, had given him the strongest assurances of the peaceful intentions of the Government, and that the troops would only be employed as a posse comitatus when called on by the civil authority to aid in the execution of the laws.

There is reason to believe that Governor Young has long contemplated this result. He knows that the continuance of his despotic power depends upon the exclusion of all settlers from the Territory except those who will acknowledge his divine mission and implicitly obey his will; and that an enlightened public opinion there would soon prostrate institutions at war with the laws both of God and man. He has, therefore, for several years, in order to maintain his independence, been industriously employed in collecting and fabricating arms and munitions of war, and in disciplining the Mormons for military service. As superintendent of Indian affairs he has had an opportunity of tampering with the Indian tribes, and exciting their hostile feelings against the United States. This, according to our information, he has accomplished in regard to some of these tribes, while others have remained true to their allegiance, and have communicated his intrigues to our Indian agents. He has laid in a store of provisions for three years, which, in case of necessity, as he informed Major Van Vliet, he will conceal, "and then take to the mountains, and bid defiance to all the powers of the Government."

A great part of all this may be idle boasting; but yet no wise Government will lightly estimate the efforts which may be inspired by such frenzied fanaticism as exists among the Mormons in Utah. This is the first rebellion which has existed in our Territories; and humanity itself requires that we should put it down in such a manner that it shall be the last. To trifle with it would be to encourage it and to render it formidable. We ought to go there with such an imposing force as to convince these deluded people that resistance would be vain, and thus spare the effusion of blood. We can in this manner best convince them that we are their friends, not their enemies. In order to accomplish this object it will be necessary, according to the estimate of the War Department, to raise four additional regiments; and this I earnestly recommend to Congress. At the present moment of depression in the revenues of the country I am sorry to be obliged to recommend such a measure; but I feel confident of the support of Congress, cost what it may, in suppressing the insurrection, and in restoring and maintaining the sovereignty of the Constitution and laws over the Territory of Utah.

I recommend to Congress the establishment of a territorial government over Arizona, incorporating with it such portions of New Mexico as they may deem expedient. I need scarcely adduce arguments in support of this recommendation. We are bound to protect the lives and the property of our citizens inhabiting Arizona, and these are now without any efficient protection. Their present number is already considerable, and is rapidly increasing, notwithstanding the disadvantages under which they labor. Besides, the proposed Territory is believed to be rich in mineral and agricultural resources, especially in silver and copper. The mails of the United States to California are now carried over it throughout its whole extent, and this route is known to be the nearest, and believed to be the best to the Pacific.

Long experience has deeply convinced me that a strict construction of the powers granted to Congress is the only true, as well as the only safe, theory of the Constitution. Whilst this principle shall guide my public conduct, I consider it clear that under the war-making power, Congress may appropriate money for the construction of a military road through the Territories of the United States, when this is absolutely necessary for the defense of any of the States against foreign invasion. The Constitution has conferred upon Congress power "to declare war," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," and "to call forth the militia to repel invasions." These high sovereign powers necessarily involve important and responsible public duties, and among them there is none so sacred and so imperative as that of preserving our soil from the invasion of a foreign enemy. The Constitution has, therefore, left nothing on this point to construction, but expressly requires that "the United States shall protect each of them [the States] against invasion." Now, if a military road over our own Territories be indispensably necessary to enable us to meet and repel the invader, it follows, as a necessary consequence, not only that we possess the power, but it is our imperative duty to construct such a road. It would be an absurdity to invest a Government with the unlimited power to make and conduct war, and at the same time deny to it the only means of reaching and defeating the enemy at the frontier. Without such a road it is quite evident we cannot "protect" California and our Pacific possessions "against invasion." We cannot by any other means transport men and munitions of war from the Atlantic States in sufficient time successfully to defend these remote and distant portions of the Republic.

Experience has proved that the routes across the isthmus of Central America are at best but a very uncertain and unreliable mode of communication. But even if this were not the case, they would at once be closed against us in the event of war with a naval Power so much stronger than our own as to enable it to blockade the ports at either end of these routes. After all, therefore, we can only rely upon a military road through our own Territories; and ever since the origin of the Government Congress has been in the practice of appropriating money from the public Treasury for the construction of such roads.

The difficulties and the expense of constructing a military railroad to connect our Atlantic and Pacific States have been greatly exaggerated. The distance on the Arizona route, near the thirty-second parallel of north latitude, between the western boundary of Texas on the Rio Grande, and the eastern boundary of California on the Colorado, from the best explorations now within our knowledge, does not exceed four hundred and seventy miles, and the face of the country is, in the main, favorable. For obvious reasons, the Government ought not to undertake the work itself, by means of its own agents. This ought to be committed to other agencies, which Congress might assist, either by grants of land or money, or by both, upon such terms and conditions as they may deem most beneficial for the country. Provision might thus be made not only for the safe, rapid, and economical transportation of troops and munitions of war, but also of the public mails. The commercial interests of the whole country, both East and West, would be greatly promoted by such a road; and, above all, it would be a powerful additional bond of union. And although advantages of this kind, whether postal, commercial, or political, cannot confer constitutional power, yet they may furnish auxiliary arguments in favor of expediting a work which, in my judgment, is clearly embraced within the war-making power.

For these reasons I commend to the friendly consideration of Congress the subject of the Pacific railroad, without finally committing myself to any particular route.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury will furnish a detailed statement of the condition of the public finances and of the respective branches of the public service devolved upon that Department of the Government. By this report it appears that the amount of revenue received from all sources into the Treasury during the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1857, was sixty-eight million six hundred and thirty-one thousand five hundred and thirteen dollars and sixty-seven cents, ($68,631,513 67,) which amount, with the balance of nineteen million nine hundred and one thousand three hundred and twenty-five dollars and forty-five cents, ($19,901,325 45,) remaining in the Treasury at the commencement of the year, made an aggregate for the service of the year of eighty-eight million five hundred and thirty-two thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine dollars and twelve cents, ($88,532,839 12.)

The public expenditures for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1857, amounted to seventy million eight hundred and twenty-two thousand seven hundred and twenty-four dollars and eighty-five cents, ($70,822,724 85,) of which five million nine hundred and forty-three thousand eight hundred and ninety-six dollars and ninety-one cents ($5,943,896 91) were applied to the redemption of the public debt, including interest and premium, leaving in the Treasury, at the commencement of the present fiscal year on the 1st of July, 1857, seventeen million seven hundred and ten thousand one hundred and fourteen dollars and twenty-seven cents, ($17,710,114 27.)

The receipts into the Treasury for the first quarter of the present fiscal year, commencing 1st of July, 1857, were twenty million nine hundred and twenty-nine thousand eight hundred and nineteen dollars and eighty-one cents, ($20,929,819 81,) and the estimated receipts of the remaining three quarters to the 30th of June, 1858, are thirty-six million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, ($36,750,000,) making, with the balance before stated, an aggregate of seventy-five million three hundred and eighty-nine thousand nine hundred and thirty-four dollars and eight cents, ($75,389,934 08,) for the service of the present fiscal year.

The actual expenditures during the first quarter of the present fiscal year were twenty-three million seven hundred and fourteen thousand five hundred and twenty-eight dollars and thirty-seven cents, ($23,714,528 37) of which three million eight hundred and ninety-five thousand two hundred and thirty-two dollars and thirty-nine cents ($3,895,232 39) were applied to the redemption of the public debt, including interest and premium. The probable expenditures of the remaining three quarters, to 30th June, 1858, are fifty-one million two hundred and forty-eight thousand five hundred and thirty dollars and four cents, ($51,248,530 04,) including interest on the public debt, making an aggregate of seventy-four million nine hundred and sixty-three thousand and fifty-eight dollars and forty-one cents, ($74,963,058 41,) leaving an estimated balance in the Treasury at the close of the present fiscal year of four hundred and twenty-six thousand eight hundred and seventy-five dollars and sixty-seven cents, ($426,875 67.)

The amount of the public debt at the commencement of the present fiscal year was twenty-nine million sixty thousand three hundred and eighty-six dollars and ninety cents, ($29,060,386 90.)

was three million eight hundred and ninety-five thousand two hundred and thirty-two dollars and thirty-nine cents, ($3,895,232 39,) leaving a balance unredeemed at this time of twenty-five million one hundred and sixty-five thousand one hundred and fifty-four dollars and fifty-one cents, ($25,165,154 51.)

The amount of estimated expenditures for the remaining three quarters of the present fiscal year will, in all probability, be increased from the causes set forth in the report of the Secretary. His suggestion, therefore, that authority should be given to supply any temporary deficiency by the issue of a limited amount of Treasury notes, is approved, and I accordingly recommend the passage of such a law.

As stated in the report of the Secretary, the tariff of March 3, 1857, has been in operation for so short a period of time, and under circumstances so unfavorable to a just development of its results as a revenue measure, that I should regard it as inexpedient, at least for the present, to undertake its revision.

I transmit herewith the reports made to me by the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, of the Interior and of the Postmaster General. They all contain valuable and important information, and suggestions which I commend to the favorable consideration of Congress.

I have already recommended the raising of four additional regiments, and the report of the Secretary of War presents strong reasons proving this increase of the Army, under existing circumstances, to be indispensable.

I would call the special attention of Congress to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy in favor of the construction of ten small war steamers of light draught. For some years the Government has been obliged on many occasions to hire such steamers from individuals to supply its pressing wants. At the present moment we have no armed vessel in the Navy which can penetrate the rivers of China. We have but few which can enter any of the harbors south of Norfolk, although many millions of foreign and domestic commerce annually pass in and out of these harbors. Some of our most valuable interests and most vulnerable points are thus left exposed. This class of vessels of light draught, great speed, and heavy guns, would be formidable in coast defense. The cost of their construction will not be great, and they will require but a comparatively small expenditure to keep them in commission. In time of peace they will prove as effective as much larger vessels, and often more useful. One of them should be at every station where we maintain a squadron, and three or four should be constantly employed on our Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Economy, utility, and efficiency, combine to recommend them as almost indispensable. Ten of these small vessels would be of incalculable advantage to the naval service, and the whole cost of their construction would not exceed $2,300,000, or $230,000 each.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior is worthy of grave consideration. It treats of the numerous, important, and diversified branches of domestic administration intrusted to him by law. Among these the most prominent are the public lands and our relations with the Indians.

Our system for the disposal of the public lands, originating with the fathers of the Republic, has been improved as experience pointed the way, and gradually adapted to the growth and settlement of our western States and Territories. It has worked well in practice. Already thirteen States and seven Territories have been carved out of these lands, and still more than a thousand millions of acres remain unsold. What a boundless prospect this presents to our country of future prosperity and power!

We have heretofore disposed of 363,862,464 acres of the public land.

Whilst the public lands as a source of revenue are of great importance, their importance is far greater as furnishing homes for a hardy and independent race of honest and industrious citizens, who desire to subdue and cultivate the soil. They ought to be administered mainly with a view of promoting this wise and benevolent policy. In appropriating them for any other purpose, we ought to use even greater economy than if they had been converted into money, and the proceeds were already in the public Treasury. To squander away this richest and noblest inheritance, which any people have ever enjoyed, upon objects of doubtful constitutionality or expediency, would be to violate one of the most important trusts ever committed to any people. Whilst I do not deny to Congress the power, when acting bona fide as a proprietor, to give away portions of them for the purpose of increasing the value of the remainder, yet, considering the great temptation to abuse this power, we cannot be too cautious in its exercise.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Actual settlers under existing laws are protected against other purchasers at public sales, in their right of preemption, to the extent of a quarter section, or one hundred and sixty acres of land. The remainder may then be disposed of at public, or entered at private, sale in unlimited quantities.

Speculation has of late years prevailed to a great extent in the public lands. The consequence has been that large portions of them have become the property of individuals and companies, and thus the price is greatly enhanced to those who desire to purchase for actual settlement. In order to limit the area of speculation as much as possible, the extinction of the Indian title and the extension of the public surveys ought only to keep pace with the tide of emigration.

If Congress should hereafter grant alternate sections to States or companies, as they have done heretofore, I recommend that the intermediate sections retained by the Government be subject to preemption by actual settlers.

It ought ever to be our cardinal policy to reserve the public lands as much as may be for actual settlers, and this at moderate prices. We shall thus not only best promote the prosperity of the new States and Territories, and the power of the Union, but shall secure homes for our posterity for many generations.

The extension of our limits has brought within our jurisdiction many additional and populous tribes of Indians, a large proportion of which are wild, untractable, and difficult to control. Predatory and warlike in their disposition and habits, it is impossible altogether to restrain them from committing aggressions on each other, as well as upon our frontier citizens and those emigrating to our distant States and Territories. Hence expensive military expeditions are frequently necessary to overawe and chastise the more lawless and hostile.

The present system of making them valuable presents to influence them to remain at peace has proved ineffectual. It is believed to be the better policy to colonize them in suitable localities, where they can receive the rudiments of education and be gradually induced to adopt habits of industry. So far as the experiment has been tried it has worked well in practice, and it will doubtless prove to be less expensive than the present system.

The whole number of Indians within our territorial limits is believed to be; from the best data in the Interior Department, about three hundred and twenty-five thousand.

The tribes of Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Creeks, settled in the territory set apart for them west of Arkansas, are rapidly advancing in education and in all the arts of civilization and self-government; and we may indulge the agreeable anticipation that at no very distant day they will be incorporated into the Union as one of the sovereign States.

It will be seen, from the report of the Postmaster General, that the Post Office Department still continues to depend on the Treasury, as it has been compelled to do for several years past, for an important portion of the means of sustaining and extending its operations. Their rapid growth and expansion are shown by a decennial statement of the number of post offices, and the length of post roads, commencing with the year 1827. In that year there were 7,000 post offices; in 1837, 11,177; in 1847, 15,146; and in 1857 they number 26,586. In this year 1,725 post offices have been established and 704 discontinued, leaving a net increase of 1,021. The postmasters of 368 offices are appointed by the President.

The length of post roads, in 1827, was 105,336 miles; in 1837, 141,242 miles; in 1847, 153,818 miles; and in the year 1857 there are 242,601 miles of post road, including 22,530 miles of railroad, on which the mails are transported.

The expenditures of the Department for the fiscal year ending on the 30th June, 1857, as adjusted by the Auditor, amounted to $11,507,670. To defray these expenditures there was, to the credit of the Department, on the 1st July, 1856, the sum of $789,599; the gross revenue of the year, including the annual allowances for the transportation of free mail matter, produced $8,053,951; and the remainder was supplied by the appropriation from the Treasury of $2,250,000, granted by the act of Congress approved August 18, 1856, and by the appropriation of $666,883 made by the act of March 3, 1857, leaving $252,763 to be carried to the credit of the Department in the accounts of the current year. I commend to your consideration the report of the Department in relation to the establishment of the overland mail route from the Mississippi river to San Francisco, California. The route was selected with my full concurrence, as the one, in my judgment, best calculated to attain the important objects contemplated by Congress.

The late disastrous monetary revulsion may have one good effect should it cause both the Government and the people to return to the practice of a wise and judicious economy, both in public and private expenditures.

An overflowing Treasury has led to habits of prodigality and extravagance in our legislation. It has induced Congress to make large appropriations to objects for which they never would have provided had it been necessary to raise the amount of revenue required to meet them by increased taxation or by loans. We are now compelled to pause in our career, and to scrutinize our expenditures with the utmost vigilance; and, in performing this duty, I pledge my cooperation to the extent of my constitutional competency.

It ought to be observed, at the same time, that true public economy does not consist in withholding the means necessary to accomplish important national objects intrusted to us by the Constitution, and especially such as may be necessary for the common defense. In the present crisis of the country it is our duty to confine our appropriations to objects of this character, unless in cases where justice to individuals may demand a different course. In all cases care ought to be taken that the money granted by Congress shall be faithfully and economically applied.

Under the Federal Constitution, "every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law," be approved and signed by the President; and, if not approved, "he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it originated." In order to perform this high and responsible duty, sufficient time must be allowed the President to read and examine every bill presented to him for approval. Unless this be afforded, the Constitution becomes a dead letter in this particular; and even worse—it becomes a means of deception. Our constituents, seeing the President's approval and signature attached to each act of Congress, are induced to believe that he has actually performed this duty, when, in truth, nothing is, in many cases, more unfounded.

From the practice of Congress, such an examination of each bill as the Constitution requires has been rendered impossible. The most important business of each session is generally crowded into its last hours, and the alternative presented to the President is either to violate the constitutional duty which he owes to the people, and approve bills which, for want of time, it is impossible he should have examined, or, by his refusal to do this, subject the country and individuals to great loss and inconvenience.

Besides, a practice has grown up of late years to legislate in appropriation bills, at the last hours of the session, on new and important subjects. This practice constrains the President to suffer measures to become laws which he does not approve, or to incur the risk of stopping the wheels of the Government by vetoing an appropriation bill. Formerly, such bills were confined to specific appropriations for carrying into effect existing laws and the well-established policy of the country, and little time was then required by the President for their examination.

For my own part, I have deliberately determined that I shall approve no bill which I have not examined; and it will be a case of extreme and most urgent necessity which shall ever induce me to depart from this rule. I therefore respectfully, but earnestly, recommend that the two Houses would allow the President at least two days previous to the adjournment of each session within which no new bill shall be presented to him for approval. Under the existing joint rule, one day is allowed; but this rule has been hitherto so constantly suspended in practice, that important bills continue to be presented to him up till the very last moments of the session. In a large majority of cases, no great public inconvenience can arise from the want of time to examine their provisions, because the Constitution has declared that if a bill be presented to the President within the last ten days of the session, he is not required to return it, either with an approval or with a veto, "in which case it shall not be a law." It may then lie over, and be taken up and passed at the next session. Great inconvenience would only be experienced in regard to appropriation bills; but fortunately, under the late excellent law allowing a salary, instead of a per diem, to members of Congress, the expense and inconvenience of a called session will be greatly reduced.

I cannot conclude without commending to your favorable consideration the interests of the people of this District. Without a representative on the floor of Congress, they have for this very reason peculiar claims upon our just regard. To this I know, from my long acquaintance with them, they are eminently entitled.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, December 8, 1857.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 8, 1857.

SIR: In compliance with the act of Congress entitled "An act supplementary to an act to establish the Treasury Department," approved May 10, 1800, I have the honor to submit the following report:

On the 1st July, 1856, being the commencement of the fiscal year 1857, the balance in the Treasury was, $19,901,325 45

The receipts into the Treasury during the fiscal year 1857 were $68,631,513 67, as follows:

For the quarter ending September 30, 1856:
From customs	$20,677,740 40
From public lands	892,380 39
From miscellaneous sources,	355,310 57
	21,925,431 36

For the quarter ending December 31, 1856:
From customs	$14,243,414 90
From public lands	808,252 86
From miscellaneous sources,	123,999 59
	15,175,667 35

For the quarter ending March 31, 1857:
From customs	$19,055,328 55
From public lands	1,065,640 11
From miscellaneous sources,	274,054 90
	20,395,023 56

For the quarter ending June 30, 1857:
From customs	$9,899,421 20
From public lands	1,063,213 28
From miscellaneous sources,	172,756 92
	11,135,391 40

The aggregate means, therefore, for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, were..... $68,632,830 12

The expenditures during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, were $70,822,724 85.

Being for the quarter ending September 30, 1856.....	$18,675,113 21
Being for the quarter ending December 31, 1856.....	17,940,877 90
Being for the quarter ending March 31, 1857,	17,245,932 68
Being for the quarter ending June 30, 1857,	16,960,801 06
	$70,822,724 85

which was applied to the several branches of the public service as follows:

Civil, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous.....	$27,531,922 37

Purchase of public debt, principal, premium, and interest.....	5,943,896 91

as shown in detail by statement No. 1.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Deducting the expenditures from the aggregate means during the fiscal year, a balance was left in the Treasury on July 1, 1857, of.....	$17,710,114 27
During the first quarter of the current fiscal year 1858, being from July 1, 1857, to September 30, 1857, the receipts into the Treasury were:
From customs.....	$18,573,729 37
From public lands.....	2,059,449 39
From miscellaneous sources.....	296,641 05
	20,929,819 81
The estimated receipts during the three remaining quarters of the current fiscal year to June 30, 1858, are:
From customs.....	$33,000,000 00
From public lands.....	3,000,000 00
From miscellaneous sources.....	750,000 00
	36,750,000 00
Making an estimated aggregate of means for the service of the current year.....	$75,389,934 08

An exposition of the grounds on which this amount of revenue from customs during these three quarters has been estimated, is given in a subsequent part of this report.

The expenditures of the first quarter, ending September 30, 1857, of the current fiscal year, were $23,714,258 37; being for—

Civil, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous services.....	$7,315,789 00
Service in charge of Interior Department....	3,240,098 99
Service in charge of War Department.....	7,290,950 83
Service in charge of Navy Department.....	3,915,906 99
Purchase of the public debt, principal, premium, and interest.....	1,951,782 56
	$23,714,528 37

(See Statement No. 2.)

The estimated expenditures during the three remaining quarters of the current fiscal year to June 30, 1858, are.....	51,948,530 04
	$74,963,058 41

Leaving an estimated balance in the Treasury on July 1, 1858, which will, of course, be affected by any reduction or increase of expenditure, not contemplated, of $426,875 67.

Leaving an estimated balance in the Treasury on July 1, 1859, of $1,862,119 70.

It is difficult at all times to estimate in advance the probable receipts into the Treasury for the next one and two years. Our revenue being derived principally from duties on imported merchandise entered at the custom-houses for consumption, the amount is necessarily dependent, not only upon all those causes which affect trade and commerce, but on such as control the inclinations and ability of the people in the purchase of such merchandise for consumption.

Ordinarily an approximation can be made to the probable result, provided no unlooked-for cause shall intervene to disturb the usual course of trade and consumption.

The events of the present fiscal year furnish a striking illustration of the uncertainty of all such estimates from the operation of unforeseen causes which exert a controlling influence over the revenue from customs.

When the estimates for the present fiscal year were made to the last Congress by my predecessor, it was impossible to foresee either the material change in the rates of duty, which were among its last acts, or the present revulsion in trade and commerce, both which have deeply affected the revenue, and satisfactorily account for the difference between his estimates and those now submitted. With these two disturbing causes now in view, it is very difficult to form satisfactory estimates of the probable receipts from customs. The tariff act of March 3, 1857, has not been in operation long enough to test its effects upon the revenue, even under ordinary circumstances. Simultaneous with this act going into operation, the country is subjected to a disastrous revulsion. To what extent importations would have been affected by it, had there been no revulsion in trade and commerce, is now as much a matter of conjecture as it was before the passage of the act. Experience has thrown no light on the subject. The probability is that it would, to a limited extent, have increased importations, though not to the extent of supplying the deficiency created by the reduction of the duties.

In submitting to Congress, under these circumstances, estimates of the receipts for the present and the next fiscal year, it is deemed proper to accompany them with a statement of facts and principles upon which they have been made, in order that Congress may pass its own judgment upon the credit to which they are entitled.

The exports and imports of the United States have always borne a relative proportion, the respective amounts not often differing materially from each other. Both have steadily increased, with occasional exceptions, with the growth and progress of the country. In seeking, therefore, to ascertain the probable importations into the country, the amount of our probable exports constitutes an important element in the calculation. The exports for the year ending June 30, 1857, amounted to $362,949,144, and the imports for the same period were $360,890,141. The amount of our exports depends not only on the quantity, but the value of the articles exported. The quantity of some and the value of others may be considerably diminished, and yet the deficiency thus created may be supplied by either the increased quantity or value of other articles. It is probable that this very state of things may occur during the present fiscal year. The indications at present are, that the exports of breadstuffs and provisions will decrease both in quantity and value; but the increased value of cotton, at its probable prices, which constitutes much the largest item of our exports, would make up such deficiency. From the best information which can be obtained, the opinion is entertained that the exports for the present fiscal year will not fall below those of last year more than ten per centum.

Looking to the importations for the last ten years, it may be safely stated that the ratio of annual increase has not been less than ten per centum; though, within that period, there were two years in which there was a falling off. This was attributable, doubtless, to temporary causes which do not affect the general proposition.

The foreign merchandise subject to duty imported during the first quarter, ending 30th September last, of the present fiscal year, by the statement marked 3, amounted to $88,819,385; and the customs received during that quarter were, as stated in the estimates, $18,573,729 37. The tariff of the 3d March last having gone into operation on the first day of that quarter, the circumstances under which a considerable portion of that amount was realized were so exceptional as to form no satisfactory guide for the remaining three quarters of the present fiscal year; and it becomes an important consideration, in view of the probable means in the Treasury to meet existing appropriations, to approximate the amount of merchandise subject to duty which will be entered for consumption during that period.

In making the estimates herewith submitted, the amount of merchandise subject to duty imported during the corresponding three quarters of the last fiscal year were taken, being $210,000,000, to which ten per centum was added for the annual increase, had there been no disturbing causes—giving for the amount of merchandise paying duty, under the then existing tariff of 1846, an aggregate of $231,000,000.

The inquiry now presents itself—to what extent will this approximated amount of merchandise paying duty be diminished by the revulsion which has come upon the country?

An answer to this inquiry constitutes the most serious difficulty in the way of making an estimate of the receipts into the Treasury from customs. Looking, however, to our probable exports, the great resources of our country, its unexampled prosperity in many branches of industry, its capacity to recover from temporary pressure in its trade and business, the opinion is expressed, with some confidence, that the reduction from this cause will not exceed twenty-five per centum. This would bring the amount of merchandise paying duties down to about one hundred and seventy-four millions for the remaining three quarters of the present fiscal year. For several years the average rate of duty upon all dutiable merchandise, by the tariff of 1846, appears to have been within a fraction of twenty-five per centum, which would produce on that amount $43,000,000.

The next point of inquiry is—how much will this sum be diminished by the reduced rates provided by the act of March 3, 1857?

From the calculations made of duties under that act upon the importations of the last fiscal year, compared with the amount of duty actually realized under the tariff of 1846, it appears that about one quarter should be deducted for the effect of the tariff of 1857. Ten million dollars have, therefore, been deducted on that account, making the probable receipts from customs, during the remaining three quarters of the present fiscal year, thirty-three millions, which has accordingly been placed in the estimates.

It will, of course, be understood that the returns of dutiable merchandise, from which these inferences are drawn, are of merchandise imported, while the customs revenue is exclusively derived from merchandise entered for consumption. In these estimates the amount of merchandise imported is supposed to equal the amount entered for consumption. In periods of commercial difficulty, like the present, the amount of merchandise imported and placed in warehouse without payment of duty will, no doubt, exceed the amount entered for consumption; but such excess is generally temporary, and is soon obviated by diminished importations and increased withdrawals for consumption, which restores the equilibrium without giving occasion for the discussion of such details in any general statement of the revenue.

The receipts from customs for the next fiscal year, from July 1, 1858, to June 30, 1859, will depend, in a great measure, upon the extent to which commercial and monetary transactions shall have returned to their ordinary channels. It is probable that the immediate effects of the present revulsion in trade will have ceased by that time, and that the usual amount of dutiable merchandise will be required for consumption. The estimate submitted is based on the amount of three hundred and seventy millions of dutiable merchandise, being the amount assumed for the present fiscal year with the usual increase, and without any deduction for the effects of the present revulsion. Upon this amount the customs, under the act of 1846, with the deduction heretofore explained for the effect of the tariff of 3d March last, would produce about sixty-nine and one half million dollars.

The annual estimates in detail, as prepared by the Register of the Treasury, are presented separately by this Department. These estimated expenditures are divided into three classes.

1. Balances of unexpended appropriations which may, and probably will, be required by the respective Departments in the course of the next fiscal year.

2. Expenditures under indefinite and permanent appropriations. In this class was placed the standing appropriation made by the joint resolution of February 14, 1850, of $2,450,000 for expenses of collecting the customs. It is proposed to change this permanent appropriation for annual appropriations of increased amounts, for reasons set forth in another part of this report. In the mean time, as the proposition has not been sanctioned by Congress, the estimate remains in this class.

3. In the third class are comprised the estimates

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

submitted by direction of the several Executive Departments, as necessary to be appropriated to carry on the several branches of the public service in their charge for the next fiscal year. These three classes comprehend the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, as set forth in this report. Neither these estimates, nor those for the remainder of the present fiscal year, include any provision for deficiencies, or other objects which the several Departments may ask for during the present session, nor for any expenditure whatever, which may arise out of the original action of Congress during the session. To meet such additional expenditures as may be required from these sources, further means must be provided.

The efficiency of the public service, as well as the security of the public credit, requires that this Department shall be provided with means to meet lawful demands without delay. During the remainder of the present fiscal year, it is estimated, as before stated, that sufficient revenue will be received in the course of the year to meet the ordinary outstanding appropriations. But the great bulk of the revenue being derived from duties on merchandise payable only when it is entered for consumption, the period when such duties will be realized is entirely uncertain, being left by law to the option of the importers during three years. The present revulsion has caused a very large portion of the dutiable merchandise imported since it commenced to be warehoused without payment of duty. To what extent this practice will be pursued during the present fiscal year is too much a matter of conjecture at present to risk the public service and the public credit upon the probability of an immediate change in this respect. It may be safely estimated that, in the course of the present fiscal year, a large portion of the merchandise now in warehouse will be withdrawn and duties paid thereon; but, in the mean time, adequate means for meeting lawful demands on the Treasury should be provided.

Such provision should be made at the earliest practicable period, as a failure of sufficient means in the Treasury may occur at an early day. The exigency being regarded as temporary, the mode of providing for it should be of a temporary character. It is, therefore, recommended that authority be given to this Department by law to issue Treasury notes for an amount not to exceed $20,000,000, payable within a limited time, and carrying a specified rate of interest, whenever the immediate demands of the public service may call for a greater amount of money than shall happen to be in the Treasury, subject to the Treasurer's drafts in payment of warrants.

The fact that such temporary exigency may arise from circumstances beyond the foresight or control of this Department, makes some adequate provision to meet it indispensable to the public security.

Previous to the passage of the act of March 3, 1849, which requires all money receivable from customs and other sources to be paid into the Treasury without abatement or diminution, the whole expenses of collecting the revenue from customs were defrayed from the moneys collected, and the balance only was paid into the Treasury. The expenses of collecting the customs in California and Oregon were excepted from the operation of that act by the third section of the act of September 28, 1850, and the mode of defraying the expenses of collection, which existed previous to the act of March 3, 1849, has been consequently continued at the custom-houses on the Pacific coast up to the present time.

The joint resolution approved 14th February, 1850, makes a permanent appropriation for the expenses of collecting the customs of $1,225,000 for each half year, together with such sums as may be received for storage, &c., until Congress shall act upon the subject. During the first four years of the operation of the act of 3d March, 1849, the expenses did not equal the amount of this appropriation, and a considerable balance had accumulated, which has enabled this Department to defray the expenses of the last four years, which have considerably exceeded the amount so appropriated, as is shown by statement marked 4.

This accumulation having become entirely exhausted, this Department will not be able longer to defray the expenses of collecting the customs unless Congress shall now act upon the subject.

In order that this important branch of the public service may be conducted with promptitude and efficiency, I recommend that Congress shall, at its present session, legislate upon this subject, to operate from the 1st of January, 1858, which will put an end to the permanent appropriation under the joint resolution from that date.

For the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1857, the expenses of collecting the customs exceeded three million dollars, exclusive of those of the ports on the Pacific coast, which amounted to nearly half a million, as shown by statement marked 5. For the half of the current fiscal year, extending from 1st January to 30th June, 1858, at least one million six hundred thousand dollars will be required to defray these expenses in the Atlantic States; and I recommend that sum to be appropriated for that period.

The reasons which originally led to the exception of the custom-houses on the Pacific coast from the operation of the general law of 1849 no longer exist in the same force as formerly, but the system cannot be suddenly changed without much inconvenience. I propose that, during the remainder of the current fiscal year, these expenses be defrayed, as heretofore, out of the accruing revenue; but, from the commencement of the fiscal year on the 1st July, 1858, that provision be made by law that the whole receipts from customs and all other sources on the Pacific coast be paid into the Treasury under the act of 1849, and the expenses of collection be defrayed out of appropriations for that purpose. To meet the expenses of collecting the customs throughout the entire United States during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1859, will probably require four million dollars.

The statement before referred to shows the progressive increase of these expenses, from year to year, since the passage of the act of 1849. It also shows a corresponding increase in the amount of merchandise imported and duties paid. But the latter are not sufficient to explain so large an addition to the expenses of collection, as nearly the same number of officers are required to collect the smaller as the larger amounts. Other causes have largely contributed to swell these expenses. When the public revenue happens to be abundant, many projects are listened to and adopted by Congress without careful regard to the burdens they may permanently impose. The building new revenue cutters, not needed for the enforcement of the revenue laws; the multiplication of ports of entry and ports of delivery, for local and temporary convenience, at points not required for the collection of the revenue; and the erection of expensive buildings for officers of the customs and other public officers, are of this class. The original outlay for these projects is usually provided for by special appropriations, and their amount is the principal object that attracts attention. But, under the existing system, every one of these appropriations of necessity imposes an additional and permanent charge upon the expense for collecting the customs. New revenue cutters must be equipped, kept in repair, provided with officers and men, and maintained in a state of efficiency at a large annual charge upon the expenses for collecting the customs, that they may be in constant readiness to relieve vessels in distress, or perform some other duty equally remote from their appropriate and legitimate functions of enforcing the laws. New ports of entry or of delivery created by law, at points remote from the ordinary channels of direct foreign commerce, must be provided with officers paid by annual salaries or other emoluments, as expenses of collecting the customs. New buildings must be furnished, warmed, lighted, and kept in a state of repair and cleanliness, under the direction of suitable officers with proper compensation. All charges of such character are now defrayed out of the appropriation for the expenses of collecting the customs. While the public revenue has recently rapidly diminished, these charges are daily increasing in amount.

The public debt on the 1st July, 1857, was $29,060,386 90. Since that time there has been paid the sum of $3,895,232 39—leaving the public debt at this time $25,165,154 51. Since the 3d March last, there has been paid of the public debt $4,878,377 53. The details are shown by the statements marked 6, 7, and 8. The Department continued the purchase of stock as long as the law and a proper regard for the public interest would justify. The object was to redeem, as far as possible, our outstanding debt which had a number of years to run, whilst the payment of the large sums from the Treasury required for this purpose was affording relief to the commercial and other interests of the country, which were then struggling to ward off the revulsion which finally came upon them. At that time it was not seriously apprehended that the revulsion would so greatly affect the trade and business of the country; but, looking even to the most unfavorable result that could happen, it was thought that the Treasury, if compelled to resort to a loan to meet any temporary deficiency that might occur, would suffer no injury from having the character of the loan changed from debts falling due at a distant period to Treasury notes, at a less rate of interest, and which could be redeemed at the pleasure of the Department.

A revulsion in the monetary affairs of the country always occasions more or less of distress among the people. The consequence is, that the public mind is directed to the Government for relief, and particularly to that branch of it which has charge of its financial operations. There are many persons who seem to think that it is the duty of the Government to provide relief in all cases of trouble and distress. They do not stop to inquire into the power which has been conferred by the people upon their agents, or the objects for which that power is to be exercised. Their inquiry is limited to the simple fact of existing embarrassments, and they see no other agency capable of affording relief; and their necessities, not their judgments, force them to the conclusion that the Government not only can, but ought to relieve them. A moment of calm reflection must satisfy every one that such is not the true theory of our Government. It is one of limited powers, to be exercised for specified purposes. Its operations, political and financial, should be conducted within these prescribed limits in that manner that it will most certainly effect the object for which the power was conferred. In doing this it should be the policy, as it is unquestionably the duty, of the Government so to conduct its affairs as to confer the greatest good upon the greatest number of the people. This misapprehension of the powers and duty of the Government has led to the suggestion of measures of relief, which have been pressed with such earnestness upon this Department as to demand a brief consideration of them. A private individual who finds that his income is reduced, at once feels the propriety of bringing his expenditures within his reduced means. The suggestion to such a person to increase his expenses would instantly be rejected. To characterize such advice as folly would not be considered harsh or unjust. The estimates of receipts into the Treasury for the present fiscal year exhibit the fact that the income of the Government will be considerably reduced. In this state of things it is seriously urged that our expenditures should be increased, for the purpose of affording relief to the country. Such a policy would doubtless furnish employment to large numbers of worthy citizens. It would require the use of large amounts of money, to be raised either by a loan or the issuing of Treasury notes, and would thus afford temporary relief to the country to an extent limited only by the discretion of the Government in this unauthorized use of the public treasure and credit. But where shall we look for the power to do this in the Constitution? What provision of that instrument authorizes such a policy? The absence of a satisfactory reply to these inquiries is an unanswerable argument to the suggestion. In the discharge of its legitimate functions the Government is required to expend large sums of money in the building of vessels of war; the erection of custom-houses and other public buildings; the preparation of the defenses of the country; and in a variety of other ways, which give employment to labor, and draw from the Treasury the money which has been collected from the people for these purposes. There might and would be just cause of complaint if the Government, under the pressure of either an imaginary or real monetary crisis, should suddenly stop these extensive operations, and by throwing large numbers of employes out of service add to the distress and suffering which the revulsion had already created. Being engaged in the prosecution of necessary and legitimate works for the public service, it would be the policy and duty of the Government to continue their prosecution, even though it should occasion the necessity of increasing its available means by some extraordinary measure. The discontinuance of such works has not been and is not now contemplated, and to this extent the country may look with propriety to the operations of the Government for relief. There are other public works of less necessity, which, for a variety of causes, have not been commenced. A temporary postponement of them will violate no existing contracts—will deprive no one of employment to which he is authorized to look—will inflict no wrong upon any portion of the people, but will enable the Government to realize its means in advance of its expenditure of them, and perhaps avoid the necessity of increasing the public debt. A system of public economy, regardless alike of the just claims of the people and the protection of the treasure and credit of the Government, must command the approval of the country; and it is upon such principles it is proposed to conduct the financial department of the Government in the present crisis.

As a measure of relief to the country, it is proposed to increase the tariff. A return to a high protective system is regarded by some as the surest mode of extricating the country from its embarrassments, and affording immediate as well as permanent relief to the public distress. The people are already suffering from distress, and the proposition seeks to diminish their suffering by adding to their burdens. The earnestness and ability which have been brought to the support of this proposition demand that its merits should be examined with some care; and without attempting an elaborate exposition of a question which has heretofore commanded so much of the public attention, it is deemed proper to refer to some of the considerations which render the adoption of such a policy unwise and improper.

The theory of the protectionists is this: that under a low tariff the importations of foreign manufactures is encouraged, and, being brought into the country at lower prices than they can be produced, the competition with the domestic manufacturer is ruinous to his business. The remedy is, to raise the duties upon the foreign article to such a point that either it will be excluded, and thus give to the domestic manufacturer the entire home market, or else it will be so increased in price by the additional duty as to enable the domestic manufacturer to receive a remunerating price for his productions. That the effect would be temporarily for the benefit of the manufacturer is conceded; but that the ultimate effect would be alike injurious to him, as well as all other interests, is equally clear. In looking upon the operation as a measure of relief, we must consider its effects not only upon the domestic manufacturer, but also upon the consumer.

If the increased duty neither diminishes the importations nor increases the price, it is manifest that no advantage has been derived by the domestic manufacturer. If the effect should be to exclude the foreign article, then the domestic manufacturer monopolizes the home market, and commands his own price. The relief he needs is a higher price for his goods, and, as a matter of course, unrestrained as he will then be by the laws of competition, he will so raise his prices as to remedy the evil of low prices of which he had complained. The effect upon the consumer is clear. He must pay the increased price thus put upon the article of consumption. Nor does it stop there. Under the existing state of things, when he has purchased the article he has not only furnished himself with the goods he needed at the reduced price, but at the same time has paid into the Treasury the tax required of him for the support of Government. The measure of relief proposed by the protectionists increases the price he is required to pay for his goods, and where the foreign article is excluded leaves his tax unpaid. This deficiency in the revenue must be supplied, and he is called upon to pay it from his other resources. The proposed measure of relief thus imposes upon him these additional burdens, in the increased price of his goods and the additional tax he is required to pay. If, however, the increased duty should not exclude the importation of the article, but simply advance the price to a remunerating point to the domestic manufacturer, the effect upon the consumer would be to require him to pay the additional price, not only upon the foreign article, but also upon the domestic manufacture. The amount of taxation put upon him for the benefit respectively of the Treasury and the domestic manufacturer, will depend upon the relative proportion of the foreign and domestic article he may consume. In no event can the increased duty operate to the advantage and relief of the manufacturer except by a corresponding injury to the consumer. The amount of benefit conferred and injury sustained by the proposed relief measure would depend upon the relative number of manufacturers and consumers of the articles upon which the increased duties were laid; and as the number of consumers exceeds the number of manufacturers, so would the injury sustained exceed the benefit conferred. A policy so partial and unjust in its operations cannot command the approval of the country.

Regarding the suggestion as a proposition to return to the protective system, it is obnoxious to all the objections which have been heretofore so forcibly and successfully urged against it.

The day has passed in this country for increasing restrictions upon commerce; and it is hoped that the same remark will soon be applicable to all other countries. We are accustomed to look to the amount of our exports and imports as evidences of our growing wealth. To encourage commerce, enlarge its operations and extend its limits, have been regarded by all portions of our people as objects worthy of their united efforts. One branch of commerce cannot long exist without the coöperation of the other. We cannot expect to furnish the world with our cotton, breadstuffs, tobacco, rice, and other productions, unless we are willing to receive in return their productions. There must be mutuality between nations as between individuals. If a policy is to be adopted by which the productions of other countries are to be excluded from ours, for the benefit of the domestic producer of such articles, justice to other interests demands that there should be adopted a policy by which the producers of our present exports should also be furnished with a market for the fruits of their industry. To do this is impracticable; not to do it, would be unjust.

How strangely inconsistent is the doctrine of the protectionists with the practice of the Government! We annually expend large sums of money in maintaining a Navy whose chief duty it is to give protection to our commerce in all parts of the world. Appropriations are asked, and freely given, to send our flag in search of new avenues for our increasing trade.

The American officer who returns to his country to announce the successful terminations of his mission, in having made new and favorable commercial treaties, is hailed as a public benefactor, and all classes unite in doing him honor. In these demonstrations no one participates more cordially than the protectionists. If, upon the announcement of the discovery of a new country which promised a large and lucrative commercial intercourse with our own, it should be simultaneously proposed to impose upon that commerce restrictions that would close our ports to the entry of its productions, under the false theory of protecting home industry, what would be the judgment of an enlightened public opinion upon the wisdom of a people who first expended their treasure in discovering new marts of trade, and immediately denied themselves all the promised benefits to be derived from it? In the case supposed, the proposition would be more startling, but not more unreasonable, than when applied to our intercourse with those countries between whom and ourselves a commerce has grown up from small beginnings to its present large dimensions. This has been accomplished through a policy inaugurated by our own Government, and which has commanded the approval of enlightened minds throughout the world. Other countries have, in their legislation of late years, manifested, by reducing their duties upon imports, a desire to coöperate in the work of throwing off those shackles upon the freedom of commerce which false theories have placed upon it. It would present a strange spectacle if the United States should be the first to commence a retrograde movement.

The sentiment among our people in favor of free commercial intercourse is manifested in their domestic as well as foreign policy. The strong feeling in the public mind for the extension of our territorial limits is generally attributed to the desire for more land. That it operates to some extent is freely admitted; but such a cause fails in its application to those cases where the acquisition of new territory brings with it no proprietary title to the land. And yet the public sentiment for acquiring territory, where every foot of it is held by private titles, is as decided as in any other case. It is accounted for satisfactorily only upon the theory that, as our territorial limits are extended, we enlarge the area of free trade, opening new markets for the productions of our industry, untrammelled with those restraints which a restrictive international policy has imposed.

It is an error to suppose that the occasional revulsions which have so seriously affected our manufacturing interest is attributable to the want of a high protective system. In the policy which the Government has adopted of allowing many of the raw materials used by them to come in, either free of duty or at low duties, in the incidental protection which a tariff laid for the purpose of revenue gives them—in the increasing consumption of their productions, brought about by the general prosperity of the country, they will find the most ample encouragement that could reasonably be expected or desired. Like all other interests in the country, they suffer from the too frequent changes of the tariff, and from those fluctuations in business which flow from causes wholly distinct and separate from the tariff question. What they need is steady prices, a sound currency, and protection against the ruinous effects of expansions in the credit system. From a free and unrestricted commerce with the world, no interest in our country would derive a more certain and permanent benefit than the manufacturers.

Rejecting the proposition to raise the tariff as a measure of relief, and looking to the probable receipts and expenditures for the present and next years, no change is recommended in the act of March 3, 1857, at this time. The present tariff is not regarded as perfect; far from it. It has, however, been in operation less than six months—a length of time too short to judge of its workings, even under the most favorable circumstances. This fact, in connection with the revulsion in business, makes it wholly impracticable to form a correct judgment upon its merits. There are changes which should be made as soon as it can be done with propriety. A return to the decimal division in the rates of duties, a more accurate classification of various articles, and other amendments, would greatly improve the law, even if it should be found by experience unnecessary to make any radical change in its general provisions. The propriety of postponing any action upon the subject, until an opportunity has been offered of testing its general merits, seems to admit of no serious doubt.

Returning to the question of relief which is expected from the Government, it becomes necessary to inquire into the cause of the present revulsion, as preliminary to the consideration of a proper remedy for it. Public opinion generally holds the banks responsible for all our embarrassments. The true cause is to be found in the undue expansion of the credit system. The banks constitute an important part of that system; but there are other elements entering into it, which, equally with the question of the banks, demand public consideration.

Credit, confined to its legitimate functions, is the representative of capital, and when used within that limit, may extend and invigorate trade and business; when it ceases to be such representative, it stimulates overtrading, excites speculation, and introduces an unsound state of things in the business of the country. It is this undue expansion of credit which has brought the country to its present embarrassments. The extension of bank credits and the over-issue of bank notes, is a part, and a very important part, of this undue expansion. A spirit of speculation being created, a demand is made upon the banks for the use of their credit, and yielding to the pressure, they respond by the increased issue of their notes and by enlarging their discounts. The extent to which the banks have enlarged their credit beyond its proper limits is not to be measured alone by the amount of their circulation. At the time the New York city banks suspended specie payments in October, they reported a larger amount of specie in their vaults than their notes in circulation, and, notwithstanding this fact, they were unable to meet the demands of their creditors promptly with specie, owing to their credit operations under their deposit system. Having extended their own credit, and enabled their customers to do the same, they were unprepared for the revulsion which came upon them. If it be true that our embarrassments have been occasioned by the cause here assigned, we must look beyond the action of the banks, to the operations of other corporations, as well as individuals, to fathom the entire cause of our difficulties. The limits of this report will not admit of a detailed examination of this subject, but a solitary illustration will present the subject in its proper light. In answer to a circular letter addressed to the various railroad corporations of the country, the information contained in table No. 9 has been obtained. It appears from this statement that the capital of these companies amounts to $491,435,661, their indebtedness to $417,243,664. The annual interest upon the latter sum is $25,093,203; their annual income was $48,406,488.

It is proper here to remark, that this statement is not entirely accurate; some of the companies failed to respond to the circular of the Department, and in such cases the returns made by them during the preceding year, and contained in the last report of my predecessor, have been used in the preparation of the table. Whilst it cannot, therefore, be considered as perfectly accurate, it approximates it sufficiently near for the illustration of my argument. It exhibits the extent to which this class of corporations has contributed to that expansion of credit which is properly chargeable with the recent revulsion. It is due to a large class of our railroad companies to state that this excessive indebtedness is not equally distributed among them. Some have conducted their business with the utmost propriety and success, whilst others have so far exceeded these limits as to present the foregoing aggregate result of railroad operations in the United States.

The undue expansion of credit, which stimulated in some an eager desire to borrow, and in others a willing disposition to lend, which engendered schemes of improvident speculation, leading to rapid fluctuation in prices and habits of extravagance, I regard as the principal cause for the embarrassment existing in the commerce of the country. The only efficient remedy for such evils is to be found in a return to the prudent courses and steady habits which, for a time, were unhappily laid aside. This Government could do but little towards extricating individuals, corporations, or communities, from the pernicious consequences of their extravagant expenditures or ill-conceived enterprises. When credit has been extended so far beyond the bounds of legitimate confidence as to create a revulsion in trade, occasioning a fall of prices, and a destruction of private credit, a speedy adjustment of the relations between creditor and debtor by liquidation and settlement is the surest mode for the restoration of the equilibrium.

Wild and chimerical speculations will thus have their termination, industry will be better enabled to realize its sober expectations, and the substantial interests of society, being relieved from the noxious influence of excitement, overaction, and disorder, will resume their accustomed energy in communicating a healthful and vigorous activity to the business of the country. The proper agency of the Government in such a case is to remove whatever impediment may exist to the exertion of the native force of society, and to extract from the experience they have gained lessons to be embodied in wholesome and well-considered laws to prevent the recurrence of the evil.

It is evident that the great moneyed corporations created under the laws of the States have had a controlling influence in the undue expansion of private credit. In many of the States the legislation in respect to these is stringent, and embodies many of the safeguards that experience has suggested for their regulation.

But it will not be denied that this legislation has been nugatory. The State authorities have already manifested an eager disposition to relieve them from the penalties they have incurred, and to dispense, as far as they were able, with the performance of the obligations they have exacted from them when they were organized. This has been done, in some cases, without an inquiry into their condition or management, or their capacity to resume their position as solvent institutions, or even to protect the community from a depreciated paper currency.

In my judgment, the period has arrived for Congress to employ the powers conferred by the Constitution upon it to mitigate the present evil, and to prevent a catastrophe of a similar kind in future; and for this purpose a compulsory bankrupt law, to include two classes of corporations and companies, is necessary. It should be a law for the protection of creditors, not the relief of debtors; to prevent improper credit, not to pay improvident debts; compulsory, not voluntary. The effect of such a law would be felt more in its restraining influence than in its practical execution.

I do not recommend a law similar to either of those which have heretofore existed, and were abandoned after a short and unsatisfactory experience. The first was adopted on the 4th April, 1800, and was repealed on the 19th December, 1803. It provided for a compulsory process of bankruptcy against those merchants and commission agents, at the suit of creditors, whose insolvency had become manifest by certain overt acts of fraud or defalcation, and effected a collection and distribution of the estate of the bankrupt through the judicial tribunals of the United States, which was followed by his discharge from the debts his estate had not satisfied. The second act was passed 12th August, 1841, and was repealed the 3d March, 1843. This act, besides the compulsory system of the act of 1800, contained a system of bankruptcy, to be applied on the petition of an insolvent debtor, of any class or profession, and to result in his relief from his debts and engagements, upon the surrender of his property and compliance with other conditions of the act.

There are grave objections to the present adoption of the systems developed in these statutes. The voluntary feature of the act of 1841 is rejected as unwise, unjust, and unnecessary. It was this provision which rendered that law so justly odious in the public mind. Nor do I propose to extend the provisions even of a compulsory bankrupt law to the numerous cases covered by the act of 1841. It is better to leave to the operation of the insolvent and bankrupt laws of the several States all cases which do not, from their magnitude and importance, affect the general commercial and business interests of the country. It is believed that the power of the States is ample to meet such cases, and the propriety and policy of exercising such powers will, sooner or later, be developed by the lessons of bitter experience.

The two cases which it is now proposed to bring under the operation of a compulsory bankrupt law are banks and railroad corporations. The immense capital employed by these companies, their controlling power and influence in the commercial and business operations of the country, their disposition to expand and enlarge their credit, and the ruinous effects produced by their operations when carried beyond legitimate bounds, impose upon the Government the duty of providing, by every constitutional means in their power, for the safe, proper, and legitimate conduct of such corporations. The facts which are presented in other portions of this report, developing the condition and operations of these two classes of corporations, will fully justify the policy now recommended. The object is not to injure them, but to protect the community. The effect will be to restrain their operations within proper limits, and thereby insure to the country all the benefits they are capable of conferring, without the accompanying hazards of wild speculation and ruinous revulsions.

In closing my observations on this subject, it is proper to state that these recommendations are not formed in any spirit of hostility to these corporations and companies, nor am I insensible of their vast importance in the commercial system of the United States. Nor have I any disposition to denounce any punishment, nor to subject them to any loss, in the present conjunction of their affairs. My object is to place them in subjection to wholesome laws; so that, while the benefits they yield to the community may be preserved, their excesses or errors will be counteracted or prevented.

The details of any act formed on the principle I have suggested, should be adopted after an enlarged inquiry into their condition, and should embody the most liberal provisions for the security of the rights of the persons interested in them. A reasonable time should also be allowed to the corporations which are now in default to reestablish themselves before this act becomes operative.

During this financial crisis and general derangement of the currency, the collection and disbursement of the public revenue have proceeded without loss or embarrassment. The operations of the Independent Treasury system, in ordinary times, had been found by experience eminently successful. The danger of loss from unfaithful and inefficient officers, the expense of conducting its operations without the intervention of bank agencies, its deleterious effects upon commercial progress and the general business of the country—all of which was apprehended by the opponents of the measure at the time of its adoption—have been demonstrated to be unfounded. It only remained to encounter a commercial crisis like the present to vindicate the justice and wisdom of the policy against all cause of complaint or apprehension. A brief comparison of the operations of the Treasury Department during the suspension of 1837 and the present time, will place the subject before the public mind in the most satisfactory manner.

On the 30th June, 1837, immediately after the general suspension, the deposit banks held to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and subject to his draft, the sum of $24,994,158 37—a larger amount, in proportion to the receipts and expenditures of the Government, than there was in the Treasury at the time of the suspension by the banks the present year. The funds of the Government being then under the control of the banks, and they, either unwilling or unable to pay, the Government was placed in the anomalous condition of having an overflowing Treasury, which it was seeking to deplete by distribution or deposits with the States, and yet unable to meet its most ordinary obligations. It had either to make its payments and deposits in the depreciated currency which suspended banks forced upon the country, or postpone their payments until, from its credit or other ordinary resources, it could command the means for that purpose. It is unnecessary to detail the expedients to which the Government was forced to resort at that time. The embarrassment consequent upon this state of things will be remembered by those who participated in the scenes of that day. It will be realized by every one from this brief presentation of it. The effort of the Government to withdraw its deposits and get control of its funds, was felt as an additional blow aimed at the banks. Every dollar which could thus be drawn from the vaults of the banks, diminished to that extent their ability to afford relief to their customers. Their loans had to be contracted, and the demand made by them upon their debtors for settlement, increased the pressure already felt in the money market, and thereby added to the general panic and want of confidence, which are the usual attendants of a monetary crisis. The Government was not only embarrassed for the want of its money, but in the effort to obtain it became obnoxious to the charge of adding to the general distress, which many persons thought it was his duty to relieve. To avoid a recurrence of these difficulties, the plan of separating the Government from all connection with the banks was suggested, and in 1846 was permanently adopted. The result is before the country in the occurrences of the last few weeks. The banks, as in 1837, have suspended specie payments; but the analogy ceases there, so far as the operations of the Treasury Department in its disbursements are concerned. The Government has its money in the hands of its own officers, and in the only currency known to the Constitution. It has met every liability without embarrassment. It has resorted to no expedient to meet the claims of its creditors, but with promptness pays each one upon presentation. If the contrast between the operations of 1837 and the present time stopped here, it would be enough to vindicate the policy of the Independent Treasury system; but it does not. The most remarkable feature distinguishing the two periods has reference to the effect upon the commercial and general business interest of the country produced by the present operations of the Independent Treasury. It is the relief which has been afforded to the money market by the disbursements in specie of the General Government. In 1837, the demand of the Government for its funds, with which to meet its obligations, weakened the banks, crippled their resources, and added to the general panic and pressure. In 1857, the disbursements by the Government of its funds, which it kept in its own vaults, supplied the banks with specie, strengthened their hands, and would thus have enabled them to afford relief, when it was so much needed, if they had been in a condition to do it. Their inability or unwillingness to do so, under such favorable circumstances, only shows how much worse the embarrassment would have been if the Government was now demanding payment from them, instead of furnishing them the means of relief.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

At the time, and subsequent to the passage, of the Independent Treasury act of 1846, the greatest apprehension was expressed, and no doubt felt, by its opponents, of the effect of such a policy. The accumulation of specie in the vaults of the Government, the distress it would occasion in the collection of the public dues in specie, and particularly its operations in a monetary crisis, were regarded as certain sources of inevitable evil. The idea that it would afford relief at such a time, was looked upon as wild and visionary by its opponents, and not very confidently anticipated by its friends. The success of the policy should be as gratifying as it was unexpected to those who resisted its adoption with so much zeal and ability.

Whilst the opponents of the system apprehended from it the most ruinous effects upon the banks and the currency, its friends looked confidently to its operation for a wholesome check upon excessive issues by the banks. Experience has shown that the apprehensions of the one were groundless, and the anticipations of the others were well founded, to a limited extent. The increase of the circulation of the banks at the time they were used as public depositories, compared with their circulation at other periods, and particularly since the adoption of the Independent Treasury system, affords the most satisfactory evidence of the restraining influence of the system upon the tendency of the banks to extend their credit and increase their issues. It is impossible to estimate with accuracy the extent of this influence. There are so many elements which enter into the financial operations of a great and extended country like ours, that no man can pretend to analyze the many causes at work with a view of assigning to each its separate and legitimate effect. No one doubts, however, that the effect of collecting the public revenues in the notes of the banks, and depositing the funds when collected with them, would be an extension of the credit of the bank, and an addition of their circulation proportioned to this increased demand for the use of their notes. To the extent that this stimulant to credit has been withheld, to that extent, certainly, has the restraining influence of the Independent Treasury upon excessive bank issues been felt. The collection annually of about seventy millions in the notes of banks, and a large amount at all times remaining in their vaults as deposits, would afford facilities for extending their credit, which the past history of these institutions show they would not hesitate to avail themselves of. If such a system had prevailed for the last ten years, the strong probabilities are that the present crisis would have been much sooner reached, and the effect would have been more disastrous, because more extended, and with fewer sources of relief.

If the beneficial effects of the Independent Treasury system in restraining the banks from extending their credits have not been overestimated—and it is confidently believed that they have not—it is respectfully submitted to public consideration whether the adoption of the same principle by the respective State governments would not complete the work of reform and prevention against bank suspension, so happily inaugurated and successfully practiced by the General Government. The various State governments now collect annually about fifty million dollars. This amount is collected mainly in bank notes, and, when not immediately disbursed, is either kept in the form of bank notes in the vaults of the State treasuries, or deposited directly with the banks. Let the several States collect their revenues in specie, and thence is withdrawn from the banks a stimulant to overbanking to the extent of the facilities now afforded them by this use of their notes.

The remarks already made in connection with the Independent Treasury of the General Government are here applicable to the effect that would be produced by such a policy. The collection and disbursement in specie of the revenues of both the General and State Governments, not to speak of the various city, town, and county corporations, would constitute such a demand for specie, at all times, as to require its retention in the country. The banks, knowing that they were liable to furnish their note-holders with this specie, would regulate their issues accordingly, and would consequently be restrained from excessive overissues, which render suspension of specie payments by them inevitable when a crisis comes, which requires them to do what they ought always to be ready to do—pay their debts. The apprehension that such a requirement by the State governments would operate oppressively upon the people, would prove as unfounded as it did in the case of the General Government. State taxes are now paid, most generally, in bank notes. These notes profess to be the representative of specie. If they are, the tax-payer could easily convert them into specie. If they are not, then they ought not to be received as such either by the State governments or the people. The very object of the law is to guard against the latter contingency, and thus to secure to the country a sound paper currency, always convertible into specie.

Under the operation of an independent treasury system, adopted by each of the States, there would be no difficulty in retaining in the country a sufficient amount of specie, not only for the purposes of the Government, but also to secure a sound paper currency. As long, however, as the present system lasts, this result cannot be looked for. One would suppose that the large increase of gold in the last few years would have enabled the banks to have protected themselves against the necessity of suspending specie payments. Such should have been the case; but it has not been, and will not be, until some policy, such as is here recommended, is adopted, which will compel them to keep sufficient specie in their vaults to meet their issues. Since the discovery of gold in California, in 1849, there has been coined at the mints of the United States the sum of $400,000,000; and even a larger amount has been added from that source to the gold of the world. At that time it was estimated that there was in the United States $120,000,000 of specie. Of that amount the banks held $43,000,000; upon which they issued a circulation of $114,743,415. Their deposits at that time amounted to $91,178,623. It is estimated that there is now in the United States, $260,000,000 of specie, and of this sum the banks have $60,000,000; upon which they have issued a circulation of $214,778,822, and their deposits have increased to $230,351,352. It will be seen from this statement that, with the increased quantity of specie in the country, the banks have only increased their specie from $43,000,000 to $60,000,000, whilst they have increased their circulation from $114,743,415 to $214,778,822. No one supposes that such would have been the case if, during this period, the financial operations of the various State governments had been conducted upon the principles of the Independent Treasury system. It is confidently believed that such a policy would have saved the country from the present bank suspension. If, at the time the General Government was making its disbursements in specie at the commencement of the present crisis, the same operation had been going on from the different State treasuries, the effect necessarily would have been to have supplied every demand in the country for specie, and the banks, already restrained within legitimate bounds, would have been enabled to have pursued their usual business without serious interruption.

In this connection, it cannot fail to attract observation, that at the very moment when the General Government, through the instrumentality of the Independent Treasury system, was meeting, with promptness, its liabilities of every character, and by the very act of disbursing its specie funds affording relief to the banks and the country, the State governments, for the want of such a system, were unable, with nominally full treasuries, to pay their debts, and, in the effort to do so, were subjected to the charge of either paying their liabilities in depreciated currency, or adding to the distress of the country by their demands upon the banks for specie funds. These difficulties are the legitimate fruits of their past policy, and for the present must be endured; it will be their own fault if another revulsion should find them in a like condition.

As an additional restraint upon the tendency of the banks to over-issue, as well as for the purpose of keeping an ample supply of specie in constant circulation, the suppression of all bank notes under the denomination of twenty dollars is recommended to the consideration of those under whose jurisdiction these State institutions exist.

Previous to the act of 20th February, 1857, the Director of the Mint was required, by law, to make his annual report to the President. By the seventh section of that act he is directed to make his report to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the 30th June of each year, that it may appear in the annual report on the finances. The director has made his annual report to the President for the calendar year to the 1st January last, and has now reported to this Department the operations of the Mint and its branches during the remaining half of the last fiscal year, to the 30th June last. The report is herewith transmitted, marked 10.

The director calls the attention of this Department to the propriety of such an amendment of existing laws relative to coinage, that, where fine gold bars are made and paid to depositors of bullion, in addition to the charges now made for parting and toughening, there shall be a charge of one half per cent. paid into the Treasury thereon, which would have been imposed had the same been coined. By the sixth section of the act of 21st February, 1853, this charge of one half per cent. was payable into the Treasury, in addition to the charges for refining or parting bullion, whether it was paid to depositors in the form of coin, or in bars, ingots, or disks. But the sixth section of the act of March 3, 1853, chapter ninety-six, provides that the charge for refining, casting, or forming bars, ingots, or disks, shall not exceed the actual cost of the operation. The effect of this provision is to repeal the seigniorage of one half per cent. imposed equally on bullion coined or withdrawn in the form of fine bars, by the act of February 21, 1853, and to restrict this duty entirely to coin. This is, of course, equivalent to paying a premium of one half per cent. upon all bullion exported in the form of fine bars, as it would have been subjected by law to that burden had it been coined. I concur with the director in the opinion that it is not good policy to impose this half per cent. on all bullion coined for circulation, and at the same time exempt fine bars withdrawn for exportation. If depositors of bullion choose to export it in the form of fine bars, they should be at liberty to exercise that option; but they should not be allowed a premium of one half per cent. upon such as is withdrawn for exportation, which is the effect of imposing that duty on that bullion which is coined, and exempting, as is done by the section of the act of March 3, 1853, referred to, that which is withdrawn in the form of fine bars. I accordingly recommend that the original provision of the sixth section of the act of February 21, 1853, be restored.

By the act of March 3, 1857, amendatory of "An act to provide for the better organization of the Treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," it was provided "that each and every disbursing officer or agent of the United States, having any money of the United States intrusted to him for disbursement, shall be, and he is hereby, required to deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States, or with some one of the assistant treasurers or public depositaries, and draw for the same only in favor of the persons to whom payment is to be made in pursuance of law and instructions, except when payments are to be made in sums under twenty dollars, in which cases such disbursing agent may check in his own name, stating that it is to pay small claims."

The object of this provision of law was to protect the Government from the improper use of the public funds in the hands of disbursing officers. It was the desire of the Department to carry it out to the fullest extent that it could be done. An enforcement of its provisions according to its letter was impracticable. It would have required a considerable increase of the clerical force of different offices, for which no provision had been made by Congress, and in some of the Departments a compliance with its requirements was impossible. Payments by the disbursing officers of the Army and Navy, as well as payments by a portion of such officers in the Interior Department, could not be made in the mode pointed out. Pursers in the Navy, settling with the officers and crew of a vessel in foreign ports; paymasters in the Army, at remote points from any public depositary; disbursing agents, charged with the payment of Indian annuities, could not discharge their duties if a literal compliance with this law had been required. Regarding the object of the law as wise and proper, and feeling bound to enforce it to the utmost extent of my power, I caused circulars Nos. 2 and 3, appended to this report, to be issued to the various public depositaries and disbursing agents of this Department, by which it will be seen that the object of the law has been carried out, and in the mode prescribed, as far as it was possible to do so. It is believed that the regulations thus adopted will effectually secure the object which Congress had in view in the passage of the act of March 3, 1857, and I would recommend that the law be so amended as to conform to these regulations. At all events, some legislation is absolutely necessary on the subject, and I would ask the early attention of Congress to it.

The sum of $2,500 was appropriated at the last session of Congress "to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to cause such experiments and analyses of different beds of ore as to test whether any of such ores, in their native state, possess alloys that will resist the tendency to oxidize to a greater extent than others, and to ascertain under what circumstances they are found, and where, in order to facilitate the proper selections of iron for public works." To carry out the object in view, I caused circulars to be sent to all iron-masters whose names could be ascertained, soliciting specimens of ore and iron, and calling for information pertinent to the subject; and, in compliance with the request, already a large number of specimens have been received and are being received daily. The specimens are accompanied by letters manifesting great interest in the result, and communicating much valuable information in relation to the production of iron, which has become one of the great national industrial interests. So soon as the specimens are all received and arranged, and the information which accompanies them has been abstracted and collated, a competent chemist or metallurgist will be employed to make the experiments and analyses. Conclusive evidence has already been received that a decided difference in the susceptibility of different irons to oxidize does exist, and it is hoped that the proposed analyses will discover the cause. However, should the experiments fail in this respect, they will at least show the localities from which the least oxidizable iron can be procured. Some idea may be formed of the importance of being able to discriminate between irons as to their susceptibility to oxidize, from the fact that the quantity used by the Government, in this Department alone, since January, 1852, exceeds forty million pounds; and the Navy and War Departments may each safely be put down for equal amounts. The use of iron capable of resisting oxygen, for rigging, anchors, chain-plates, sheathing, &c., in our commercial marine, would be immense.

In accordance with the authority vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, by the joint resolution approved February 26, 1857, to provide for ascertaining the relative value of the coinage of the United States and Great Britain, and fixing the relative value of the unitary coins of the two countries, I appointed Professor J. H. Alexander, of Baltimore, commissioner to confer with the proper functionaries in Great Britain in relation to some plan or plans of so mutually arranging, on the decimal basis, the coinage of the two countries, as that the respective units shall hereafter be easily and exactly commensurable. Professor Alexander is now in London, and I expect the result of his mission will be embodied in a statement and report from him at an early day, which will be laid before Congress as soon as received.

The joint resolution to prevent the counterfeiting the coins of the United States, approved February 26, 1857, empowered the Secretary of the Treasury to cause inquiry to be made, by two competent commissioners, into processes and means claimed to have been discovered by J. T. Barclay, Esq., for preventing the abrasion, counterfeiting, and deterioration of the coins of the United States. Under said authority, I appointed Professor Henry Vethake and R. E. Rogers, of Pennsylvania, and directed every facility to be afforded them at the Mint, in Philadelphia, to pursue their investigations. I anticipate, at an early day, to communicate the results of the said inquiry to Congress, with my opinion as to the probable value of the alleged discoveries.

In the settlement of the accounts of the Clerk of the House of Representatives by the accounting officers of the Treasury, a question arose as to the power of the two Houses of Congress over their respective contingent funds. Under resolutions passed by the House of Representatives, the Clerk had paid certain sums to different employes of the House for extra services rendered by them, and the question was presented to me whether he could be allowed credit for such payments in view of the provisions of the act of March 3, 1845, which was evidently intended to prevent the application of the contingent fund of the two Houses to such purposes. My opinion was, that the act of March 3, 1845, was still in force in this respect, and I accordingly held that the credits could not be allowed. The reasons for that opinion are so fully stated in my letter of June 30, 1857, to the First Auditor of the Treasury—a copy of which accompanies this report, marked 11—that it is unnecessary again to discuss the question. In conformity to the suggestions of that letter, and for the reasons therein given, I recommend the passage of a law for the relief of the parties who have acted under the different construction placed upon the law by this Department.

By the act of February 5, 1857, the President was authorized "to procure, by purchase or otherwise, a suitable steamer as a revenue cutter," and for that purpose the sum of $150,000 was appropriated. Under this authority proposals were invited for the building of such a vessel, and the contract awarded to Mr. William H. Webb, of New York. He is progressing rapidly with the work, and it is believed that the vessel will be ready for service by the 1st of February, 1858. The character of the contractor, and the care and energy which have been displayed so far in the construction of this steamer, justify the opinion that, when completed, it will be a vessel that will do credit to the service. The whole expense of building and equipping the steamer will be within the appropriation made by Congress.

The report of the engineer in charge of the Bureau of Construction is herewith submitted, marked 12. It will give a detailed statement of the expenditures in that branch of the public service. There are interesting facts set forth in this report, which should not fail to attract the attention of Congress. By reference to the tables accompanying the report, the number of public buildings erected prior to 1850, and their cost, will be shown; also the number authorized to be erected since that time, as well as the propositions which have been urged upon Congress for the still further enlargement of the system. In view of these facts, it is submitted that Congress should either return to the practice of the Government prior to 1850, or else adopt a system that would do justice to the different sections of the country. If these public buildings are to be erected to the extent indicated by the legislation of the last few years, not only justice to the different sections of the country, but economy and the public interest require that they should be subjected to a system which will guard the public interest against the unwise expenditures likely to be incurred from the present mode of legislating on the subject. No public building should be authorized until an official report has been made to Congress showing the necessity for its erection, and its cost.

The suggestions made in the report of the engineer, on the propriety of systematizing this class of business, are commended to the consideration of Congress. Before, however, adopting the late legislation on this subject as the fixed policy of the Government, it would be well to consider the expense which such a system will permanently entail upon the Treasury. The number of custom-houses, court-houses, and post offices which would be called for can hardly be computed with accuracy; but our general information on the subject is sufficient to justify the opinion that it would be attended with an expense which would never be compensated for in any advantages to the public service. My own opinion is decidedly against the system; but if Congress adopts it, I am desirous of placing it upon the most just and economical principles.

Among the tables accompanying this report, I especially call the attention of Congress to No. 13, giving a detailed account of the expenditures and receipts of the marine hospital fund for the relief of sick and disabled seamen in the ports of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857.

The relief afforded at the hospitals belonging to and under the charge of the Government is no greater than at other points, whilst the expense is much larger. This is attributable, in a great measure, to the unwise location of some of the hospitals, though there are, doubtless, other causes which contribute to that result. The propriety of dispensing with these public hospitals, and returning to the system which still exists at most of our ports for the disbursement of the marine hospital fund, is commended to the favorable consideration of Congress.

Having called on the President of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company for a report of its condition, I herewith transmit the response of that officer, marked 14, from which Congress can decide whether further legislation on that subject is advisable.

The report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey will be submitted to Congress at an early day. It will give a statement of the operations of that branch of the public service, showing the progress which has been made in it during the last fiscal year. Every reduction in the expenditures of this service has been made consistent with its prosecution on the present scale.

The reports of the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Auditors, and of the First and Second Comptrollers, the Commissioner of Customs, and those of the Treasurer, Solicitor, and Register of the Treasury, (marked from A to L, inclusive,) are herewith submitted. They give a detailed account of the business transacted in their respective offices.

The report of the supervising inspectors, marked 15, will be found among the documents accompanying this report, and gives the operations of the law under which they are appointed for the past year.

The operations of the Light-House Board, with the condition of the works under their charge, will be found in the report from that body, No. 16.

A disposition on the part of the board to curtail a system which has been extended beyond the wants of commerce, should recommend it to the favorable consideration of Congress.

The duties devolving upon those having charge of this branch of the public service have been performed with satisfaction and ability.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Secretary of the Treasury.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
December 3, 1857.

SIR: In presenting an exhibit of the operations of this Department, attention is first invited to the important and diversified interests connected with the administration of our public domain, respecting which the accompanying report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office furnishes interesting details, with a gratifying view of our extended land system. American legislation has shown its superior practical wisdom by its simplicity and adaptation to the wants of our people in its code of land laws, in regard to the improvement of which few suggestions can be made.

The leading fact attracting our attention is the vast extent of the operations of the land bureau.

The public domain covers a surface, exclusive of water, of 1,450,000,000 of acres. It stretches across the continent, and embraces every variety of climate and soil, abounding in agricultural, mineral, and timber wealth, everywhere inviting to enterprise, and capable of yielding support to man.

This great inheritance was acquired, first by the voluntary cessions of several of the original thirteen States; then by the Louisiana purchase obtained from Napoleon by the treaty of 1803. The next enlargement of our territory was effected by the treaty of 1819 with Spain, ceding the Floridas to the United States; then its further extension was effected by the treaty of 1848, at Guadalupe Hidalgo, with Mexico, ceding New Mexico and California. Subsequently, Texas accepted the proposition of this Government establishing her boundaries, for the "relinquishment by the said State of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries." The last accession to the public domain is that, in 1854, from Mexico, known as the "Gadsden purchase," covering a surface of 23,161,000 acres, south of the Gila river.

The Supreme Court has said, in reference to acquired lands, that "the people change their sovereign; their right to property remains unaffected by this change." Consequently, when the United States succeeded to the ownership of that portion of our territory derived from treaties with foreign Powers, the first and paramount duty in the disposal of the public lands was to separate private from public property.

In obedience to this well-settled principle of public law, and under the especial obligations of treaties, the United States have established boards of commissioners, conferred powers on registers and receivers, opened the courts of the United States for the adjudication of foreign titles, and in multitudes of cases confirmed such titles by special acts of legislation.

These classes of titles are known under the generic description of "private land claims," and are of every species, from minute parcels in the form of lots in Spanish towns to rural claims, ranging in size from one hundred arpents and less to a million and a half acres.

These titles are of British, French, Spanish, and Mexican origin, all depending for validity on the colonial laws of their different sovereignties. And there is no branch of jurisprudence where greater research and extent of legal erudition have been displayed by our judicial tribunals, than in the determination of the intricate questions which have arisen, been discussed, and judicially determined in connection with this branch of the service. These foreign claims are of every diversity of shape, and everywhere scattered over the public domain, interrupting the regularity of our surveys, with which they are necessarily interlocked, and exhibit in striking contrast the irregularities of the foreign surveys, when compared with the simplicity and beauty of our own rectangular system; showing the difference in the modes of distributing estates, one of which concedes to the favorites of princes immense bodies of the choicest lands, whilst the other subdivides the public territory, so as to deal with every citizen in a spirit of enlarged liberality. In the growth of our immense territory, in the way and by the means already mentioned, there remained and still remain unextinguished, the claims, rights, and possession of the aborigines. The General Government of the Union, at the dawn of our political existence, adopted the principle asserted by the colonizing Governments of Europe, to the effect that the absolute title was in the United States, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy, and with the unconditional privilege of extinguishing that right.

Under the operation of these principles, the purchase and extinguishment of the Indian right has been gradually progressing in the ratio in which lands in Indian occupancy were demanded by our people for settlement. Pari passu have the lines of the public surveys been carried, in preparing the way for homesteads, and the means by which to pass to our people unincumbered and infeasible titles.

The surveying system is now organized into twelve different districts, and the lines of the public surveys have already been extended over more than one fourth of the whole surface of the public domain. That surface, as heretofore stated, is 1,450,000,000 acres. Of this, there have been surveyed and prepared for market, of net public lands, that is, exclusive of school lands, &c., 401,604,988 acres, of which quantity 57,442,870 acres have never been offered, and are, consequently, now liable to public sale; in addition to which, there were upwards of 80,000,000 acres subject to entry at private sale on the 30th September last.

Of the public domain, there have been disposed of by private claims, grants, sales, &c., embracing surveyed and unsurveyed land, 363,862,464 acres, which, deducted from the whole surface, as above stated, leaves undisposed of an area of 1,086,137,536 acres.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, and the quarter ending September 30, 1857, public lands have been surveyed and reported to the extent of 22,889,461 acres. During the same period 21,160,037.27 acres have been disposed of, as follows: For cash, 5,300,550.31 acres; located with military warrants, 7,381,010 acres; returned under swamp land grant, 3,362,475.96 acres; estimated quantity of railroad grants, of March, 1857, 5,116,000 acres. The amount of money received on cash sales is $4,225,908 18.

This shows a falling off in land receipts from those for the corresponding period of the preceding year of $5,322,145 99; with a falling off during the same period, in the location of lands with warrants, of more than twenty per cent.

Whatever may have been the cause of this diminution, the fact demonstrates that, long before the prostration of all credit by the suspension of the banking institutions, the investment in wild lands had greatly decreased.

In the territory of the United States there are eighty-three organized land districts, each having a register and receiver, for the sale and disposal of the public lands. Yet we have no land district for either the Territory of New Mexico or Utah. In New Mexico the public surveys have been executed to a very limited extent, owing to Indian hostilities. In Utah the surveys had rapidly progressed, until the surveyor general abandoned his post owing to reported hostilities of the Mormon authorities at Salt Lake City. The extent of the surveys, since the beginning of the operations in Utah, exhibits a sphere of field work embracing 2,000,000 acres.

A due regard for the public interests, as well as a proper respect for the prosperity and advancement of New Mexico, would justify, if not loudly call upon Congress to establish a land office and a board of commissioners for the adjudication of Spanish and Mexican claims in that Territory. It is important to its future prosperity promptly to separate private property from the public lands, before the settlements become dense, and consequent conflicts of claim and title arise.

By the act of April 24, 1820, the old credit system of sales of land was abolished, the cash system instituted, and the minimum price fixed at $1 25 per acre. This is the great basis of our present system of sales. The policy of the law is to favor the actual settler. It is a humane, wise, and just policy. When the hardy pioneer breaks off from the comforts and security of a long settled community, and encounters the hazard and endures the hardships and deprivations of a new settlement in the forest, he has rendered a positive service to the Government; and to deny him the right of securing his home and improvements, in preference to all others who would profit by his sacrifices, would be a crying injustice.

When an actual settler goes upon lands which have been offered for sale, and builds himself a house, the law allows him twelve months within which to pay for a preemption right of one hundred and sixty acres. If he enters upon unoffered land, or lands which have never been surveyed, he is permitted to file his declaration of intention to enter, and is not required to pay for his preemption till the day appointed by proclamation for public sale of the lands. Public policy may cause an indefinite postponement of the sale of the land, and the consequence is, that with this inchoate, imperfect right, he continues to occupy without perfecting his title. This privilege to enter being a personal right, its transfer or assignment is prohibited by law.

By thus conceding a privilege, and fixing no time in which he is required to perfect his title, an interest is created in opposition to a public sale by proclamation, when the good of the country may require it. The suggestion, therefore, that settlers upon unoffered lands should be required to make their proof and payment within a specified period, is approved.

Preemptions upon unsurveyed lands are now limited to particular States and Territories. A general law authorizing preemptions upon lands of this character, superseding or repealing special statutes on the subject, would conduce to the harmony of the system; and such a law is recommended.

In order to remove all doubt in the construction of existing law, preemption privileges should also be extended to alternate reserved railroad sections, in cases where settlements have been made after the final allotment. The enhanced value of such lands presents only a stronger reason why preference should be given to settlers over all others.

The mode of disposing of the public lands under existing legislation is simple, uniform, and complete. Lands are introduced into market, and opened to free competition at public sale by the President's proclamation, which, at the same time, notifies settlers to come forward and secure their homes at the minimum price, without risk of competition at public sale. Then such lands as remain thus undisposed of, are open to free purchase at private sale, at the ordinary minimum of $1 25 per acre; or when in market ten years and upwards, at reduced prices—always, however, with the preference right of purchase awarded to the actual settler.

The public domain is the property of the United States, and the individual citizens thereof have equal rights of purchase. Actual settlers, as already shown, are amply protected by law from interference, and efficient safeguards are thrown around their rights. As an evidence of this, it is estimated that, in the sales of the last year, three fourths of the sold and located lands were taken for actual settlement. Large districts of the public lands are valuable, however, only for the timber found upon them: they are unsuitable for settlement; and to restrict their purchase to settlers alone, would prevent their sale for an indefinite period, and hold out a standing temptation to trespass and plunder.

An amendment of the law fixing the maximum compensation of the registers and receivers, so as to restrict the payment for any one quarter or fraction of a quarter to a pro rata allowance, both for salary and commissions, is approved and recommended.

Under the bounty land law of 3d March, 1855, large sums have been received at some of the local land offices for the location of warrants, and claims have been presented by several of the officers for the whole amount of fees collected. The General Land Office has decided, and the decision has been sanctioned by the Department, that, in view of the limitation as to maximum in the act of 20th April, 1818, and the terms of the second and third sections of the act of 22d March, 1852, in connection with the act of 1855, there is no authority of law for the allowance of any excess over the maximum compensation for commissions, as fixed by said act of 1818.

The act of 12th January, 1825, authorizes repayment of purchase money to be made from the Treasury in all cases of sales of lands made by the local land officers, where the Government is unable, from want of title in itself, to issue patents to the purchasers.

My predecessors have construed this act as providing for repayments in all cases where, from any cause, the sale could not be confirmed; and the uniform practice has been in conformity with that view of the law.

This practice is unquestionably founded in strict justice, and I have not deemed it best to disturb it, although inclined to the opinion that a strict construction of the law would limit its operation to the class of cases specifically embraced therein. Should any doubt be entertained of the propriety of my action in this particular, such amendatory legislation is respectfully recommended as may be called for in the premises.

The interesting communication, which accompanies this report, of the late Secretary of the Territory of New Mexico, respecting the mineral resources of that distant Territory, suggests the propriety of providing for a geological survey thereof. It is not doubted that vast quantities of gold and silver, copper, lead, and iron ores are to be found imbedded in its soil; and their discovery and development could not fail to conduce to the public prosperity.

The report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs furnishes an interesting view of a peculiar people, with whom this Government holds the most complicated relations.

The members of the Indian tribes within our limits, while they are not citizens, cannot, with strict propriety, be termed foreigners. "Domestic dependent nations, their relations to the United States resemble those of a ward to his guardian. They look to our Government for protection, and appeal to it for relief to their wants." While we negotiate treaties with them, which are ratified with all the solemnity befitting a contract to which nations are parties, we undertake to construe and execute their provisions, acknowledging no responsibility but such as we may owe to truth, honor, and justice. As the limits of our civilization have been extended, the number of these children of the forest with whom our people are brought into immediate contact is greatly increased. Treaties multiply; rights are acquired; mutual obligations are assumed; obedience is promised on the one part, protection is guaranteed on the other. The Indian bureau is grown to be a great foreign office, conducting the correspondence and adjusting the relations of more than sixty interior governments; while it is at the same time charged with the control, regulation, and protection of the rights of the individual members of those Governments.

In the performance of these duties questions are presented of the most difficult character, in the solution of which it is almost impossible to arrive at a conclusion which shall reconcile the necessities of sound policy with the requirements of the law. The intercourse act of 1834 was adapted to a condition of affairs which no longer exists, and it might be judiciously modified. The wide dissimilarity, too, of the provisions of the various treaties recently negotiated with the several tribes, agreeing, however, in this, that legislation by Congress is made a prerequisite to the full enjoyment by the Indian of the rights they were intended to secure to him, furnishes a weighty reason for the revision and codification of the laws now in force; and it is to be hoped that Congress will give its early attention to the subject, and prescribe, in one comprehensive enactment, a well-considered, compact, and uniform system of laws for the regulation of Indian intercourse.

The Indian tribes within our limits, numbering about three hundred and twenty-five thousand souls, may be divided into three classes: The first—wild, roving, fierce, retaining all the traditional characteristics which marked the race before the advent of the white man—eke out by plunder the uncertain subsistence derived from the chase. To this class, comprising nearly three fourths of the whole number, belong most of the bands whose hunting grounds lie in the interior of the continent, and in the Territories of Oregon and Washington. These tribes are controllable only through their fears. They are, ostensibly, our friends, because they dare not openly avow hostility; and this must continue to be the case as long as they retain their roving habits. The Indian office is powerless to effect any amelioration of their condition until they can be induced to adopt fixed habitations. To the accomplishment of this preliminary step the efforts of the Indian bureau are now directed; and it is hoped that, with the aid of the military arm of the Government, the system of colonization, which has elsewhere been so productive of good, may be successfully applied to these tribes.

The tribes of California, Utah, Texas, New Mexico, and a portion of those in Oregon, constitute the second class. Some three years since the policy was adopted of concentrating these Indians on small reservations, where they might be practically taught the industrial arts, and labor for their support under the immediate supervision of their agent. These establishments are, in fact, manual-labor schools on a large scale; and I am gratified to be able to state that the happiest results have followed their introduction. The two great difficulties to be encountered in effecting the civilization of the Indian, are his impatience of restraint and his aversion to labor; and these are not to be overcome by abstract teachings. He must be taught practically, if at all, the immense superiority of a settled over a roving life, and the value and dignity of labor. This, the colonization system appears to be accomplishing, and it is certainly the most effectual and economical plan yet devised for his reclamation.

The Indians along the west bank of the Missouri, those of Kansas, and the four great tribes occupying the territory west of Arkansas, form a third class, differing in many particulars from either of the others. Generally true and reliable, they constitute a people for whom we justly feel the deepest sympathy and the greatest solicitude. The degree of civilization to which these tribes have attained varies greatly in different localities. Some of them, steeped in ignorance, thoroughly degraded, seem, in their contact with our people, to have lost the rude virtues that characterized them in a savage state, and acquired from civilization only its vices. Others have rapidly advanced, socially, morally, and in the knowledge of the useful arts, until they have become fit to be recognized as citizens. Here and there is found one whose talents, attainments, and integrity, constitute him an ornament to his race, and, while he challenges our admiration and respect, furnishes practical evidence of the capacity of the Indian for high civilization.

When those tribes who once resided east of the Mississippi river were induced to leave the graves of their fathers and emigrate to the west, the Congress of the United States gave them a solemn pledge that the country where they now reside should be forever "secured and guaranteed" to them. The westward march of emigration, however, has overtaken the Indian, and now begins to press upon him; and it is evident that a critical period in his history has been reached. To attempt his removal still further west is impracticable. The country is unsuited to his wants; it has no sufficient supply of wood or water, and a removal there would but be the means of hastening on his bitter fate. Where he now is, he must make a stand and struggle for existence, or his doom is sealed. If he cannot adopt the habits, and rise to the level of his white neighbor, he must pass away; and the necessity of devising some policy which shall meet the emergency presses itself upon the Government at this time with peculiar force. So far as the Indians of the central and northern superintendencies are concerned, the question is especially embarrassing. Treaties have, within the last three years, been negotiated with most of these tribes, by which their lands, with the exception of small reservations, have been ceded to the United States. Other treaties have been made, by which individual reservations have been secured, in the expectation that the Indian would settle down, each upon his own farm, and gradually and insensibly attain the level of his neighbors. Unhappily for the success of this scheme, an unprecedented tide of emigration pressed into Kansas and Nebraska. The fertility of the reservations, greatly enhanced in value by the rapid settlement of the country, tempted alike the cupidity of the land speculator and of a class of settlers by no means punctilious in their respect for the right of the Indian. The result has been disastrous. Trespassed upon everywhere, his timber spoiled, himself threatened with personal violence, feeling unable to cope with the superior race that surrounded and pressed upon him, the Indian proprietor has become disheartened. Many of them have abandoned their reserves, and still more desire to sell. These Indians now ask for patents, as they have a right to do, for their selections. The treaties vest in Congress the power of providing for their issuance, "with such guards and restrictions as may seem advisable for their protection therein." There can be no doubt that our people will succeed in getting possession of these homes of the Indian. If Congress shall fail to act, and thus open no door by which the Indians can divest themselves of their titles, it may be apprehended that unscrupulous men will, without law, obtain possession of their lands for a trifling consideration, and stand the chances of an ultimate title. The interest of the reserve requires the passage of a law regulating the alienation of his right to his land, and securing him the payment of a fair equivalent for the same.

For their numbers, the income of most of these tribes, in the way of annuity, is large; but experience has shown that the system heretofore pursued, of paying them in money at stated periods, has been productive of evil rather than good. It represses industry and self-reliance, it encourages idleness and extravagance, and draws around them a swarm of unprincipled traders. In many of the treaties which have lately been negotiated with these tribes, this provision has been inserted: "The object of this instrument being to advance the interests of said Indians, it is agreed" that "Congress may hereafter make such provision by law as experience shall prove to be necessary."

If Congress, in the exercise of this power, should clothe this Department with some discretion in the payment of annuities, so that the same could be used as a means of their moral reform and elevation, instead of the injurious system now prevailing, of distributing money per capita, decided advantages may be reasonably anticipated.

The plan which has suggested itself as the most likely to arrest the demoralization now rapidly increasing, and, at the same time, lay a solid foundation for their ultimate civilization, may be briefly outlined thus:

They should be gathered on smaller reservations and in denser settlements. They must be familiarized with the idea of separate property, by encouraging them to erect houses as homes for themselves and their families. For this purpose the reservations should be divided into farms of suitable size, and distributed among the individuals of the tribes, to hold, in severalty, as their separate and private estate, but without the power of selling, mortgaging, leasing, or in any manner alienating the same, except to members of the same tribe with themselves. Settlements by white men within the reserves should be prohibited, and the prohibition rigidly enforced; and increased efforts should be made to suppress the sale of ardent spirits, to effect which the cooperation of the Indian authorities should be secured. Farms should be established in central positions, at which all the children of the tribe should be collected and required to labor, and where they could be taught the rudiments of an education. A certain portion of them should be apprenticed to useful trades, and the surplus of the proceeds of their labor, whether on the farm or in the workshop, should be divided among their parents. Here they would be taught the great truths that labor is honorable, and that want and suffering inevitably follow in the train of improvidence and idleness. Implements of husbandry, blankets, and clothing, useful articles of furniture, books, and, indeed, everything which promises to give comfort to their homes, should be purchased and divided per capita.

Should their income be more than sufficient to meet the outlay required for these purposes, then the remainder might be paid in money. Now the annual indiscriminate distribution of their national funds among the Indians is gradually working their ruin; whereas a wise policy, such as any parental Government should adopt, would necessarily produce the happiest results.

The details of the system should, of course, be modified to suit the varied conditions of the several tribes; but the uniform application of its leading ideas to the government of the tribes in the central and northern superintendencies is, I conceive, indispensable.

The condition of affairs in the southern superintendency presents a gratifying spectacle. The four great tribes of Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees and Creeks, with the kindred band of Seminoles occupying the territory west of Arkansas, have steadily improved in morals, in education, in the comprehension of, and respect for, the rights of persons and of property, and in a knowledge of the theory and principles of government. They have regularly organized governments, constructed upon the model of our own, State constitutions, governors, legislatures, codes of laws, and judicial magistracies to expound them. There the path of duty is plain. Every encouragement should be held out to them to persevere in well doing, until the period arrives when, ripe for citizenship, they shall be admitted to the full enjoyment of all its rights and privileges.

One grievance, however, to which they are subjected, and of which they justly complain, deserves the consideration of Congress. While the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are in force over this territory, there is no local tribunal empowered to take cognizance of the causes which arise under them—which, therefore, are sent for trial to the United States district courts in the State of Arkansas. This not only causes great expense and inconvenience to the suitors, but, in criminal cases especially, interferes with the impartial administration of justice. A Choctaw or Chickasaw, accused of an offense against the laws of the United States, is hurried away from his friends, to be tried at a remote point, in a community which has no sympathy with him. Unable to compel the attendance of his witnesses, and deprived of the aid and comfort extended to the white man similarly situated, he defends himself under great disadvantages. There is a manifest injustice in this which should be remedied at once; and I would suggest the establishment by Congress of a district court of the United States for this territory, to hold at least one term annually for each of the four tribes of Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, and Chickasaws. Among these tribes there are educated, well-read lawyers; and the holding of a court in their country would create, in the minds of the people, respect for the laws, and give dignity to the administration of justice.

The Indians of the Territories of Washington and Oregon are still restive and belligerent. This disposition on their part evidently springs from disbelief in the strength and ability of this Government to punish them for trespasses committed upon our settlements. It is the duty of the Government to disabuse their minds. This can best be done by peaceful means. Let an appropriation be made to defray the expenses of a delegation from each of the large tribes in those distant Territories, to Washington and other eastern cities. Let them know, by personal observation, our numbers, see our improvements, and estimate our strength. They would readily conclude that further hostility would be absurd; and when they carried the story of our greatness and power to their people, a change would come over their minds, and we might then reasonably hope for the establishment, by treaties, of good understanding and perpetual peace between us. Such an appropriation would be, in my judgment, an act of true economy.

During the past year a large amount was paid into the Treasury of the United States on account of moneys belonging to certain Indian tribes. The several treaties under which this amount was derived devolved upon the President the duty of causing it to be invested in some "safe and profitable stocks," to be held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the respective tribes. In pursuance of your directions, these Indian trust funds were invested in State stocks which were deemed safe and profitable. The amount of bonds purchased was $1,481,476 03, costing $1,291,677 49.

The investment having been made at a time of unusual financial embarrassment, we were enabled to make a profit of $190,398 54 for the Indian tribes, and at the same time to afford relief, to some extent, to the business community.

The report of the Commissioner of Pensions presents a satisfactory view of the operations of that bureau during the last year. The business of the office has been brought up to date, as nearly as it is practicable; and the large clerical force, required to dispatch the heavy labors devolved upon it by the recent laws granting bounty land, has been reduced, so as to conform to the present exigencies of the office.

For some years past, the practice has prevailed of paying to the children, and sometimes to the administrators, of deceased revolutionary soldiers and their deceased widows, the amount of pension to which such soldiers or widows would have been entitled had they succeeded in making good their claims during their lifetime, but never to grandchildren, as such. At the last term of the Supreme Court it was decided, in a case involving the distribution of certain pension moneys which had been paid to an administrator for the exclusive benefit of the children of a deceased widow of a revolutionary soldier, that grandchildren, per stirpes, stood in the same relation to such claims as children; and it was subsequently contended that the effect of that decision was not only to affirm the legal correctness of the practice alluded to, but to enlarge it, so as to embrace a class of claimants not previously recognized by it.

Seeing that a large amount of money had already been drawn from the Treasury under the practice of the office, and doubting whether the court had gone beyond the mere question of distribution involved in the cause before it, and decided as to the law on which that practice was founded, I availed myself of the first case that arose to elicit the views of the Attorney General, both as to the effect of the decision of the court and the legality of the previous ruling of the office. He thoroughly investigated the whole subject, and gave a most lucid and convincing opinion on the law of the case; in which he came to the conclusion that soldiers or widows, who might have been entitled to pensions in their lifetime, but died without establishing their right or receiving the same, left no estate in their claims which could be inherited either by grandchildren or children; that arrears of pension, which alone, by the statute, were inheritable, only existed in cases where a pension had once been received, and, at the death of the pensioner, a portion was left unpaid; and that the Supreme Court, in the decision referred to, had not passed upon that question. In this opinion I concurred; and, as there was no law for the payment of pensions in such cases, and as no money could be drawn from the Treasury without a previous appropriation, any payment ordered by me would have been against law, and would have amounted to a naked act of legislation by an executive officer. I felt no hesitation, therefore, in ordering a discontinuance of the practice in question; and all the cases coming within it will be indefinitely suspended, unless Congress shall pass a law giving to children and grandchildren the pensions their deceased ancestors would have received had the proper proof been made out during their lifetime.

A pension is a bounty given by Government for meritorious personal service, and the first law granting pensions for revolutionary services confined the bounty to the indigent soldiers. But, whether this restriction be correct or not, it is self-evident that the great inducement, in all pension laws, is to relieve and compensate, in his own proper person, the self-sacrificing soldier, who risked his life, wasted his energies, and neglected his private affairs in the service of his country. The law has extended its beneficence from the soldier to his widow, and there it has stopped. If Congress shall take one step further, and provide for children and grandchildren on account of the services of their ancestors, the question arises, why take care of the children and grandchildren of those whose fortune it was to live till Congress had passed a pension act, and not of those, equally meritorious, who died in the service, or who dragged out a miserable existence, uncared for and unrecognized by the Government?

The children and grandchildren and great grandchildren should be contented in the rich inheritance derived from a glorious ancestry, in the liberties they enjoy, and in the institutions which give them protection. Congress has not been unmindful of our revolutionary heroes. It has dealt out to them with no sparing hand. Up to the 30th June, 1857, under the pension laws of 1818, 1828, and 1832, $43,011,960 had been paid to revolutionary soldiers; and under the acts of 1836, 1838, 1848, and 1853, $18,302,660 had been paid to the widows of our revolutionary soldiers—making an aggregate, in money, of $61,314,620, besides large donations of land and disbursements of money, under other laws, on account of revolutionary services.

The discriminations pointed out by the Commissioner of Pensions as existing between the invalid and half-pay pensions for the Army and the Navy, would seem to demand revision and correction by Congress. Some reorganization of the systems upon which those pensions are granted is desirable, not only because of the inadequacy of the lower rates to relieve the wants of those intended to be benefited, but because of the manifest propriety of making like provision for those of corresponding grades in the two arms of the service who may become disabled while in the faithful discharge of duty.

During the past year 41,483 warrants for bounty land have been issued, requiring, to satisfy them, 5,952,160 acres of the public domain; and the number issued under all the bounty land acts of Congress from the revolutionary war to the present time is 547,250, requiring, to satisfy them, 60,704,904 acres of land.

The frauds practiced upon the Pension office in attempts to procure, and in the actual procurement of land warrants, are numerous; but, owing to the short statutory limit of two years, the frauds are not discovered, and many guilty persons escape. I would, therefore, recommend an extension of the limit now made by the law for the prosecution of offenses of this kind.

The Commissioner of Pensions has called my attention, also, to the fact, that the forging of land warrants is rendered penal by no existing law. The extent to which this evil practice exists is not known, but the importance of some legislative action upon the subject is obvious, and I would respectfully recommend that Congress provide some law which may serve as a protection to the Government.

The report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings furnishes a detailed and satisfactory statement of the application of the appropriations placed under his more immediate direction.

The west wing of the Patent Office building is nearly completed throughout, and presents an elegant and tasteful appearance. The north front of the building is in the process of erection. Satisfactory contracts have been entered into for the granite and marble work; the sub-basement has been finished; and the contractors are pressing forward their operations with a commendable zeal. This portion of the building will be completed by the appropriations already made, and no estimate is now deemed necessary for the improvement and inclosure of the grounds around it.

An extraordinary flood, during the last winter, swept away several sections of the bridge across the Potomac. The authorities of the city of Washington repaired the breach, and the bridge has been otherwise placed in such condition as to make its passage safe. This, however, is a temporary arrangement, but it is the only one by which a convenient connection between the city of Washington and the shore of Virginia can be had at present. A permanent bridge across the Potomac is a necessity, and it is for Congress to determine its location and its character.

The District of Columbia has been set apart for the capital of the nation, and the relations of its people to the General Government are altogether anomalous. Without a representative in Congress, and with no voice in the election of their Chief Magistrate, so far as political rights are concerned its inhabitants occupy the attitude of a dependent people. But they are, nevertheless, American citizens, and, as such, have rights and interests which are dear to them, to guard which facilities should be afforded them, as to every other portion of our fellow-citizens, of making known their wants, through their own representative, to the only body clothed with the authority to supply them. There can be no just reason for the distinction which has heretofore prevailed—allowing a Territory, with a meager population, a delegate upon the floor of Congress, to make known its requirements and advocate its interests, and denying the same privilege to this District, with its seventy-five thousand inhabitants. It would be an act of justice to provide a seat on the floor of the House of Representatives for a delegate to be chosen by the people of the District of Columbia. Such an arrangement would remove a just ground of complaint, that they have no accredited organ by which their interests can be fairly and favorably brought to the consideration of Congress.

In the act to incorporate the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820, Congress invested the corporation with full power and authority to "lay and collect taxes;" "to erect and repair bridges;" "to open and keep in repair streets, avenues, lanes, alleys, drains, and sewers, agreeably to the plan of the city;" "to erect lamps, and to occupy and improve for public purposes, by and with the consent of the President of the United States, any part of the public and open spaces and squares in said city, not interfering with private rights."

In conferring these powers upon the corporation, Congress must have acted on the conviction that it was the duty of the city, and not of the General Government, to open and repair streets and avenues, as well as to make the other improvements indicated.

It is evident that the city authorities, acting under the influence of a city constituency familiar with the localities, and well informed as to the true interests and requirements of the people, are less liable to be misled in such matters by the representations of private interests than those whose attention is chiefly taken up with subjects of more general concern, and who are not supposed to be specially interested in the material advancement of the city.

It seems to be eminently proper, therefore, that these improvements should be made, in pursuance of the provisions of the charter, under the direction of the city authorities; and hence no estimates have been submitted thereto by this Department. Beyond the appropriations made by Congress for these objects, neither the Commissioner of Public Buildings nor the Secretary of the Interior has been intrusted with this duty. The law relieves this Department from the obligation, not unfrequently urged, of initiating plans and suggesting appropriations for the opening, improvement, and lighting of streets and avenues, and for the construction of drains and sewers in the city.

The Government, however, is a large real-estate proprietor in the city of Washington; and provision is made in the charter of incorporation by which the Commissioner of Public Buildings is directed to reimburse the corporation a just proportion of the expense incurred in opening and improving streets passing through and along public squares. This expense has been heretofore defrayed out of money arising from the sale of lots belonging to the Government; but this resource has now failed us, and an estimate has been submitted for an appropriation out of the national Treasury on that account.

The reservations owned by the United States within the city of Washington require to be improved by the General Government. Much attention has been bestowed upon these during the last few years, and several of them have been substantially inclosed and tastefully embellished. But while much has been accomplished, more remains to be done; and liberal appropriations might, with propriety, be made for the continuation of these improvements whenever the condition of the Treasury will admit of it.

The grounds around the Capitol are particularly commended to the favorable consideration of Congress, in the hope that early measures may be taken to relieve them of their present uncomely appearance. The time has come when some plan should be agreed upon for their extension; but how far they should be extended is a question to be determined by congressional action.

The auxiliary guard is a police force provided by the Government for the protection of property and the preservation of the peace within the city of Washington. Its members are paid from the public Treasury, through the Commissioner of Public Buildings, but derive their appointments from the Mayor of the city, to whom alone they are responsible for the faithful discharge of their duties. It is respectfully recommended that the law on this subject be so far amended as to require these appointments, before they can take effect, to be reported to and approved by some officer of the Government, either the Commissioner of Public Buildings or the Marshal of the District of Columbia, and to give such officer the power of removal from office whenever, in his opinion, the public good may render it necessary.

The reports of the superintendent and board of visitors of the Government hospital for the insane accompany this report. The number of patients in the hospital, July 1, 1856, was ninety-three. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, fifty-two were admitted, and thirty-five discharged, leaving in the institution, at the last-mentioned date, one hundred and ten, four of whom are independent or pay patients. This number exceeds the rated capacity of that part of the building now completed; but an appropriation has been made for the construction of the center building and three sections of the wings, according to the original plan adopted, which are in process of erection, and which will be pressed to completion with all proper dispatch and economy. When these portions of the building are finished, it is believed its capacity will be sufficient to meet all present demands for the accommodation of this unfortunate class of our people.

The institution is conducted with skill and fidelity, and reflects credit upon all who are concerned in its management.

At the last session of Congress, an act was passed incorporating the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf, Dumb, and Blind. In the charter of incorporation it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, whenever he is satisfied that "any deaf and dumb or blind person of teachable age, properly belonging to this District, is in indigent circumstances, and cannot command the means to secure an education," to authorize the said person to enter the said institution for instruction, and to pay for his or her maintenance and tuition therein, at the rate of $150 per annum. In pursuance of this provision of law, fourteen pupils have been placed in the institution.

The report of the president of the institution, which he is required to make annually, is herewith communicated. It exhibits the institution in rather a crippled condition. It is in debt, and it needs more land, better buildings, and a larger income to pay the teachers. It has fifteen pupils, fourteen of which are maintained by the Government. The charity is a noble one, but as it is not a Government institution, it is for Congress to determine whether further assistance shall be extended to it.

The report of the inspectors of the penitentiary, with the accompanying reports of the warden, clerk, physician, matron, and chaplain, are herewith submitted. They furnish a detailed account of the administration of the affairs of the penitentiary for the past year. The views expressed by the inspectors of the present working of the penitentiary, and their recommendations for its future improvement, are approved and commended to your favorable consideration.

The report of the engineer in charge of the construction of the bridge across the Potomac at Little Falls, exhibits the progress of that work, and the probability of its early completion. There have been unavoidable delays, which are explained, but the work, when finished, will be creditable alike to the engineer and the Government.

By a joint resolution of the last Congress, the duty was devolved upon this Department of distributing a portion of the journals and congressional documents to the public libraries, &c., previously distributed by the Department of State. As the resolution prescribed no rule by which the distribution should be made, it is proposed to send to each State copies in proportion to its Federal representation, and the distribution will be made on that basis, unless Congress shall otherwise direct. It is respectfully suggested that a law be passed for the future government of the Department in reference to this subject.

To this Department belongs the supervision of the accounts of marshals, district attorneys, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and no other branch of the public service is encompassed with greater difficulties in its administration. In some respects advantageous changes might be made, and additional legislation is recommended.

By the act of February 28, 1799, fees for services rendered by district attorneys in the performance of their duties were specifically prescribed, and in certain districts named an annual salary was provided, "as a full compensation for all extra services." All district attorneys, except the one in southern New York, now draw a salary, the greater part of them at the rate of, and none less than, two hundred dollars per annum. But the repeated applications for compensation for extra services by these officers is becoming a serious evil.

Some of the district attorneys assume that they are under no official obligation to render any service for the Government for which no fee is prescribed under existing laws, such as preparing a case for trial, procuring and examining witnesses, examining title to property purchased for the use of the United States; and they insist, as a matter of equity, if not of strict legal right, that they are entitled to compensation for all professional services, other than those specifically enumerated in the fee act, notwithstanding they receive a fixed compensation for all extra services, and the act itself declares, "no other compensation shall be taxed or allowed" than the fees therein prescribed.

I recommend an increase of the salaries of the respective district attorneys, graduated by some equitable rule, coupled with a provision devolving upon those officers the duty of faithfully performing all such services, in the line of their profession, as should be required of them in every case in which the interests of the Government are in any way involved, and declaring that the receipt of such salary shall operate as a full discharge of all claim on the part of the recipient for compensation for all services not enumerated in such fee bill as may at the time be in force.

Experience has demonstrated that a change may be made with propriety in the law providing for the appointment of clerks of the several United States courts.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

These officers are now appointed by the judges, to whom alone they are responsible for their official conduct. The law requires them, semi-annually, to make returns of their fees and emoluments. But in case of failure or refusal, this Department is powerless to enforce obedience, or to remove the delinquents. It can, however, withhold any money that may be due them by the United States, until they shall render their accounts. This is the whole extent of its power.

It is made the duty of this Department to restrict the expenditures of these officers within proper limits, although defrayed out of the proceeds of their offices; to allow no one clerk to retain of his fees and emoluments a sum exceeding three thousand five hundred dollars per annum, for his personal compensation; and to require him to pay into the Treasury of the United States, semi-annually, any surplus of the same. A duty is thus imposed upon the head of the Department, while he is clothed with no adequate authority to enforce a compliance with his orders and requirements. As an evidence of this, it is proper to state, that in order to answer a resolution adopted by the last House of Representatives, circulars, calling for the requisite information, were addressed to all these officers on the 1st of September last; and although proper commendation is due to those who replied promptly, yet fourteen in the States, and nineteen in the Territories, have wholly failed to respond thereto. Some remedy for this state of things should be provided, and it is respectfully suggested, as the most effectual, to change the tenure of the office, so as to require all clerks of all the courts to be appointed in the same manner as marshals and district attorneys.

Clerks of courts, in many cases, are appointed and act as United States commissioners. This practice, it is believed, adds largely to the expenses of that branch of the public service, especially in the large cities, where it becomes necessary, in the absence of the clerk, to employ an additional number of deputies in his office. This evil requires correction at the hands of Congress.

The clerk of the Supreme Court cannot, by the received construction of the law, be required to make a return of the fees and emoluments of his office, nor is his compensation limited; yet the policy and spirit of the law includes this officer, as well as the clerks of the circuit and district courts. If the existing law be wise and ought to be maintained, then no valid reasons exist why this officer should be made an exception.

The late Attorney General gave an opinion that a clerk was a "collecting agent of the Government, and should be held to account for all the fees of his office, received or receivable, deducting therefrom the maximum allowed by law." Now, although the clerk or other officer may earn a large surplus, still one half of the maximum may not have been actually received. And, notwithstanding the fact that they are legally powerless in some cases to collect their earnings, they are positively required to pay into the Treasury, with each semi-annual return, any surplus which the same exhibits. The officers claim, generally, that they have a right to retain the compensation to which they are entitled, and that they are not in a position to retain it until it is actually collected, which leads to much difficulty.

To remedy this, it is suggested that all clerks and marshals in the respective States and Territories, and in the District of Columbia, be explicitly authorized to demand the payment of their fees, or take security therefor, when they are not properly chargeable to the United States, in advance of the rendition of all official services.

During the last session of Congress an appropriation of $100,000 was made for the erection of a court-house in the city of Boston. This was construed not to authorize this Department to purchase a building, however suitable for the purpose. The Masonic Temple, conveniently situated in the business part of that city, was offered to the Department for $105,000. The proposition was accepted, subject to the approval of Congress; and an estimate has been submitted covering the expenditure.

The fourth section of the act of 26th February last, authorizing the people of Minnesota "to form a constitution and State government," made it the duty of the United States marshal for said Territory "to take a census, or enumeration, of the inhabitants within the limits of the proposed State, under such rules and regulations as should be prescribed therefor by the Secretary of the Interior, with the view of ascertaining the number of Representatives to which said State may be entitled in the Congress of the United States."

The necessary instructions have been issued to enable the marshal to perform that duty, and an appropriation will be asked, as soon as full returns of his operations have been received, to defray the expenses he has thus been directed to incur—no provision therefor having yet been made.

By an act of the last Congress, this Department was charged with the construction of the following wagon roads: one from Fort Kearny, Nebraska, by way of the South Pass, to the eastern boundary of California, near Honey Lake; one from El Paso, on the Rio Grande, to Fort Yuma, at the mouth of the Gila river; and one from the Platte river, via the Omaha reserve and Dacotah City, to the Running Water river.

Provision had been previously made for opening a road from Fort Ridgely, Minnesota, to the South Pass, and operations had been commenced thereon under instructions from my predecessor.

Work has been commenced on all these roads, and measures have been taken for its vigorous prosecution. The obvious design of Congress, in these appropriations, was to locate and open roads which should meet present emergencies and the demands of emigration, and not to introduce a system of improvements which would require other and larger appropriations to be made, from year to year, for their completion. With this view, and to secure the speedy and economical construction of these great and extended thoroughfares, it was deemed expedient to appoint a superintendent, and organize a suitable corps of operatives on each road. Each superintendent was instructed to pass over the entire length of the section of the route assigned him, locating it on the most direct and advantageous ground, and opening and improving it in such a manner as to admit of the easy passage of a loaded wagon.

The immediate direction of the movements of these several parties was placed by me in charge of a gentleman of experience; and so soon as full information of the operations of the past season is received, I will cause him to make a detailed report of their progress, for the purpose of laying it before Congress.

The Fort Ridgely and South Pass road has already been opened as far west as the Missouri river, a distance of about two hundred and fifty miles, and the country through which it runs is reported to be a rich and desirable one for settlement. The appropriation for this work has, however, been exhausted, although some four hundred and fifty miles remain to be completed. To finish this portion of the road, should it be the pleasure of Congress to carry out its original design, an additional appropriation of $30,000 will be required, and it should be made at an early day.

The joint commission for running and marking the boundary between the United States and Mexico, under the treaty of December 30, 1853, concluded its labors and adjourned on October 1st; and the commissioner on our part has turned over to this Department the maps, (with one or two exceptions, which are in the hands of the engraver,) journals, astronomical determinations, and other public property in his possession.

Of the report, heretofore ordered by Congress to be printed, the first volume is completed, and will be ready for distribution early in January. The second volume, or appendix, which contains the reports upon the zoology and botany of the region surveyed, is still incomplete. The engraved plates to illustrate this part of the work are in the custody of this Department, so far as they are completed.

During the last Congress, the Senate, by resolution, ordered the printing of five thousand extra copies of the report proper and accompanying maps, and two thousand extra copies of the second volume, or appendix, to be paid for out of the fund appropriated for running the boundary. The execution of this order will cost from thirty-five to forty thousand dollars. The resolution of the Senate, without the concurrence of the House of Representatives and the President, will not furnish to this Department a sufficient warrant to justify the payment of these expenses out of the fund designated.

By the fourteenth section of the act approved March 3, 1837, the Commissioner of Patents is required annually, in the month of January, to make a report to Congress, detailing the operations of his bureau. This law was enacted while the office was under the supervision of the Secretary of State; and as it was not required of him to make an annual report, it was deemed more convenient, without doubt, for the Commissioner to report directly to Congress. The act approved March 3, 1849, transferred the supervisory and appellate powers in relation to the acts of the Commissioner of Patents, previously exercised by the Secretary of State, to the Secretary of the Interior. All the other bureaus of the Department make annual reports to the Secretary, to be laid before the President, and by him communicated to Congress; but, in the case of the Commissioner of Patents, while the rules and regulations for the management of his office, his acts, and the conduct of all those under his immediate supervision, are subject to the control of the Secretary, and, through him, of the President, yet the annual report required of him is not, in any way, under existing law, open to the revision of either. There is nothing in the peculiar nature of the subjects or duties pertaining to that bureau which makes this exception necessary; and as the reason for the law has ceased to exist, it might be changed with propriety.

From the 1st of January to the 30th of September, 1857, 4,095 applications for patents have been received, and 820 caveats filed; 2,066 patents have been issued, and 2,287 applications rejected.

The receipts for the three quarters ending 30th September, 1857, were $161,415 97. The expenditures were $163,942 04. Excess of expenditures over receipts, $2,526 07.

The policy indicated in the law establishing the Patent Office is, that it should be a self-sustaining bureau. This policy is a sound one, and should be observed.

The law now authorizes a return, upon the rejection of an application, of two thirds of the fee required to be deposited by the applicant on presenting his claim. Of the $163,942 04 expended during the last three quarters, $27,939 99 was made up of fees restored to applicants, after the labor of examining their cases had been performed. There seems to be neither justice nor expediency in this requirement. Its consequence has been to bring into the office a large amount of business, frivolous in its character, and which seems, in fact, obtruded but as an experiment upon its credulity. If it is desired that this bureau should be, as heretofore, supported by its own earnings, this feature of the financial administration of the office should be revised and reformed.

By the ninth section of the act approved July 4, 1836, the applicant for a patent, if a subject of the King of Great Britain, was required to pay a fee of $500. At that time, an American citizen applying for a patent in that kingdom was required to pay a fee of £100. But recently the English Government has reduced the fee required of an American citizen from £100 to £20. As the fee originally required seems to have been determined on a principle of retaliation, it is proper and becoming in our Government to respond to the liberal policy shown by Great Britain toward our citizens, by reducing the fee in such cases to $100.

The existing law authorizes an appeal from the decision of the Commissioner to either of the judges of the circuit court for the District of Columbia. This law is an anomaly in our legislation. It confounds the executive and judicial departments, which the genius of our institutions requires should be kept separate and distinct from each other. Its violation of principle is not a more serious difficulty than its practical operation. The appellant not only selects the judge who shall try the case, but also pays the fee of twenty-five dollars allowed him. The amount of compensation thus received will depend upon the number of cases brought before him; that number will inevitably be influenced by his course of decision. The judge is thus placed in a position of embarrassment, if not of humiliation, alike to be deplored by himself and the country.

This law should be repealed, and some other system substituted, which will put this office in a position of independence in its executive action, and at the same time secure all the rights of inventors. The most feasible plan yet suggested to effect this is, in my judgment, to authorize the creation of a permanent board of review, to consist of three members, selected from the examiners of the office, and who shall be known as examiners in chief. This board shall be charged with the duty of hearing and determining upon all appeals from the judgment of the primary examiners, except in cases of appeal where any of these may have previously formed and expressed an opinion; in which case another examiner may be substituted to act in his stead; and then their judgment and action will be subject to the supervision and review of the Commissioner. This alteration of existing law must necessarily increase the efficiency of the office, and at the same time secure uniformity and certainty in its rules of action. And while the inventor will be saved from vexatious delays, and heavy costs to judges and counsel, he must feel satisfied that, in the provision made for the thorough examination of his application by the examiner in the first instance, then by the board of examiners in chief, and lastly by the Commissioner, he has secured to him the amplest opportunity for the establishment of his rights.

The activity and success of the inventive genius of the country, the limited circumstances of this worthy class of our fellow-citizens, who are badly prepared to brook delay or expense in the prosecution of their claims, the rapid enlargement and growing importance of this branch of business, and the fact that this office asks nothing from the national Treasury, but only seeks such an organization of its internal machinery as will place this branch of the public service upon the most efficient footing, justify an earnest invocation of the attention of Congress to the wants of this office.

The agricultural division of this office is growing in popularity with the country and increasing in usefulness. It may be well questioned whether any other expenditure of the public money has ever proved so largely remunerative and so beneficial in its influences. The crop of Chinese and African sugar cane alone, for the present year, will more than compensate for the money heretofore expended in this behalf.

Measures have been taken for the establishment of a more satisfactory system for the distribution of seeds; the introduction of the tea plant; the collection of the seed and cuttings of the native grape vines with the view of testing their value for the manufacture of wine; the investigation of the nature and habits of the insects that infest the cotton plant, with a view of ascertaining whether some plan can be devised for the protection of the cotton planter; and for the chemical analysis of various plants and soils.

The cases required by the act of March 3, 1857, to be constructed in the hall of the Smithsonian Institution for the reception of the collections of the exploring expeditions and other objects of curiosity and interest, now in the main hall of the Patent Office building, have been contracted for, and sufficient progress has been made to warrant the belief that the removal can be made before the expiration of the current fiscal year. The object of the transfer of these collections to the Smithsonian Institution evidently was to relieve the Patent Office from the responsibility and trouble of their custody; the force, therefore, heretofore employed to take care of them will then be no longer needed by this office, and no estimate has been submitted for that purpose.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Interior.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Report of the Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
December 1, 1857.

SIR: Since entering on the administration of the Post Office Department, I have ventured on no new theories, nor attempted any innovations on the well-tried system established and practiced upon by my predecessors: I have contented myself with endeavoring, as far as in my power, to perfect existing arrangements, and extend its facilities equally and fairly to every portion of our widely-extended country. In examining its present condition, it is worthy of observation that, while the total number of post offices created during the twenty years from 1827 to 1847 was but 8,146, the number established in just half that length of time, from 1847 to 1857, was 11,444. On the 30th of June, 1827, the whole number of post offices in the United States was 7,000; in 1837, 11,767; in 1847, 15,146; and on the 30th of June, 1857, 26,586. During the last fiscal year there have been 1,725 offices established and 704 discontinued, being a net increase of 1,021. The number of postmasters appointed during the year was 8,680. Of these appointments 4,767 were to fill vacancies occasioned by resignation; 1,681 by removal; 238 by death; 269 by change of names and sites; and 1,725 by the establishment of new offices. The total number of offices at this time is 27,148, of which 368 are of the class denominated presidential, their incumbents being subject to appointment by the President and Senate. The commissions of the higher class run four years from the date of confirmation, but those of the lower are not limited.

TRANSPORTATION STATISTICS.

On the 30th of June last, there were in operation 7,888 mail routes. The number of contractors was 6,576. The length of these routes is estimated at 242,601 miles, divided as follows:

Railroad..... 22,530 miles.
Steamboat..... 15,245 "
Coach..... 49,329 "
Inferior grades..... 155,497 "

The total annual transportation of mails was 74,906,067 miles, costing $6,622,046, and divided as follows:

Railroad, 24,267,944 miles, at $2,559,847—about ten cents and five mills a mile.

Steamboat, 4,518,119 miles, at $991,998—about twenty-two cents a mile.

Coach, 19,090,930 miles, at $1,410,826—about seven cents and four mills a mile.

Inferior grades, 27,029,074 miles, at $1,659,375—about six cents a mile.

Compared with the service reported on the 30th of June, 1856, there is an addition of 2,959 miles to the length of mail routes; 3,598,170 miles to the total annual transportation—being about five per cent.; and of $586,572 to the cost, or nine and seven tenths per cent.

The aggregate length of railroad routes has been increased 2,207 miles, and the annual transportation thereon 2,458,648 miles—eleven and two tenths per cent.; at a cost of $249,458, or eleven and eight tenths per cent.

The length of steamboat routes is greater by 294 miles, and the annual transportation by 277,949 miles, costing $131,243 additional, or six and a half per cent. on transportation, and fifteen and two tenths per cent. on the cost.

The expense for this species of service was increased, in one case alone, $28,200, without any additional service, that is, owing to the failure of the contractor on the New Orleans and Key West route. By act of Congress, $7,200 additional was also allowed between Bainbridge, Georgia, and Appalachicola, Florida, without additional service. A route was put in operation on the Missouri river, on the 1st of June last, at $85,000 per annum, including side mails by horse or coach, and regular land service during the suspension of navigation. Steamboat contracts were also made between Paducah, Kentucky, and Cairo, Illinois, at $6,000 per annum; and between Columbus and Bay Port, Florida, at $7,000; and a fourth weekly trip commenced between New Orleans and St. Francisville, at $8,323. On the other hand, a reduction of $15,719 per annum was effected by discontinuing service between Chattanooga, Tennessee, and Decatur, Alabama, and curtailing the Nashville and Memphis route so as to end at Cairo, Illinois. Such are the more prominent changes in the steamboat service.

The length of the coach routes has been reduced 1,124 miles, and the annual transportation 24,061 miles; while the expense has been increased $70,470, or about five and a quarter per cent., ($10,000 less than would appear from comparing the cost on 30th June last with that reported on 30th June, 1856, the latter having been short stated by that amount.)

In the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Ohio, where new contracts took effect on 1st July, 1856, the length of coach routes was decreased 505 miles, and the annual transportation 228,976 miles, at an increased cost of $24,752. At the same time the railroad service and cost in those States were largely increased—907 miles in length of routes, and $119,208 in the cost.

In the New England States, during the past year, the coach transportation was slightly decreased, but the cost increased $11,264—the amount allowed by Congress to a failing contractor.

In Missouri there is a seeming reduction of coach service of 1,366 miles in length of routes, 137,960 miles annual transportation, and $43,174 in cost; but it must be noted that the Missouri river contract, above referred to, absorbed much coach service, which, to a great extent, will continue as such, although, under the circumstances, unavoidably reported under the head of steamboat transportation.

In Tennessee there is a disproportion between the miles and cost of coach service, the cost only being increased. This is accounted for by an allowance for expediting in the gap between the Virginia and Tennessee and the East Tennessee and Virginia railroads, and other changes.

In other States there have been no changes requiring special notice. In some there have been reductions; but in most of them the coach service has been somewhat increased.

There is nothing of note in connection with the California, Oregon, New Mexico, Nebraska, and Kansas routes.

The cost of the Utah routes was increased $17,500 by the allowance of that additional pay, under an act of Congress, without any increased service, on the route between Salt Lake and San Pedro.

The additional length of inferior routes is only 1,582 miles, owing partly to the fact that during the year ending 30th June last, comparatively little new service of this description was put in operation. The large increase of such service reported 30th June, 1856, arose from new routes established by Congress, amounting to nearly 6,000 miles, in the northwestern and southwestern sections alone, and from other extraordinary service.

The increased cost over that of 30th June, 1856, ($124,401,) may be explained by the additional expense under the new contracts commencing July 1, 1856, in the middle section of the Union, ($63,533,) while there was a decrease in the length of routes of this grade; and the allowance of $17,500 on the Salt Lake and San Pedro route, without additional service, must also be taken into account.

As already stated, the extension of railroad service has been very great; and in order to exhibit this more plainly, the increase is given separately in five geographical sections, as follows:

States.	Additional cost.	Additional miles of transportation.	Additional miles of route.
New England.....	$11,149	26,123	137
New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Ohio.....	119,208	1,257,075	907
Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.....	19,890	171,078	184
Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin.....	71,267	650,088	586
Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana.....	27,935	354,234	393
Total.....	249,458	2,458,648	2,207

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Postmaster General.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

The following table shows the new service as in operation on the 30th September:

Conveyance.	Miles in length.	Miles of annual transportation.	Cost.
Railroad.....	6,413	7,099,505	$718,840
Steamboat.....	770	474,608	27,348
Coach.....	9,967	4,604,426	208,468
Inferior modes.....	10,258	3,276,073	144,093
Total.....	27,408	15,454,612	$1,098,749

Compared with the service on 30th June last, there appears to be a decrease of 791 miles in the length of routes, and 823,034 miles in the annual transportation, while the cost is increased $120,044.

In New England the annual transportation by railroad is decreased 885,876 miles; but this is more nominal than real, owing to the fact that a great portion of this grade of service in that section has heretofore been stated at twelve trips a week, the contracts requiring the conveyance of mails as often as the cars run, while really but six trips were performed. Now, however, the service is reported as actually existing, and there is no reduction of mail facilities.

The cost is increased $61,041.

Steamboat transportation is increased 147,784 miles, at a cost of $13,918.

Coach transportation is decreased 320,474 miles, but the expense increased $5,074.

Inferior grades of service are increased 360,925 miles in annual transportation, and $22,405 in cost.

In New York the railroad transportation is increased 293,328 miles, at a cost of $10,268. Steamboat service decreased 161,664 miles, at a decreased cost of $7,501. Coach service decreased 143,384 miles, but the cost increased $12,642. Inferior service decreased 113,673 miles, and cost increased $2,197.

On the 30th of June last there were in service 406 route agents, at a compensation of $310,900; 45 local agents, at $28,488; and 1,335 mail messengers, at $160,425; making a total of $499,813. This amount, with the increased cost of service commencing the 1st of July, under new contracts, ($120,044,) added to the cost of service as in operation on the 30th June last, ($6,622,046,) makes the total amount for the current year $7,241,903.

This is independent of the cost of ocean mail service.

There should also be added the estimated cost of improvements made since 1st July last (including the San Antonio and San Diego route,) $587,825.

I have caused to be put in operation a steamship route, twice a month, between San Francisco and Olympia, and a weekly line on Puget Sound.

Also, a tri-weekly steamboat line between Napoleon and Pine Bluff, Arkansas; and a semi-weekly line between Napoleon and Vicksburg; besides the daily mail on the Missouri river, already referred to, viz., from Jefferson City to St. Joseph.

The overland route from San Antonio, Texas, to San Diego, California, has also been successfully commenced.

I have also made a contract for conveying mails six times a week between Prairie du Chien and St. Paul, in coaches or sleighs, as the case may be, during the suspension of navigation on the Upper Mississippi.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURES.

The comprehensive report of the Auditor, heretofore appended, will be found to contain a mass of statistics skillfully prepared, and so judiciously arranged as to present with clearness and precision the financial operations of the Department, in their various branches, during the past fiscal year.

The expenditures of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, including payments to letter carriers and for foreign postages, amounted to $11,508,057 93, viz:

Compensation to postmasters.....	$2,285,609 86
Ship, steamboat, and way letters.....	17,594 76
Transportation, including foreign mails.....	7,239,333 27
Wrapping paper.....	52,120 78
Office furniture, for post offices.....	3,978 26
Advertising.....	75,106 37
Mail bags.....	65,219 21

Blanks.....	$117,170 87
Mail locks, keys, and stamps.....	12,287 50
Mail depredations and special agents.....	65,228 25
Clerks for offices—post offices.....	834,025 60
Postage stamps.....	30,638 80
Stamped envelopes.....	63,597 74
Payments to letter carriers.....	154,710 51
Repayments for "dead letters".....	41 84
Miscellaneous payments.....	189,107 99
Payments for balances on British mails.....	297,098 88
Payments for balances on Bremen mails.....	5,187 44
	$11,508,057 93

If to the expenditures of the year, as stated, there be added the sum of $734 16 lost by compromising debts under the third section of the act of March 3, 1851, and if the sum of $1,121 93 gained by small balances carried to "suspense account" be deducted, the net expenditures for the year will be $11,507,670 16.

The gross revenue for the year 1857, including receipts from letter carriers and from foreign postages, amounted to $7,353,951 76, viz.:

Letter postage.....	$983,207 24
Stamps sold.....	5,447,764 51
Newspapers and pamphlets.....	634,863 51
Registered letters.....	35,876 87
Fines.....	15 00
Receipts on account of emoluments.....	79,351 00
Receipts on account of letter carriers.....	154,710 51
Receipts on account of dead letters.....	6,756 57
Extra compensation overcharged.....	1,667 30
Miscellaneous receipts.....	9,739 25
	$7,353,951 76

But if to the gross sum above stated be added the permanent annual appropriations made by the acts of March 3, 1847, and March 3, 1851, in compensation for services rendered to the Government in the transportation and delivery of franked matter, the whole revenue of the year will be $8,053,951 76, being $3,453,718 40 less than the expenditures.

ESTIMATES OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES IN 1858.

The aggregate sum appropriated by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1857, for the regular expenditures of the year ending June 30, 1858, exclusive of the transportation of foreign mails, of payments for foreign postages and to letter carriers, was.....	$11,173,247
For Panama mails, act of March 3, 1857.....	135,000
For Charleston and Havana mail, act of March 3, 1857.....	50,000
For the transportation of the mails between New York and Havre, and New York and Bremen, under the new contracts authorized by the acts of March 3, 1845, and July 2, 1836, there will be required the sum of.....	230,000
For payments to letter carriers, act of March 3, 1851, estimated.....	165,000
Payments for foreign postages, estimated.....	300,000
Total.....	$12,053,247

The means applicable to defray the foregoing expenditures consist of—

1st. The balance standing to the credit of the Department on the Auditor's books on the 1st July, 1857.....	$1,163,886
2d. The estimated gross revenue of 1858, including foreign postages and receipts from letter carriers.....	7,795,188
3d. Balances of appropriations made by Congress remaining in the Treasury subject to requisition.....	1,625,000 to be appropriated from the Treasury to defray the expenditures of the year 1858, as they have been authorized by law.

Leaving the sum of.....$1,469,173

In the foregoing statement I have not embraced the cases in which Congress has by law directed particular services and made special appropriations for them out of the Treasury, such as the transportation of the mail by sea between San Francisco, California, and Olympia, Washington Territory, between New Orleans and Vera Cruz, Mexico, and for the mail on Puget Sound, Washington Territory, because the means are supplied by the Treasury upon the Postmaster General's requisitions; and if they were embraced as matters of receipt and expenditure, the resulting balance to be provided for would still be the same.

MONEY ORDERS.

The adoption of some plan for the more convenient and safe remittance of small sums of money through the mails by means of orders drawn upon one postmaster by another, having been frequently urged upon this Department as a matter worthy of its attention, it is deemed proper here to state that, on the 31st January last, my predecessor transmitted to the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the House of Representatives, in compliance with his request, the outline of such a plan as might be put in operation in this country. The submission of it does not appear to have been accompanied by any recommendation of the Department, nor does it appear that the honorable committee acted upon the subject. A system of remitting sums of money not exceeding five pounds sterling (twenty-five dollars) in amount was adopted by the British Post Office Department in 1839; and some idea may be formed of the growth and extent of its operations from the following brief statement derived from the annual report of her Majesty's Postmaster General, dated March 17, 1857:

Number and amount of money orders issued in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, every fifth year, commencing with 1840.

Year ending—	Number of orders issued in sums not exceeding £5 sterling.	Aggregate amount in pounds sterling.
January 5, 1840.....	188,921	£ 313,124
January 5, 1845.....	2,806,803	5,695,395
December 31, 1850.....	4,439,713	8,404,498
December 31, 1855.....	5,807,412	11,009,279
December 31, 1856.....	6,178,982	11,805,562

OCEAN STEAMSHIP AND FOREIGN MAIL ARRANGEMENTS.

The contract with the Ocean Steam Navigation Company for monthly trips between New York and Bremen, and New York and Havre, via Southampton, expiring on the 1st of June last, it became necessary to make some arrangements for the continuance of that service, or leave the carrying of the European mails almost exclusively to the lines running between Boston and Liverpool and New York and Liverpool, on which twenty only of the seventy-two annual voyages are performed by American steamers. The Bremen and Havre lines having, under the sanction of Congress, been in operation ten years, affording direct communication between the United States and the continent of Europe, and it not appearing by its action at the last session that it was the intention of Congress that they should be discontinued on the expiration of the contract, I deemed it my duty to make provision for their continuance another year. This seemed proper, in view not only of the importance of keeping up, and, if possible, increasing the direct communication with the continent, in order to avoid the expense of the English transit, but also for the reason that I had official information of the intention of a Bremen company to put on a line of semi-monthly steamers, so as, in connection with an increased American line, to secure a weekly communication with the United States. In the mean time Congress may take action on the subject. Under the old contract, the annual compensation for twelve round trips on the Bremen line was $200,000; and on the Havre line, for the same number of trips, $150,000. The temporary contract for the service on the Bremen line is with Cornelius Vanderbilt, and upon the Havre line with the New York and Havre Steamship Company. Each contract provides for thirteen round trips annually; and the compensation to be paid is limited to the United States postages, sea and inland, accruing from the mails conveyed. This, it will be observed, is a very considerable reduction upon the former pay, assuming that the postages for the year will be nearly the same as for the year ending 30th June last, when on the Bremen line they amounted to $124,193, and on the Havre line to $90,042. Moreover, it appeared to be a fit occasion to inaugurate a system of self-sustaining ocean mail service; and I shall esteem it fortunate if the present temporary arrangements lead, as I trust they may, to the adoption of this as a permanent system.

A contract has been made with the Panama Railroad Company for the conveyance of the mails, as frequently as may be required, between Aspinwall and Panama, at an annual compensation of $100,000. It took effect on the 1st day of April last, and is to continue until the 1st of October, 1859, the date of expiration of the contract for the connecting lines from New York and New Orleans to Aspinwall. Prior to the 1st of April last, the price of the isthmus service was regulated by the weight of the mails, the law authorizing the payment of twenty-two cents a pound; and at that rate the cost of the service for the year ended 31st March last was $160,321, being $60,321 a year more than is now paid under the contract.

Report of the Postmaster General.

The original contractors on the New Orleans and Vera Cruz line having abandoned the service, I made a temporary contract with Mr. C. K. Garrison for semi-monthly trips on the line at $1,210 93 the voyage, or $29,062 32 a year. This is the same rate of compensation paid the old contractors, who, although their contract called for three trips a month, never performed but two. The present contract will expire on the 30th June next, the date fixed for the expiration of the original contract.

By its terms, the contract with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, for semi-monthly service from Astoria, by San Francisco, &c., to Panama, expires on the 1st of October, 1858, while, under the decision of the Navy Department, the contract of the connecting lines on this side runs until 1st October, 1859. Therefore, to keep up the connection with the Pacific line, as provided by law, and as originally contemplated, it will be necessary to extend the contract on the Pacific one year; and as the Pacific Mail Steamship Company have performed their service generally in a highly creditable and satisfactory manner, I cheerfully recommend an appropriation for such extension.

The aggregate amount of postages (sea, inland, and foreign) on mails transported during the year by the steamers of the New York and Liverpool (Collins) line was $210,463 03, which is a heavy decrease as compared with the amount ($461,575 94) of the previous fiscal year. It should be observed, however, that the additional allowance to this line, authorized by the act of 21st July, 1852, having been terminated on the 20th of February, 1857, and six yearly trips dispensed with from and after that date, twenty round trips only, instead of twenty-six, as formerly, were performed during the year.

The postages upon mails conveyed by the New York and Bremen line were $137,754 78, and by the New York and Havre line $97,950 05; being a decrease of $5,491 74 by the Bremen, owing to the fact that much of the time there have been several foreign steamers running and carrying ship letters on this line; and an increase of $2,125 02 by the Havre line, as compared with the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1856.

The amount of letter postages upon mails exchanged during the year with Great Britain was $374,194 75; Prussia, $326,872 57; Bremen, $52,082 99; France, (from 1st April to 30th June, 1857), $41,189 19; Hamburg, $1,059 60; being a decrease on British mails of $23,453 95, on Bremen mails of $3,706 86, and an increase on Prussian closed mails of $27,406 86, compared with the preceding year.

Of the amount of postages on mails exchanged with Great Britain, $574,194 75 was collected in the United States, and $300,133 30 in Great Britain; the excess of United States and British postages thus collected in the United States being $274,061 45. In like manner, an excess of $95,397 95 of the postages upon mails exchanged with Prussia, and of $32,494 15 on mails exchanged with Bremen, was collected in this country.

The gross amount of United States postage, sea and inland, on mails transported during the year, was:

By the Collins line, (20 round trips,)..... $189,456 61
By the Bremen line, (12 round trips,)..... 124,193 81
By the Havre line, (12 round trips,)..... 90,042 47
The ocean postage upon mails conveyed by the Collins line amounted to..... $154,545 93
By the Bremen line..... 84,231 19
By the Havre line..... 73,716 37

The following statistics will exhibit the operation of the United States and British postal treaty during the last four years:

It will be seen that the excess of British postage alone collected in the United States is very considerable, amounting the last year to $193,287 47. This, as explained in previous reports, results disadvantageously to this Department, inasmuch as its postmasters are paid commissions for collecting. Its expenses the last year on this account have been not less than $75,000. The large increase in the excess of last year arises mainly from the circumstance that nearly two thirds of the transatlantic mails have been conveyed by the Cunard line of British mail packets, and, when thus conveyed, nearly four fifths of the postage goes to the British Government, saying nothing of the still greater proportion it receives on mails so conveyed for countries beyond England. In the final settlement, too, it will be observed that the balance is every year largely against the United States; and that, for the year ending 30th June last, it reached the sum of $264,918. A part of this, however, to wit: $43,501, has been received back in the balance paid to the United States, on final adjustment, by the Prussian office, thus reducing our indebtedness to $221,417. Under the arrangement with Prussia, the balance is in favor of this Department, because the United States provides for the ocean as well as British transit conveyance of the Prussian closed mails; but the general balance must continue to be largely against the United States while so great a proportion of the mails are conveyed by British packets. Whether it is more desirable to be subject to this outlay for the transmission of our mails abroad than to incur probably a still greater expense in fully providing our own means of ocean transportation, is for the wisdom of Congress to determine. If, fortunately, as before suggested, our steamship companies, aided by receipts from passengers and merchandise, shall find sufficient encouragement to establish lines of steamers, and carry the mails for the postages thereon, it will be a great point gained. On this principle, were it practicable, I would be pleased not only to see the number of trips increased upon existing lines, particularly to the continent, but all the lines put in operation which have been, or may be, projected by our enterprising citizens. Among these are the proposed lines from Norfolk to Milford Haven; from New Orleans to Bordeaux; from New York to Antwerp, Hamburg, or Gluckstadt; from Savannah to Para, in South America; from Panama to Valparaiso, &c. This whole subject is worthy the serious consideration of Congress; and I venture to hope that such action may be taken upon it, at an early day, as that the Department may clearly understand its duty in the premises. Whether the present lines are to be continued, and the trips increased, on the expiration of the contracts, or new ones established, at a cost, in each instance, exceeding what they may earn in postages, and, if so, at what expense in each case, I respectfully submit to Congress to decide.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Postmaster General.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

A postal convention has been concluded between the United States and France, having been signed on the part of the United States by my immediate predecessor, and on the part of France by the French Minister, on the 2d of March last, and has been in operation since the 1st of April. The rate of postage for letters of the weight of one quarter ounce or under is fifteen cents, irrespective of the route, whether through England or direct, by which they are conveyed. France accounts to Great Britain for the British sea and transit postage, as explained in the articles of agreement hereto annexed. This is the first postal convention between the two countries.

A postal convention has also been concluded with the Hansatic Republic of Hamburg, similar in all respects to that existing between the United States and Bremen—the rates of postage under both being the same. It was finally executed in June last, and went into effect on the 1st of July. The articles are annexed.

Negotiations are pending for a radical change of our postal arrangements with Great Britain; but as the proposition of the British office, in its present shape, cannot be acceded to, and as it involves, also, a preliminary agreement requiring the sanction of the treaty-making Powers, definite action upon it has been necessarily postponed for the present.

CITY POSTS.

With the view to facilitate the receipt and delivery of letters in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, the postmasters in those cities have been instructed to make improvements in their letter-carrier system to the full extent authorized by law. In New York, I found that nearly everything had been done that could be accomplished under existing laws, except the transmission of drop letters direct to their address without going into the main office, which is now done. Six stations, or sub-offices, had been established, at which, as well as at the principal office, the letters were sorted and passed into the hands of the carriers, and a large number of boxes for the collection of letters had been placed at convenient distances throughout the city. On all letters through the mail the carriers receive two cents each for delivery, and on drop letters one cent. I had hoped to be able to reduce the delivery fee to the uniform price of one cent; but this was found impracticable in New York and Philadelphia, inasmuch as the law requires that the entire cost of delivery shall be defrayed out of the carriers' receipts. In Boston, where the districts are all comparatively densely populated, one cent a letter is made to pay. The postage on drop letters, including the carrier's fee, is now two cents; and upon the improved plan now adopted for their delivery direct from the main office, or the nearest station, as the case may be, it is believed that the public convenience will be fully subserved. In each of these cities there are to be from four to six deliveries a day; and the letters for mailing, &c., are to be collected and disposed of as frequently as occasion may require. I do not feel at liberty to advise the free delivery of letters by carriers; but I would recommend a modification of the present law, so as to give the Postmaster General authority to have the delivery made at one cent a letter, whether the carrier's receipts are sufficient to meet expenses or not. If the improved system is found to work satisfactorily in the three cities above mentioned, it is my purpose to extend it to all the other principal cities in the United States.

EXPRESS AGENTS.

One of the prominent subjects which have demanded my attention is that of providing more effectually for the regularity and safety of mails conveyed on railroads. Owing to the large number of separate bags on the great through lines, the frequent changes of cars, and the brief time allowed, in most cases, for that purpose, great care is necessary to guard against mistakes and losses. This is more especially important to the letter-mail pouches, which are exchanged between the principal cities and towns having railroad connections in all sections of the country, however remote. In order that they may receive due attention at all points, agents of this Department are required, and also a regular system of accountability for the performance of their duties. The beginning of such a system was made by my immediate predecessor, and my aim has been to extend and improve it as much as possible. Its main features are, briefly, as follows: In the post office at the end of each separate route, as apporportioned to mail agents, (say Washington and Philadelphia,) and at the prominent intermediate points, lists are kept, showing the pouches forwarded; which lists are receipted by the route or mail agent, who thus becomes directly responsible for a certain number of pouches for certain specified points. Upon delivering the same into post offices, to mail messengers, or to an agent on a connecting route, he takes receipts to show the fulfillment of his duties. In addition, it is required, on some routes, that full and careful accounts be kept, in book form, of all pouches, so as to show where they are received, how labeled, and how disposed of. By such means it becomes practicable to trace missing pouches, and there is also kept alive a sense of responsibility on the part of agents, impelling them to greater watchfulness in performing duties which, from their laborious and monotonous nature, might otherwise insensibly become, in a measure, mechanical, and not occupy so much of the mind as their importance demands. Moreover, all irregularities in any way chargeable to agents can be traced to their true source, so that suspicion in no case attaches to innocent parties. For such reasons, apart from an interest in the service generally, which is presumed to be felt by all agents of the Department, the system in question has commended itself favorably to all who have been called on to give it attention. Its details are not yet perfected; but it is regarded as the beginning of a work which must be gradually advanced and improved, under the teaching of experience, until it shall fully accomplish that for which it was designed.

Experiments have been made on the great railroad lines between New York and Montgomery, Alabama, and Nashville, Tennessee, which have shown the advantages of the system as now existing, and given ample encouragement that it will be made more useful in the future.

On some of the principal western lines—as from Buffalo, New York, to Chicago, Illinois, and St. Louis—accounts of mail pouches are kept, but not quite so satisfactorily as on the other lines referred to, owing chiefly to the fact that the larger proportion of what are called through mails go by “express trains,” in charge of baggage masters, and not the agents of this Department. The latter travel on other trains, for the purpose of delivering mails to numerous post offices on the way where “express trains” do not regularly stop; and it has been considered an unnecessary expense to appoint agents simply to deliver bags, when the railroad companies are paid as well for that service as for conveying them, there being express stipulations to that effect in all contracts. These views are undoubtedly correct in theory, but experience has shown that railroad companies cannot be made to appoint persons to give the mails due attention in all cases, and there is, therefore, no alternative but to multiply largely the number of agents of the Department on all great routes where important mails now go without them. In addition to the western routes just alluded to, there are many others of equal grade in the same category. The principal mails between Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and the West, for instance, have been nominally cared for by baggage masters, but who, having other duties equally if not more important in their estimation, have not always duly attended to the mails. Especially is it found that they cannot be induced to account for pouches, as desired by the Department. Believing that such a state of things should be remedied, I have placed agents on the express lines between Baltimore and Cincinnati, and Philadelphia and Cincinnati, and required each one to run through the whole distance between those cities. Starting, say at Baltimore, an agent will give a receipt for the several pouches according to their destination, and the same will also be entered on a “way bill.” For mails received and delivered on the route, receipts are to be exchanged and entries made on the “bill,” and the agent will go through in the shortest possible time to Cincinnati, and deliver his mails and way bill for examination at the post office. If detained from any cause, he is to go forward by the first opportunity, and in no case to allow passengers to outstrip him; and he must report to the postmasters the particulars of all delays, with their causes, for publication, immediately on reaching his final destination, so that the public shall be fully informed on the subject, and know where blame rests. In this way one individual is held responsible, without chance of evasion, for the whole distance; whereas, under the ordinary division of duties, the mails would pass through the hands of perhaps five or six persons, rendering it always difficult and sometimes impracticable to know with certainty, in case of irregularities, who is really blamable.

Similar agencies will be established between New York and Cincinnati, and Cincinnati and St. Louis, and on other great routes, and all possible precautions adopted to insure the regularity and safety of the mails.

It is frequently charged that the mails have not uniformly equal expedition with travelers on railroads; and, in so far as this may be the fact, it is considered attributable to the want of attention to the mails on the express lines which are without agents of this Department. The evil, therefore, can only be remedied by employing additional agents to accompany mails long distances without changing, and guard against all delays that can possibly be avoided, and especially to see that passengers enjoy no advantages over the mails, but that both are equally expedited under all circumstances.

It may be proper to add in this connection that the preparation of all necessary forms and instructions for maintaining accountability on routes where this work is already commenced, and for extending it generally as proposed, will involve an amount of additional labor which cannot be performed with the present clerical force.

NEW ORLEANS AND NEW YORK ROUTE.

For a number of years the attention of Congress and of the commercial public has been directed to the necessity of adopting measures to insure greater speed and regularity in the transmission of the mails between New York and New Orleans, the recognized centers, as these cities are, of two great commercial circles, conducting by far the larger portion of the importing and exporting trade of the whole country. The interest felt in the subject has been manifested, from time to time, in the presentation to Congress of memorials from citizens, chambers of commerce, and State Legislatures, praying that means might be employed to effect increased expedition and certainty in the transmission of these mails; and in the subsequent passage of resolutions by both Houses, calling on the Postmaster General to report the causes of the failures and delays referred to by the memorialists, and to state whether any and what legislation was necessary to accomplish the object of their prayers.

The great northern and southern mails are transported by railroad from New York, via Philadelphia, Washington, Richmond, Petersburg, Weldon, Wilmington, Kingsville, Augusta, Millin, Macon, and Columbus, to Montgomery, thence by coach to Stockton, and thence by steamboat to Mobile and New Orleans. The service is twice daily between New York and Montgomery, and daily between Montgomery and New Orleans. The time prescribed in the contract schedules for the performance of the through trip is six days; but the instances in which this speed is actually attained constitute rather the exceptions than the rule. Of 627 mails sent from New York to New Orleans within the year ending 31st March, 1856, only 163 were carried through in six days, the time occupied in the transportation of the remaining 464 ranging from seven to twelve days. Of 369 mails sent in the same year from New Orleans to New York, only 153 were carried through in six days, the remaining 216 ranging from seven to fourteen days. Of 651 mails sent from New York to New Orleans within the year ending 31st March, 1857, only 159 were carried through in six days, the remaining 492 ranging from seven to twenty days. Of 363 mails sent in the same year from New Orleans to New York, 161 were carried through in six days, the remaining 202 occupying from seven to sixteen days. No mail was received at New Orleans from New York on sixty-five several days within the year ending 31st March, 1856; and on ninety-six several days within the same year no mail was received at New York from New Orleans. Thirty-five similar failures occurred at New Orleans during the year ending 31st March, 1857, and ninety-seven at New York. The failures at intermediate points, going south, during the year ending 31st March, 1856, amounted to 331; going north, to 262. During the year ending 31st March, 1857, the failures going south were 284; going north, 324. The average time occupied in the performance of the through trip from New York to New Orleans, during the year ending 31st March, 1856, was seven days, four hours; from New Orleans to New York, seven days, one hour. For the year ending 31st March, 1857, the average time from New York to New Orleans was seven days, three hours; from New Orleans to New York, six days, twenty hours. The shortest time either way, in either year, was six days; the longest going south, in the year ending 31st March, 1856, was twelve days; going north, fourteen days. In the year ending 31st March, 1857, the longest time going south was twenty days; going north, sixteen days.

The inconvenience occasioned by these delays and failures is aggravated by the fact that by far the larger portion of them occur within the winter months—from October to March, inclusive—comprising the period during which the great mass of the commercial operations of the year transpire. Thus, of the one hundred and sixty-three mails carried through in six days from New York to New Orleans, in the year ending 31st of March, 1856, only forty-six were transmitted within the winter months. Of one hundred and fifty-three carried through in six days, in the same year, from New Orleans to New York, only forty-three were transmitted within the winter months. Of one hundred and fifty-nine carried through in six days from New York to New Orleans, in the year ending 31st of March, 1857, only fifty-six were transmitted during the winter season. And of one hundred and sixty-one carried through in six days, in the same year, from New Orleans to New York, only forty-nine were transmitted during the winter months. Of sixty-five failures, in the year ending 31st of March, 1856, to receive any mail at New Orleans from New York, forty-six occurred during the winter. Of ninety-six failures, in the same year, to receive any mail at New York from New Orleans, fifty-four occurred in the winter. Of thirty-five similar failures at New Orleans, in the year ending the 31st of March, 1857, thirty occurred in the winter; and of ninety-seven at New York, sixty-one occurred in the winter. Nearly four fifths of all the failures at intermediate points, in each year, transpired during the winter months. The average time of the through trips from New York to New Orleans, for the six summer months ending with September, 1855, was six days, eighteen hours; for the six succeeding winter months, the average was seven days, fifteen hours; for both together, seven days, four hours. The average time from New Orleans to New York, for the same year, was, for the summer, six days, eleven hours; for the winter, seven days, fourteen hours; for both, seven days, one hour. The average time from New York to New Orleans, for the six summer months ending with September, 1856, was six days, seventeen hours; for the six succeeding winter months, seven days, thirteen hours; for both, seven days, three hours. The average time, the same year, from New Orleans to New York, was, for the summer, six days, nine hours; for the winter, seven days, eight hours; for both, six days, twenty hours.

The causes uniformly assigned for these failures and delays are such as these: "Cars off the track," "Collision of trains," "Machinery deranged," "High winds," "Snow storms and ice," "Snow drifts," "Road injured by heavy rains," "Bridge broken," &c. They are such, too, as necessarily attach to the description of service employed. The line between New York and New Orleans is composed of sixteen different links, or routes, the service on each being performed under a separate and distinct contract, having annexed to it, as a material part, a schedule of departures and arrivals, by which the contractors are to be respectively governed. To secure the speediest practicable transmission of the mails over the whole line, the connections between these links must necessarily be close, and each separate road must be put up to its greatest average running power. Under these circumstances, a very slight accident upon any one of the roads occasions a failure on its part to form a connection with the succeeding link, and the consequence is a loss, in the through trip, of twelve or twenty-four hours, accordingly as the service on that part of the line is double or single daily. Periods occur every winter when the transmission of the mail is suspended for days together by reason of snow storms. During the last winter it was arrested for ten days at one point on the line, and at others for seven, eight, and nine days together.

Among the routes established by law during the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress were two described in the following words:

"From Cedar Key, Florida, to New Orleans, Louisiana, in steamers." "From Fernandina, Florida, to New York, New York, in steamers."

In advertising these routes, the Department, believing that they were designed, in connection with a railroad in course of construction across the peninsula of Florida, from Fernandina to Cedar Key, to constitute a new route from New York to New Orleans, with a view to the speedier and more certain transmission of the great northern and southern mails, invited bids for tri-weekly and also for daily service, and requested bidders to state the least time in which they would guarantee to perform the trip. The railroad part of the line was not embraced in the advertisement, the act of 1845 (section 19) authorizing the Postmaster General to contract for the transportation of the mails on railroads with or without advertising.

In response to the invitations of the Department, the Florida Railroad Company presented the following proposals:

1st. To carry the mails tri-weekly in steamers between Cedar Key and New Orleans, the trip to be performed in thirty-eight hours each way, at $110,000 per annum.

2d. To carry the mails tri-weekly in steamers between Fernandina and New York, the trip to be performed in seventy-five hours each way, at $165,000 per annum.

3d. To carry the mails tri-weekly or daily in steamers from New York to Fernandina, thence by railroad across the peninsula of Florida to

Cedar Key, and thence in steamers to New Orleans, and back, the trip each way to be performed within five days, at $300,000 per annum for tri-weekly, or $500,000 per annum for daily service—to commence on the completion of the railroad between Fernandina and Cedar Key, and the contract to be renewed for four years from the expiration of the current term, (i. e., June 30, 1859.)

In a subsequent correspondence between the Department and the bidders they gave assurances of their ability to perform the through trip ordinarily within four days, and stated that in fixing five as the limit they had allowed ample margin for any such detentions as were likely to result from accidents, head winds, or storms. They also submitted the following modification of their proposals:

"The company will perform a daily service throughout the year for the sum of $455,250.

"To insure a five days' mail they will guaranty the time; or, in other words, no pay will be demanded for any trip not performed within five days between the terminal points of the route, viz.: New York and New Orleans.

"The company will also stipulate that at any time during the contract, when required by the Department, upon three months' notification, they will convey a mail from Cedar Key to Aspinwall, Greytown, or Huasacualco, (as preferred by the Department,) and back, twice monthly, and from Cedar Key to Key West and Havana and back twice monthly, the compensation for both services to be $100,000 per annum.

"The time between Cedar Key and Aspinwall guaranteed not to exceed one hundred and twenty hours, and between Cedar Key and Havana not to exceed thirty-five hours.

"If Greytown or Huasacualco be selected, the time to be proportionately reduced.

"The service to Havana and the Pacific crossing to start from Tampa, instead of Cedar Key, when the road to that point is completed."

The transportation of the great northern and southern mails by the proposed new route would obviously be free from many of the causes of interruption and delay to which the land route is subject. The whole line would be under contract to a single party, with a schedule fixing the period within which the entire trip should be performed; whereas, by the present arrangement, sixteen different parties are employed in the service, with separate schedules, each of which must be exactly complied with to insure the performance of the through trip in contract time. The running time proposed, also, is one day less than the least in which it has proved practicable to transport the mails by land, and more than two days less than the actual average. The liability of mails to depredation and to misdirection by frequent overhauling and distribution would be obviated, in the proposed arrangement, by inclosing the matter in crates or boxes in New York or New Orleans, and transporting it unopened to its destination; and thus, also, the abrasion of packages, with the consequent liability to loss of directions, &c., would be prevented—a consideration of no small value, in view of the generally bad condition of the document mail on its arrival in the southwestern States, and the too frequent failure of such matter to reach its proper destination.

The establishment of the proposed service, while it would not interfere with the carriage of the local mails on the inland route, would relieve the Department from liability to embarrassments under which it has at times been placed in consequence of being dependent on a single line for the transmission of the through mails; and it would be productive, both to the Department and the public, of other advantages naturally arising from the competition it would create.

The inducement it would offer to the mercantile community to insure the due transmission of their communications by duplicate letters, to be forwarded by both routes, would be a source of increased revenue to the Department; and the greater speed and certainty it promises would have the effect of relieving the mail service, to some extent, from the competition of the telegraph.

By conveying the mails for California upon the proposed route as far as Cedar Key, and forwarding them thence by a separate steamer to Aspinwall, Greytown, or Huasacualco, and by substituting the branch proposed from Cedar Key to Key West and Havana for the present Charleston line, and for that part of the New Orleans and Key West line between Cedar Key and Key West—say half the route—an annual saving of $235,000 would be effected. In such event, this saving should be deducted from the cost of the proposed daily service, to show the net additional expense to the Department, which would thus be reduced to $181,250 per annum.

Upon the question of accepting the proposals for this service, considering the uncertainty of the period at which the railroad portion of the proposed line will be completed, I have been unable, thus far, to announce to the bidders any definitive determination. But the subject is referred to here because it is deemed to be one of vast public interest, in view of the promise which the contemplated new arrangement affords of so materially facilitating the communication between the two sections and the two great commercial capitals of the country.

THE MAIL SERVICE ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER BELOW THE OHIO.

The river is divided into the following sections, for distribution of the local mails at the different towns and offices on it:

Route 7305.—New Orleans to St. Francisville, 170 miles, four times a week, by steamboats.

Route 7309.—New Orleans, via St. Francisville, to Vicksburg, 397 miles, three times a week, by steamboats.

Note.—This arrangement makes the service daily between New Orleans and St. Francisville, and three times a week between St. Francisville and Vicksburg.

Route 7499.—Vicksburg to Napoleon, 230 miles, twice a week, by steamboats.

Route 7512.—Napoleon to Memphis, 203 miles, twice a week, by steamboats.

Besides these four subdivisions for local purposes, there is the great through mail, No. 7809, from New Orleans to Cairo, which, like all the others, will expire the 30th June next.

The Department recommends that, on the expiration of the present contracts, another subdivision be added, from Memphis to Cairo, so that the plan for supplying the local mails to the various towns and settlements between the Ohio and New Orleans may be adequate and uniform.

As to the great through mail from Cairo and New Orleans, the hope is indulged that there will be no necessity for continuing it on the river, as at present. When first ordered by Congress, there was great and obvious propriety in it; but the progress since made in constructing several railroads nearly parallel with it has put a new aspect on the question. By the 30th June next, it is believed that the railroad from New Orleans to Jackson, Canton, &c., will be so far completed that, with one or two short stage lines between the unfinished portions, the mails may be conveyed over it in nearly half the present time, and with much more certainty and regularity. This may confidently be anticipated with respect to so much of said road as is south of the Tennessee line. Thence it is already completed to Jackson, in the latter State, and, from the progress making and expected, it is probable that the great through mails may at no distant day be conveyed on the entire line to and from Cairo with infinite advantages over the present river route.

The Department, however, desires the power to make river contracts for a shorter term than four years, as at present, so as to continue that mode of conveyance until sufficient progress is made with the above or any other parallel route to authorize the transfer of the entire through mail service from the river.

The personal acquaintance of the Postmaster General with that river, and the investigation of the fines heretofore imposed on the contractors for the present service, fully convince him that no regular and expeditious transportation of the mails need ever be looked for on so long a route, at any reasonable compensation. If the contractors shall be required, by express provision, to take on themselves all the risks and losses growing out of the ice in winter, the low waters of summer and fall, and of the fogs that prevail at nearly every season of the year, they will covenant to perform the service, but only at enormous rates. In making out bids, they would estimate liberally for all the trips that may be lost, all the failures to arrive in schedule time, and all the failures to connect with other routes, whether arising from ice, low water, and fogs, the breaking of machinery, or other casualties, of whatever nature.

Thus enormous prices would be paid; and after all, on account of the physical impossibility in some cases, and unavoidable accidents in others, the regular and punctual service required would not be obtained. The express service, on horseback, established by a former able head of this Department, (Mr. Kendall,) furnishes an apt illustration of this subject. He expressly advertised that no excuses would be received, and the consequence was, that when a failure took place the fine or forfeiture was deducted unconditionally; but to this the contractor could well afford to submit, having amply allowed for it in his bid, and obtained a contract accordingly at a high price.

In the existing contract, however, for transporting mails between New Orleans and Cairo, there was no express provision that the contractors should take on themselves all the risk of failures by physical causes or unavoidable accidents, such as ice, unprecedented low water, fogs, damage to machinery, &c.; and hence due allowance was to be made for them, as in the case of all other contracts, construed and enforced as they have been in the long and uniform practice of the Department.

Congress, on the last night of the last session, enacted, with reference to this case, "That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to reexamine and adjust all questions arising out of fines imposed upon the contractors for carrying the mails on the Mississippi river."—Act of 3d March, 1857.

Under this law several applications were made for the remission of fines and forfeitures under late contracts for services on the Mississippi river; but, as the act seemed to the Department to have been only intended to embrace existing contracts now in course of being carried out, such applications were not considered, under a rule, well settled, not to review or reverse the decisions of a former head of the Department, unless something existed on the record showing that he himself intended to have reexamined the case.

The act of Congress above quoted, referring to the present case, took it out of this rule, and the decision of the Department is shown by the separate statement marked A in the appendix. The amount remitted may appear large; but, according to law and the testimony taken in the case, and the practice in similar cases, the Department seemed not to be warranted in making it less.

The irregularity of the service, as fully ascertained by this investigation, would have induced the annulment of the contract; but, having only some eight or ten months yet to run, no one was found willing to take it, except at a rate double the present compensation, and even then it was required that a new contract should be made for four years, and not merely for the few months remaining of the regular term. Such a contract not being allowable by law, it was found unadvisable to annul the existing one; and, in order to secure its most efficient execution through the remainder of the term, the agents of the Department at New Orleans and Cairo were instructed to engage any boat on hand and dispatch the mails in every case of failure on the part of the contractors to do so at the time required, the cost of such temporary service (not exceeding $450 the half trip) being chargeable to them. The postmaster at Memphis, where commercial connections have now become vastly important, was also instructed that whenever the mail-boat from Cairo failed to arrive there in reasonable time, he should transmit mails for New Orleans by any other boat, at the expense of the contractors. Under these arrangements, now being energetically executed, the hope is indulged that the service for the few months remaining may be satisfactorily rendered.

All the difficulties in relation to this route have been inherited from former years; and the Department looks forward to the day, believed not to be distant, when the great through mails from Chicago, St. Louis, Memphis, and other important cities of the West, can be transmitted to New Orleans in less than half the time now required, and with the regularity of a well-constructed and well-managed railroad.

FINES.

A detailed statement will be presented to Congress, showing the fines and deductions which were imposed upon the contractors for imperfect mail service during the fiscal year. These fines and deductions will be found to amount in the aggregate to $188,746 84. In this amount of $188,746 84 is included the sum of $74,598 46, being that portion of the deductions made from the contractors' pay on the New Orleans and Cairo route during the third and fourth quarters of 1856, which has since been remitted to them, in pursuance of the seventh section of the act of Congress passed the 3d of March, 1857.

SETTLEMENT OF THE CLAIM OF GEORGE CHORPENNING, JR.

By an act of Congress of March 3, 1851, the Postmaster General was "required to adjust and settle the claim of George Chorpenning, jr., as surviving partner of Woodward & Chorpenning, and in his own right, for carrying the mails by San Pedro, and for supplying the post office in Carson's Valley, and also for carrying part of the Independence mail by California; allowing a pro rata increase of compensation for the distance by San Pedro, for the service to Carson's Valley, and for such part of the eastern mail as was carried by California during all the time when said services were performed;" and to adjust and settle the claim of said Chorpenning "for damages on account of the annulment or suspension of Woodward & Chorpenning's contract for carrying the United States mail from Sacramento, in California, to Salt Lake, in Utah Territory, as shown in the affidavits and proofs on file in the House of Representatives;" also, to allow and pay to said Chorpenning his full contract pay during the suspension of their contract, from 15th of March to 1st of July, 1853, and thereafter to pay him at the rate of $30,000 per annum, which sum was to be in lieu of the contract pay under both the contract with Woodward & Chorpenning, which expired June 30, 1854, and under his (Chorpenning's) present contract, which runs four years from July 1, 1854. The contract pay under the first was $14,000, for monthly service between Sacramento City and Salt Lake, by Carson's Valley; and under the present, $12,500 a year, for the same number of trips from San Diego or San Pedro to Salt Lake by San Bernardino. In obedience to this law, and on the proofs and affidavits on file in the House of Representatives, to which I was, by the terms of the law, restricted, I have allowed—

1. For damages on account of the annulment or suspension of the old contract.....	$30,000 00
2. For five months' service to Carson's Valley,.....	1,153 33
3. For increased distance from Sacramento, in carrying the regular California and Salt Lake mail, by San Pedro, ten months.....	$6,410 00
and Independence mails eight of same months.....	15,384 62
4. For carrying the Independence mails eight months between San Pedro and Salt Lake, (all the above being under old contract).....	28,000 00
5. For carrying the Independence mails under present contract, from July 1, 1854, to October 1, 1856.....	28,125 00
In the aggregate.....	$109,072 95

In making the pro rata allowances, the act of Congress not being specific on this point, I have taken as the basis of the calculations the original pay under each contract, instead of the higher sum of $30,000, to which, as above observed, the compensation has been raised. But, even upon this lower basis, the sum allowed, it will be perceived, is very considerable, independently of the further increased compensation of $16,000 under the old, and $17,500 per annum under the new contract.

The settlement of this claim has not been made without considerable embarrassment. The act of Congress was peremptory to adjust and settle, not according to the proofs that might be taken before the final action, but "as shown by the proofs and affidavits on file in the House of Representatives." These were to be the sole guides in the settlement, and neither the records of the Department nor any contradictory or explanatory testimony could be taken by the Government to assist in attaining what might be considered exact justice in the case. The act directed that the claimant should be paid pro rata for carrying his own mail, under his contract, from Sacramento, around by San Francisco and the coast, to San Pedro, instead of east by Carson's Valley to Salt Lake, and that he should be paid also for carrying the Independence mail that way, when the records and correspondence of the Department show that the change in the route was permitted at the claimant's own instance and request, and not forced upon him by an order or wish even of the Department. The pro rata allowance for this change alone, it will be observed, is $21,794 62. The act further directed that he should be paid pro rata for carrying the eastern mail for Salt Lake, sent round by the isthmus to California; whereas, by the contract itself, and the usage of the Department in all such cases, he was bound, as a contractor, to carry the mails of the United States, from whatever quarter they might be sent to his line. The principal difficulty in the case, however, was in deciding on the true intent and meaning of the act in requiring him to be paid pro rata. Pro rata, or in proportion, to what? The first contract was to carry the mail at $14,000, and the second at $12,500 per annum. Congress, however, in the very act which granted him this pro rata relief, raised these prices up to $30,000 per annum. Now, in making the estimate required by Congress, should the basis of calculation be a pro rata on the $14,000 and the $12,500 contracts, or on the $30,000? The Department could find nothing in the act throwing light on this subject, and therefore made the calculation on the contract or lowest basis, instead of the $30,000 basis. In doing so, the Department has gone on the principle that, in every case of doubt in a matter of this kind, the Government was entitled to the benefit of that doubt, until Congress, by some new enactment, should remove it.

OVERLAND MAIL ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.

In order to carry into effect the act of Congress approved the 3d of March, 1857, relative to the overland mail to California, the Department issued the following notice, and caused the same to be regularly advertised according to law:

"POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
"April 20, 1857.

"An act of Congress, approved 3d March, 1857, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1858, provides:

"Sec. 10. That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for the conveyance of the entire letter mail from such point on the Mississippi river as the contractors may select to San Francisco, in the State of California, for six years, at a cost not exceeding $300,000 per annum for semi-monthly, $450,000 for weekly, or $600,000 for semi-weekly service, to be performed semi-monthly, weekly, or semi-weekly, at the option of the Postmaster General.

"Sec. 11. That the contract shall require the service to be performed with good four-horse coaches or spring wagons, suitable for the conveyance of passengers as well as the safety and security of the mails.

"Sec. 12. That the contractor shall have the right of preemption to three hundred and twenty acres of any land not then disposed of or reserved, at each point necessary for a station, not to be nearer than ten miles from each other; and provided that no mineral land shall thus be preempted.

"Sec. 13. That the said service shall be performed within twenty-five days for each trip; and that, before entering into such contract, the Postmaster General shall be satisfied of the ability and disposition of the parties bona fide and in good faith to perform the said contract, and shall require good and sufficient security for the performance of the same—the service to commence within twelve months after the signing of the contract."

"Proposals will accordingly be received at the Contract Office of the Post Office Department, until three p. m., of the 1st day of June, 1857, for conveying mails under the provisions of the above act.

"Besides the starting point on the Mississippi river, bidders will name intermediate points proposed to be embraced in the route, and otherwise designate its course as nearly as practicable.

"Separate proposals are invited for semi-monthly, weekly, and semi-weekly trips each way.

"The decision upon the proposals offered will be made after the Postmaster General shall be satisfied of the ability and disposition of the parties in good faith to perform the contract.

"A guarantee is to be executed, with good and sufficient sureties, that the contract shall be executed with like good security, whenever the contractor or contractors shall be required to do so by the Postmaster General, and the service must commence within twelve months after the date of such contract."

In pursuance of said advertisement, the Postmaster General and his three assistants assembled in the Contract Office and opened the respective bids, making the following abstract of them, and causing said abstracts to be copied into a separate book, and also in the route book for California.

ABSTRACT OF THE BIDS.

John Butterfield, William B. Dinsmore, William G. Fargo, James V. P. Gardner, Marcus L. Kinyon, Hamilton Spencer, and Alexander Holland: From St. Louis, by Springfield, and from Memphis by Little Rock, connecting at a common point at or eastward of Albuquerque; thence west, to and along the military road to Colorado river; thence up the valley of the Mohahoc river, to and through the Tejon passes of the Sierra Nevada; and thence along the best route to San Francisco; weekly, $450,000; semi-weekly, $600,000.

John Butterfield and others: From Memphis, by Little Rock, Albuquerque, mouth of Mohahoc, on the Colorado river, and one of the Tejon passes of the Sierra Nevada, to San Francisco; semi-monthly, $300,000, weekly, $450,000; semi-weekly, $595,000.

John Butterfield and others: From St. Louis, by Springfield, to Albuquerque; thence, as above, to San Francisco; semi-monthly, $300,000; weekly, $450,000; semi-weekly, $585,000.

James E. Birch: From Memphis, by Little Rock, Washington, Fulton, Clarksville, Gainesville, Fort Chadbourne, head spring of Concho river, to Pecos river, nearly due west; thence, along Pecos river, Delaware creek, through the Guadalupe and Huaco mountains, to the Rio Grande river; thence, over the emigrant road, to Fort Yuma; thence, by San Gorgona pass, San Bernardino, Tejon, Tulare, or Salinas valleys, to San Francisco; semi-weekly, $600,000.

James Glover: From Memphis, by Helena, Little Rock, across Texas, to El Paso, Fort Yuma, San Bernardino, Los Angeles; thence between the coast range and Sierra Nevada mountains, to San Francisco; or from Vicksburg, by Shreveport, to El Paso, &c., &c., (as above); semi-monthly, $300,000; weekly, $450,000; semi-weekly, $600,000.

S. Howell and A. E. Pace: From Gaines's Landing, on the Mississippi, to San Francisco; term of four years; commence at Vicksburg, if preferred; weekly, $1,000,000 for the first year, $800,000 for the second year, $700,000 for the third year, $600,000 for the fourth year.

David D. Mitchell, Samuel B. Churchill, Robert Campbell, William Gilpin, and others: From St. Louis to San Francisco; semi-weekly, $600,000.

James Johnston, jr., and Joseph Clark: From St. Louis, by Fort Independence, Fort Laramie, Salt Lake City, or any other point named by the Department, to San Francisco; semi-monthly, $260,000, weekly, $390,000; semi-weekly, $520,000.

Irregular (after time) bid: William Hollingshead, President Minnesota, Nebraska, and Pacific Mail Transportation Company: From St. Paul, by Fort Ridgely, South Pass, Soda Springs, Humboldt river, Honey Lake Valley, Noble's Pass, Shasta City, to San Francisco; semi-weekly, $550,000.

On the 2d day of July, 1857, the Department, after full and mature consideration, made the following order in relation to the route selected, and the bid accepted:

"12578. From St. Louis, Missouri, and from Memphis, Tennessee, converging at Little Rock, Arkansas; thence, via Preston, Texas, or as nearly so as may be found advisable, to the best point of crossing the Rio Grande, above El Paso, and not far from Fort Fillmore; thence, along the new road being opened and constructed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to Fort Yuma, California; thence, through the best passes, and along the best valleys for safe and expeditious staging, to San Francisco.

"The foregoing route is selected for the overland mail service to California, as combining, in my judgment, more advantages and fewer disadvantages than any other.

"No bid having been made for this particular route, and all the bidders (whose bids were considered regular under the advertisement, and the act of Congress) having consented that their bids may be held and considered as extending and applying to said route:

"Therefore, looking at the respective bidders, both as to the amount proposed and the ability, qualifications, and experience of the bidders to carry out a great mail service like this, I hereby order that the proposal of John Butterfield, of Utica, New York, William B. Dinsmore, of New York city, William G. Fargo, of Buffalo, New York, James V. P. Gardner, of Utica, New York, Marcus L. Kinyon, of Rome, New York, Alexander Holland, of New York city, and Hamilton Spencer, of Bloomington, Illinois, at the sum of $395,000 (five hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars) per annum for semi-weekly service, be accepted. The contractors, however, to have the privilege of selecting lands, under the act of Congress, on only one of the roads, or branches, between Little Rock and the Mississippi river—the one selected by them to be made known and inserted in the contract at the time of its execution."

Subsequently, on reexamining the proposal, the above acceptance was modified so as to fix the pay at $600,000 per annum, that being the true amount of the bid.

Under strong representations that a better junction of the two branches of said road could be made at Preston than at Little Rock, on the 11th day of September, 1857, the following order was made:

"That whenever the contractors and their sureties shall file in the Post Office Department a request, in writing, that they desire to make the junction of the two branches of said road at Preston, instead of Little Rock, the Department will permit the same to be done by some route not further west than to Springfield, Missouri, thence by Fayetteville, Van Buren, and Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, to the said junction, at or near the town of Preston, in Texas; but said new line will be adopted on the express condition that the said contractors shall not claim or demand from the Department, or from Congress, any increased compensation for or on account of such change in the route from St. Louis, or of the point of junction of the two routes from Little Rock to Preston; and on the further express condition, that whilst the amount of lands to which the contractors may be entitled under the act of Congress may be estimated on either of said branches from Preston to St. Louis or Memphis, at their option, yet the said contractors shall take one half of that amount on each of said branches, so that neither shall have an advantage in the way of stations and settlement over the other; and in case said contractors, in selecting and locating their lands, shall disregard this condition, or give undue advantage to one of said branches over the other, the Department reserves the power of discontinuing said new route from St. Louis to Preston, and to hold said contractors and their sureties to the original route and terms expressed and set forth in the body of this contract."

In pursuance of the above orders and proceedings, on the 16th day of September, 1857, the following contract was entered into between the Department and the contractors whose bid had been accepted:

No. 12578.—Six hundred thousand dollars per annum. This article of contract, made the sixteenth day of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, between the United States (acting in this behalf by their Postmaster General) and John Butterfield, of Utica, New York, William B. Dinsmore, of New York city, William G. Fargo, of Buffalo, New York, James V. P. Gardner, of Utica, New York, Marcus L. Kinyon, of Rome, New York, Alexander Holland, of New York city, and Hamilton Spencer, of Bloomington, Illinois, and Danford N. Barney, of the city of New York, Johnston Livingston, of Livingston, New York, David Moulton, of Floyd, New York, and Elijah P. Williams, of Buffalo, New York, witnesseth:

That whereas John Butterfield, William B. Dinsmore, William G. Fargo, James V. P. Gardner, Marcus L. Kinyon, Alexander Holland, and Hamilton Spencer, have been accepted, according to law, as contractors for transporting the entire letter mail, agreeably to the provisions of Law eleven, twelfth, and thirteenth sections of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1857, (making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858,) from the Mississippi river to San Francisco, California, as follows: from St. Louis, Missouri, and from Memphis, Tennessee, converging at Little Rock, Arkansas; thence, via Preston, Texas, or as near so as may be found advisable, to the best point of crossing the Rio Grande above El Paso, and not far from Fort Fillmore; thence, along the new road being opened and constructed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to or near Fort Yuma, California; thence, through the best passes and along the best valleys for safe and expeditious staging, to San Francisco, California, and back, twice a week, in good four-horse post coaches or spring wagons suitable for the conveyance of passengers as well as the safety and security of the mails, at $600,000 a year, for and during the term of six years, commencing the 16th day of September, 1857, and ending with the 13th day of December, 1864: Now, therefore, the said John Butterfield, William B. Dinsmore, William G. Fargo, James V. P. Gardner, Marcus L. Kinyon, Alexander Holland, and Hamilton Spencer, contractors, and Danford N. Barney, Johnston Livingston, David Moulton, and Elijah P. Williams, their sureties, do jointly and severally undertake, covenant, and agree with the United States, and do bind themselves: 1st. To carry said letter mail within the time fixed by the law above referred to—that is, within twenty-five days for each trip, and according to the annexed schedule of departures and arrivals; 2d. To carry said letter mail in a safe and secure manner, free from wet or other injury, in a boat, under the drivers' seat, or other secure place, and in preference to passengers, and to their entire exclusion, if its weight and bulk require it; 3d. To take the said letter mail and every part of it from, and deliver it and every part of it at, each post office on the route, or that may hereafter be established on the route, and into the post office at each end of the route, and into the post office at the place at which the carrier stops at night, if one is there kept; and if no office is there kept, to lock it up in some secure place, at the risk of the contractors.

They also undertake, covenant, and agree with the United States, and do bind themselves, jointly and severally, as aforesaid, to be answerable for the persons to whom the said contractors shall commit the care and transportation of the mail, and accountable to the United States for any damages which may be sustained by the United States through their unfaithfulness or want of care; and that the said contractors will discharge any carrier of said mail when required to do so by the Postmaster General; also, that they will not transmit, by themselves or their agent, or be concerned in transmitting, commercial intelligence more rapidly than by mail, other than by telegraph, and that they will not carry out of the mail letters or newspapers which should go by post; and further, the said contractors will convey, without additional charge, the special agents of the Department, on the exhibition of their credentials.

They further undertake, covenant, and agree with the United States, that the said contractors will collect quarterly, if required by the Postmaster General, of postmasters on said route, the balances due from them to the General Post Office, and faithfully render an account thereof to the Postmaster General in the settlement of quarterly accounts, and will pay over to the General Post Office all balances remaining in their hands.

For which services, when performed, the said John Butterfield, William B. Dinsmore, William G. Fargo, James V. P. Gardner, Marcus L. Kinyon, Alexander Holland, and Hamilton Spencer, contractors, are to be paid by the United States the sum of six hundred thousand dollars a year, to wit, quarterly, in the months of May, August, November, and February, through the postmasters on the route, or otherwise, at the option of the Postmaster General of the United States; said pay to be subject, however, to be reduced or discontinued by the Postmaster General, as hereinafter stipulated, or to be suspended in case of delinquency.

It is hereby also stipulated and agreed by the said contractors and their sureties, that in all cases there is to be a forfeiture of the pay of a trip when the trip is not run; and of not more than three times the pay of the trip when the trip is not run, and no sufficient excuse for the failure is furnished; and a forfeiture of a due proportion of it when a grade of service is rendered inferior to the mode of conveyance above stipulated; and that these forfeitures may be increased into penalties of higher amount, according to the nature or frequency of the failure, and the importance of the mail; also, that fines may be imposed upon the contractors, unless the delinquency be satisfactorily explained to the Postmaster General in due time, for failing to take from or deliver at a post office the said letter mail, or any part of it; for suffering it to be wet, injured, lost, or destroyed; for carrying it in a place or manner that exposes it to depredation, loss, or injury, by being wet or otherwise; for refusing, after demand, to convey a letter mail by any coach or wagon which the contractors regularly run, or are concerned in running, on the route beyond the number of trips above specified; or for not arriving at the time set in the schedule. And for setting up or running an express to transmit letters or commercial intelligence in advance of the mail, or for transmitting knowingly, or after being informed, any one engaged in transporting letters or mail matter in violation of the laws of the United States, a penalty may be exacted of the contractors equal to a quarter's pay; but in all other cases no fine shall exceed three times the price of the trip. And whenever it is satisfactorily shown that the contractors, their carrier or agent, have left or put aside the said letter mail, or any portion of it, for the accommodation of passengers, they shall forfeit not exceeding a quarter's pay.

And it is hereby further stipulated and agreed by the said contractors and their sureties, that the Postmaster General may annul the contract for repeated failures; for violating the post office laws; for disobeying the instructions of the Department; for refusing to discharge a carrier when required by the Department; for assigning the contract, or any part of it, without the consent of the Postmaster General; for setting up or running an express as aforesaid; or for transporting persons conveying mail matter out of the mail as aforesaid; or whenever either of the contractors shall become a postmaster, assistant postmaster, or member of Congress; and this contract shall in all its parts be subject to the terms and requirements of an act of Congress passed on the twenty-first day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight, entitled "An act concerning public contracts."

And the Postmaster General may also annul the contract whenever he shall discover that the same, or any part of it, is offered for sale in the market for the purpose of speculation.

It is hereby further stipulated and agreed, that if obstacles, such as the want of water or feed, or physical obstructions, should be found between the points herein designated, so that time cannot be made, and a better line can be found between those points, the Postmaster General may vary the route to such better line.

And it is also further understood and agreed, that the contractors shall have all the rights of preemption, whatever they may be, secured by the twelfth section of the act of Congress aforesaid, approved March 3, 1857, on either of the lines from the Mississippi river to the point of their junction with the main stem, but not on both—the election to be made by them at any time within twelve months after the date of the execution of this contract.

In witness whereof, the said Postmaster General has caused the seal of the Post Office Department to be hereto affixed, and has attested the same by his signature, and the said contractors and their sureties have hereto set their hands and seals the day and year set opposite their names respectively.

I hereby certify that I am well acquainted with Danford N. Barney, Johnston Livingston, David Moulton, and Elijah P. Williams, and the condition of their property; and that, after full investigation and inquiry, I am well satisfied that they are good and sufficient sureties for the amount in the foregoing contract.

Postmaster at New York, N. Y.

[Indorsement.]

Ordered, That whenever the contractors and their sureties shall file in the Post Office Department a request in writing that they desire to make the junction of the two branches of said road at Preston, instead of Little Rock, the Department will permit the same to be done by some route not further west than to Springfield, in Missouri, thence by Fayetteville, Van Buren, and Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, to the said junction at or near the town of Preston, in Texas; but said new line will be adopted on the express condition that the said contractors shall not claim or demand from the Department or from Congress any increased compensation for, or on account of, such change in the route from St. Louis, or of the point of junction of the two routes from Little Rock to Preston; and on the further express condition, that whilst the amount of lands to which the contractors may be entitled under the act of Congress may be estimated on either of said branches from Preston to St. Louis, or Memphis, at their option, yet the said contractors shall take one half of that amount on each of said branches, so that neither shall have an advantage in the way of stations and settlement over the other; and in case said contractors, in selecting and locating their lands, shall disregard this condition, or give undue advantage to one of said branches over the other, the Department reserves the power of discontinuing said new route from St. Louis to Preston, and to hold said contractors and their sureties to the original route and terms expressed and set forth in the body of this contract.

AARON V. BROWN,
Postmaster General.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1857.

Having furnished the above detail of facts, the Department does not consider it improper to submit a few observations in relation to the reasons which induced a preference for the route selected.

The law of Congress not being mandatory, the Department did not feel at liberty, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to select any route over which it was considered physically impossible to obtain the service within the time and by the mode of conveyance specified in the act. The trip was to be made within twenty-five days, in four-horse coaches, suitable for the conveyance of passengers as well as the safety and security of the mails. Applying these requirements to the extreme northern route proposed, from St. Louis by Fort Independence, Fort Laramie, Salt Lake, &c., the Department had the recorded experience of many years against the practicability of procuring anything like regular and certain service on that route. The United States had had a mail carried for years on that route, and the returns in the Department showed the most conclusive facts against its selection. The mails for November, December, and January, 1850-51, did not arrive until March, 1851. The winter months of 1851-52 were very severe. The carrier and postmaster reported that they started in time, but had to turn back. The mails of February, March, and December, of 1853, were impeded by deep snow. Those of January and February, 1854, on account of deep snow, did not arrive until the month of April. There was no improvement in the service even down to the November mail of 1856, which left Independence on the 1st of November, and, on account of deep snow, was obliged to winter in the mountains. The snow caused almost an entire failure for four months of the year. These actual experiments, made from the year 1850 to the present time, without referring to the concurring testimony of explorers and travelers, put this route entirely out of the question.

The next route to be considered was the one by Albuquerque—whether the same might start from Memphis or St. Louis. Is this route sufficiently level and exempt from snow, ice, and extremely cold weather, to give the promise that the required service can be performed with regularity and certainty throughout the entire year? And if it can be so performed, can it be done with reasonable safety and comfort to the passengers who are to be transported over it? The mere transmission of the "letter mail" was certainly not the sole object of the law. It looks expressly to the comfort of travelers in the stage, and doubtless to the millions of emigrants and others who, for ages, might pass to and from our Pacific States.

By an inspection of the general profile sheets accompanying the Pacific railroad reports, it will be seen that the mean elevation of the plateau of the Sierra Madre and Rocky Mountains is about 7,000 feet above the level of the sea near the 35th parallel, (Albuquerque route;) and near the 32d parallel (El Paso route) it is about 4,000 or 4,300 feet, (Lieutenant Parke,) giving a difference of 2,800 or 3,000 feet. This difference in elevation, in a climatological point of view, is very important, as will be shown by comparison of extremes of climate on these routes.

Next, with regard to the climate of winter, particularly along these routes, we present the following facts:

Albuquerque route.—At Albuquerque, according to the meteorological report of the medical department of the United States Army, the maximum and minimum temperatures, respectively, were, for the winter months of 1849 and 1850: in December, 53°, 50°; January, 49°, minus 12°; February, 57°, 17°. For 1850 and 1851: in December, 52°, minus 50°; January, 57°, 80°; February, 59°, 70°. For 1852 and 1853: in December, 65°, 210°; January, 65°, 190°; February, 66°, 130°. For 1853 and 1854: in December, 66°, 200°; January, 63°, 50°; February, 67°, 150°; and in December, 1854, 58°, 190°.

At Fort Defiance, about twenty miles north of Campbell's Pass in latitude, and from 300 to 500 feet higher, the maximum and minimum temperatures, respectively, were: for the month of December, 1851, 62°, 40°; 18 inches snow. For 1852 and 1853: in December, 50°, 20°; January, 55°, 70°; February, 56°, 60°. For 1853 and 1854: in December, 57°, 60°; January, 49°, minus 20°; February, 54°, 20°. For 1854 and 1855: December, 65°, 100°; January, 59°, minus 170°; February, 61°, 130°. For 1855 and 1856: December, 56°, minus 250°; January, 54°, minus 80°; February, 51°, minus 30°.

At Albuquerque, December, 1856, the maximum was 65°, minimum 50°; Rio Grande frozen over, so as to be passable, from 7th to 25th January, 1857; maximum 66°, minimum 40°; on the 9th, 10th, and 11th, the thermometer stood, respectively, minus 30°, minus 20°, minus 40°. February, 1857, maximum 72°, minimum 100°.

At Fort Defiance, December, 1856, the maximum was 500°, minimum minus 110°. On the 2d, the thermometer stood, at 9 p. m., minus 20°; on the 3d, at 7 a. m. and 9 p. m., minus 20°; on the 4th, at 7 a. m., minus 100°; on the 5th, at 7 a. m., minus 60°; on the 6th, at 7 a. m., minus 110°; on the 7th, at 7 a. m., minus 70°; on the 8th, at 7 a. m., minus 10°; on the 10th, at 7 a. m., zero; on the 13th, at 7 a. m., minus 90°, and at 9 p. m., minus 70°.

For January, maximum 540°, minimum minus 110°. On the 9th, 10th, and 11th, the thermometer stood, at 7 a. m., respectively, minus 70°, minus 110°, minus 110°; on the 10th, at 9 p. m., minus 40°.

For February, maximum was 600°, minimum minus 120°.

"On December 25, 1855, the thermometer at the hospital at Fort Defiance gave a reading of thirty-two degrees (32°) below zero at quarter past six, a. m. The hospital is not by any means in the coldest portion of the garrison. Two hundred yards distant, the mercury, in January, 1855, ranged from four to eight degrees below that at the hospital, and there is not the slightest doubt of the freezing of the mercury had the instrument been placed in the more exposed situation on the morning of December 25, 1855. A number of men on detached service had their hands and feet frozen, and some badly. The mercury was below zero four mornings in December, 1855; six mornings in January, 1856; three mornings in February, and on the mornings of the 1st and 2d of March, it was below zero.

"The table above will give a fair idea of the climate of the country. The winter of 1854 and 1855 was more severe than any one known for many years. The wintery weather commenced on the 1st of November, 1855, and has continued up to the present time, March 14, 1856. 'The Rio Grande, at Albuquerque, was frozen over, and with ice sufficiently strong to bear a horse and carreta. Those Indians who live habitually to the north of Fort Defiance were obliged to abandon that portion of the country and move south with their flocks and herds in quest of grazing, on account of the depth of snow, which, in the mountains at whose base the fort is situated, was over two feet in depth in March, 1855.'—Correspondence, J. L. Lehman, Assistant Surgeon, U. S. A.; Smithsonian Report, 1855, page 287.

On the 24th of December, 1853, Captain Whipple experienced snow storms and weather sufficiently cold to contract the mercury 3½° below zero, near the San Francisco mountains, and still further west, in the Aztec Pass, to 2½° below zero, when he experienced another severe snow storm. So much for the climate of winter on the Albuquerque route.

Let us compare this account of the climate, extracted from undoubted sources, with that along the more southern route selected.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Postmaster General.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

At Fort Fillmore, on the El Paso route, the meteorological report above referred to shows the minimum temperature at this place, up to 1854, to be but 10°.

At Tucson, February, 1854, Lieutenant Parke reports the minimum temperature 32°, and on one occasion, on the San Pedro, to be 12° at sunrise. We have searched in vain every source of information, and have yet to learn that snow ever lies upon the plains near the El Paso route, or that the thermometer ever descended below zero. The mean temperature of winter at Fort Fillmore is about 46.6°. The mean temperature of winter at Fort Webster, (copper mines,) north of Ojo de la Vacca, 6,350 feet above the sea level, is but 41.3°, while at Fort Defiance, a corresponding position, with reference to the Albuquerque route, it is 28.7°, and at Albuquerque it is 37°. At Fort Yuma (mouth of the Gila, on the El Paso route) the mean temperature of winter is 56.8°.

Although this superiority of climate on the El Paso route must be admitted, still it has been and may be argued that the degree of cold on the Albuquerque route is not greater than on many of the stage routes of the Atlantic States—not greater, perhaps, than between Philadelphia and Pittsburg, or between Baltimore and Wheeling. Without admitting the fact, at all events, so far as the latter route is concerned, it requires but little effort to remember how uncertain during the winter season was the transportation of the mails when the roads were in their natural state, and with what extreme suffering from the cold, staging used to be performed between those cities, with all the advantages of short and well-appointed stations for recruiting the energies of the benumbed and exhausted passengers.

But would Congress or the public be content with a route to California no better in point of climate than those by Harrisburg and Cumberland, when a more mild and favorable one could be easily procured? Imagine four stages to start out from St. Louis on the Albuquerque route with eight passengers in each, thirty-two in number. At the starting point the snow is eight or ten inches deep, which it often is for weeks together. They are to go day and night, the thermometer 10° or 15° above, not below zero. They progress westward, ascending every mile higher and higher, the cold increasing with every mile, for an entire week. At last they reach Albuquerque, an elevation of 6,000 feet, the mercury standing 40° or 50° below zero. Benumbed by the cold for more than a week, overcome by the loss of sleep, they begin another ascent to Campbell's Pass, the best on the route, about 7,000 feet in height, in the vicinity of which the thermometer is standing, by authentic and undoubted observations, from 20° to 32° below zero.

How can thirty odd passengers, men, women, and children, some feeble in health or delicate in constitution, be otherwise than in almost a dying condition? This is no picture of the imagination; it is one of those practical views which common sense will always suggest as to the sufferings and exposures of stage traveling under circumstances so inauspicious. But a truer picture of more intense suffering may be found in the groups of emigrants camped out amid the snows, or struggling to get on, when the mercury, as it very often happens, is down at or below zero—whether a few degrees above or below makes no difference, for a long-continued stage or emigrant travel, under circumstances of so much severe exposure, would, in a few years, mark every station with the fresh graves of its victims. Most emigrants are compelled to be en route in some portion of the winter months. Most families cannot well start from the Atlantic to the Pacific or interior States until they have first finished and disposed of the crop of the preceding season; at all events, it must be so far matured before they start that something approaching its value can be realized from it, in order to help in defraying the expenses of removal. Nor can emigrants linger too long on the way. They must go on, however much exposed to hardships, in order to reach their new homes in time to make a crop the next season. The poor cannot lose two crops in succession without being ruined. The southern or El Paso route is eminently comfortable and desirable for winter emigration, which the Albuquerque one cannot be, whatever might be said in its favor as a route in the summer season. The Department supposed Congress to be in search of a route that could be found safe, comfortable, and certain during every season of the year, as well for the transportation of the mails as for the accommodation of emigrants and the future location of a railroad to the Pacific.

In relation to the relative facility with which four-horse stage coaches can be run over the Albuquerque and El Paso routes, it must be remembered that this service was to commence within twelve months. The distance was more than two thousand miles, over many ranges of mountains, and nearly the whole distance uninhabited. There were no roads yet opened, and even the foot of the white man had not yet trodden many portions of the way which might finally be selected. Still, the stages must be running within twelve months. To do so it was evident that some route must be selected which was naturally a good one—such a one that, by cutting down some trees and blazing others, as mere guide posts, digging down occasional hill-sides, and building slight and temporary bridges, the work of transportation might begin within the brief period required by the law. It was not enough that, by great labor of years and by large expenditure of money, a graded turnpike could be made, or a railway constructed, at the end of some half dozen years, or even a longer period, but it must be over a surface of country naturally so favorable that stage coaches, with their mails and passengers, could be running within twelve months with a rapidity scarcely equalled on the best routes of the older States. To make the trip in twenty-five days they must go day and night, averaging about eighty miles each day. Now, which of these two routes presented the greatest probability of affording such a service? Captain Marcy explored both routes as far as the Rio Grande, and, after having examined both, he gave a decided preference to the southern or El Paso route. He says, on page 228 of his report, after a favorable description of the route from the Rio Grande to the Pecos:

"Our road from here runs across the Llano Estacado for seventy-eight miles, upon a perfectly level prairie, as firm and smooth as marble. It then descends from the high table land, about fifty feet, into a rolling prairie country, where the Colorado of Texas has its source. Thus far there is but little timber or water on our route, except at certain points noted upon the map; but these points can be made from day to day with loaded teams. As if, however, in compensation for the absence of other favors, nature, in her wise economy, has adorned the entire face of the country with a luxuriant verdure of different kinds of grama grass, affording the most nutritious sustenance for animals, and rendering it one of the best countries for grazing large flocks and herds that can be conceived of.

"Immediately after we descended from the high table lands, we struck upon an entirely different country from the one we had been passing over before. By a reference to the map it will be seen we kept near the plain upon the head branches of the Colorado and the Clear Fork of the Brazos. Here we found a smooth road over a gently undulating country of prairies and timber, and abounding with numerous clear spring branches for two hundred miles, and in many places covered with large groves of mesquite timber, which makes the very best of fuel. The soil cannot be surpassed for fertility. The grass remains green during the entire winter, and the climate is salubrious and healthy. Indeed, it possesses all the requisites that can be desired for making a fine agricultural country; and I venture to predict that, at no very distant period, it will contain a very dense population. It is only necessary for our practical farmers to see it, and have protection from the incursions of the Indians, to settle it at once.

"Soon after crossing the Rio Brazos, our road strikes out upon the high ridge lying between the waters of the Trinity and Red rivers; and it appears as if nature had formed this expressly for a road, as it runs for a hundred miles through a country which is frequently much broken up on each side with hills and deep ravines, and the only place where wagons can pass is directly upon the crest of this natural defile. It is as firm and smooth as a turnpike, with no streams of magnitude or other obstruction through the entire distance to near Preston, where we left it and crossed the Red river—from Preston to Fort Washita, and thence to our outward route upon Gaines's creek, the road passing through the Chickasaw country, which is rolling, and in many places covered with a great variety of large timber and well watered, with no mountains or high hills to pass over. Hence you will perceive that from Dona Ana to Fort Smith, a distance of nine hundred and ninety-four miles, our road passes over smooth and very uniformly level ground, crossing no mountains or deep valleys, and for five hundred miles, upon the eastern extremity, runs through the heart of country possessing great natural advantages. I conceive this to be decidedly the best overland wagon route to California, for several reasons."

We shall now call attention to the evidence of Captain John Pope, Topographical Engineers, who has been stationed a long time in Mexico, and has seen a great portion of the plains between the thirty-second and thirty-ninth parallels. In chapter eleven, Pacific Railroad Reports, volume two, speaking of the general character of the country along the thirty-second parallel route, he says:

"In glancing at the topographical features of the immense plains which extend westward from the frontiers of Arkansas and Missouri, the first great peculiarity which strikes the attention is the remarkable interruption of their vast monotony, presented by the belt of country between the thirty-second and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude. The great deserts, commencing about the ninety-seventh meridian, extend over a distance of six hundred miles to the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains. In this whole extent they are badly watered by a few sluggish streams, which intersect them, many of which disappear altogether in the dry season, and are destitute absolutely of timber, except a sparse growth of dwarf cotton along the streams. From the northern part of the United States, at the parallel of 49°, this immense region of desert country extends without interruption as far to the south as the parallel of 34°. At this parallel its continuity is suddenly and remarkably interrupted. Between the thirty-second and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude a broad belt of well-watered, well-timbered country, adapted in a high degree to agricultural purposes, projects for three hundred and twelve miles, like a vast peninsula, into the parched and treeless waste of the plains, and at its western limit approaches to within less than three hundred miles of the Rio Grande at El Paso."

The same distinctive preference to the El Paso route (the one selected) over the Albuquerque route is given by Commissioners Emory and Bartlett, Lieutenant Parke, and A. H. Campbell, at the head of the Pacific Wagon Road office, Interior Department, who accompanied Captain Whipple over the Albuquerque route, and Lieutenant Parke over the El Paso, as principal engineer in 1853-54-55. The comparison of the two routes west of the Rio Grande the Department considered equally favorable to the one selected. Beside the fact of its being over a country about three thousand feet lower than the Albuquerque route, Congress had appropriated $200,000 on this route to be expended in the construction of a wagon road between the Rio Grande and Fort Yuma, on the Colorado. So large a sum expended on a surface so favorable by nature will, doubtless, prove of an immense advantage in expediting the proposed service, both as to regularity and speed. Before this appropriation was made by Congress, Mr. Secretary Davis, who collected a larger amount of reliable information on this subject than any other person, reported to Congress that the most practicable and economical route for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean was the one the Department has selected. Lieutenant Mowry, writing on this subject, since the route was established, says:

"For years, a mail has been regularly carried from San Antonio to El Paso without difficulty or danger, except from Indians. At present a monthly mail is carried from El Paso to Tucson, three hundred and forty miles west, by Government express, for the benefit of the troops in Arizona. This express has a military escort. Fort Yuma and San Diego, California, have for five years been connected by a semi-monthly mail, (Government express,) which, during my two years' service at Fort Yuma, was as regular in its arrival as the steamer from the east at San Francisco.

"The only part of the newly-selected route now opened by a mail is that from Fort Yuma to Tucson, two hundred and sixty miles; and this is almost daily traveled by the people of the Territory, by emigrants, and by Mexicans. Tucson is a growing town, and will afford all the grain needed for the road to El Paso. The Pimas villages, on the Gila river, will supply grain for the route to Fort Yuma, besides any quantity to transport to any desired point, or a depot of supply.

"At Fort Yuma, last year, a large quantity of corn was allowed to rot for want of a market, and there is grazing for ten thousand animals on the river banks. A few military posts, which would be necessary on either of the other routes, will make the southern route perfectly safe; and the immense mineral wealth, in silver and copper, will at once draw to Arizona a large population. It is the only available route at all seasons of the year. The route through the South Pass is as much closed by snow from four to six months in the year as if barred by a gate of adamant. During the winter of 1854-55, I was in the Salt Lake valley, and no mail from the east reached us from November to April. The mail was at that time transported on pack mules, and was in the charge of experienced men, who had spent their lives on the plains.

"If they could not get the mail through either way, how much less the chance is there for Concord coaches? The central route is no better. I refer to Colonel Fremont or Lieutenant Real to state, upon their reputation as travelers and 'mountain men,' how much dependence can be placed upon the regular transmission of a semi-weekly mail through the Cochetopee Pass in December, January, February, or March. The route by El Paso and Fort Yuma is open the entire year. On both the other routes artesian wells are necessary to get water at convenient distances, and this necessity upon the southern route is therefore no extraordinary argument against it. I may be allowed to remark that the impression so generally diffused in the eastern States, that Arizona Territory is a desert and a God-forsaken country, is entirely erroneous. It will be recollected that California, now celebrated as an agricultural State, was stigmatized with the same epithets, and said to produce nothing but gold. Arizona promises to convince the world that she is able to produce silver enough to supply all the demands of commerce, and to show to the emigrant in search of a quiet and fruitful homestead beautiful valleys and clear running streams, where he may cultivate his crops with a fullness of fruition only known to the virgin soil of our western possessions."

The scarcity of water has been often urged against the southern or El Paso route. There is no route between the Mississippi river and California against which the same objection may not be made. After much examination, we believe that the route selected is freer from this objection than almost any other. The statements of Lieutenant Mowry and Mr. Campbell are fully sustained by other authorities. The former, in a published statement, says:

"The country from El Paso to Tucson, three hundred and forty miles, is susceptible of early settlement, and is, moreover, one of the finest routes ever opened towards our western possessions. In no part of it there is a distance of over thirty miles without water, and it is often found at distances of ten and fifteen, with plenty of good grazing throughout the entire distance."

"From Tucson, the principal town of the Territory of Arizona, (throughout the whole length of which the route runs,) to the Gila river, ninety miles, there is no water in the dry season, and two artesian wells will be necessary. In the wet season there is plenty of water. This distance is traveled at all seasons with mule teams and oxen, without difficulty. Down the Gila to Fort Yuma, one hundred and seventy-five miles, there is plenty of water and grass. From Fort Yuma, on the Colorado river, to Carissa creek, and San Diego county, California, about one hundred miles, the route is heavy with sand, and water is found in but three places at all seasons of the year. In the wet season water is found every few miles. Twenty-four miles from Fort Yuma, or Colorado city, are Cook's wells, which, at an expense of $1,000, can be made to furnish an ample supply. Twenty-six miles beyond are the Alamo Mucho wells, which can be enlarged, at the same cost, to any quantity desired. Thirty miles further on are the Indian wells, which will also yield an ample supply. Twenty miles further are the Sackett's wells, which are fed by a subterranean stream, and can also be made to supply any quantity of water."

"These two distances, from Tucson to the Gila and from Fort Yuma to Carissa, present the only difficulties on the route. United, the distance is but one hundred and ninety miles, and it is traveled at all seasons of the year by heavily-loaded teams."

"From Carissa creek into San Diego the route is well watered and affords excellent grazing. The distance is one hundred and twenty-five miles; but the supervisors of San Diego county are now engaged in laying out a new road, which will much shorten the distance."

Mr. Campbell, who, as we have before stated, traveled over both routes, has borne the most ample testimony "that between the Rio Grande and San Pedro river there are thirteen permanent water stations in about two hundred and twenty-four miles, giving an average of one in seventeen miles, and eighteen, including several fine rain-water stations, where water can be preserved, which will give an average of one in twelve miles."

We have submitted this letter of Lieutenant Mowry to Mr. Campbell. He confirms the statements of Lieutenant Mowry in every important particular, and further informs us "that the ninety miles jornada from the Tucson to the Gila is avoided entirely by following down the San Pedro and Gila rivers to the Pimas villages. The distance from the San Pedro, by either route, to the Gila, is about the same; and it is probable that, by following down the Arayappa, a tributary of the Gila, discovered by Lieutenant Parke's party, a distance of many miles can be saved; and in the Calitro mountains, along this route, there is an abundance of pure water in living streams, fine grazing, and oak, ash, walnut, and some pine timber. Deer, antelope, bear, and grouse abound there also, and many indications of gold were observed, and gold was found near the San Pedro river."

Captain Humphreys, in his report to the Secretary of War, and Lieutenant Parke, both testify that a sufficient supply of water can be had on the route for either a railroad or stage line.

In relation to the relative distance on the two routes, an examination of the map will exhibit the fact that the distance from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, to San Francisco, is about the same upon both routes.

Making a difference of only fifty-four miles in favor of the Albuquerque route, as shown by the Pacific railroad surveys—a difference too small to be a matter of grave objection. These and other estimates of distance cannot be expected to be entirely correct; but they approximate the precise distances as nearly as published surveys and explorations will allow of. The above difference of fifty-four miles, however, is reduced to four miles, if we estimate the distance from San Bernardino to San Francisco, via the Cajon pass, Cañada de los Uvas, and Estero Plain,* as in the following table, thereby avoiding the detour of Lieutenant Parke's route, via Santa Barbara and the Gaviote Pass.

From the latest authorities, for the respective routes from the Mississippi river at St. Louis, via Albuquerque, and at Memphis, via El Paso and Fort Yuma, to San Francisco, California, I find the most direct distances over which the mail should travel as follows:

Route from Memphis, via El Paso, &c.

From Memphis to Preston (a).....	375 miles.
From Preston to Waco Tanks (b).....	615 "
From Waco Tanks to Fort Fillmore (c).....	40 "
From Fort Fillmore to Pimas villages (d).....	306 "
From Pimas villages to Fort Yuma (e).....	167 "
From Fort Yuma to San Bernardino (f).....	180 "
From San Bernardino to San Francisco, via Cajon Pass, Cañada de los Uvas, and Estero Plain (g).....	420 "
Total.....	2,103 "

Route from St. Louis, via Springfield, Antelope Hills, or Canadian river, Albuquerque, &c., to San Francisco.

From St. Louis to head of Pajaro creek (h).....	860 miles.
From head of Pajaro creek to San Francisco via Canon Carnuel or San Antonio, New Mexico, and via Tah-cc-chay-pah Pass, California.....	1,246 "
Total.....	2,106 "

From St. Louis to Campbell's Pass, via Galisteo (i).....	1,080 "
From Campbell's Pass to San Francisco, as above (j).....	1,085 "
Total.....	2,165 "

NOTE.—As an interesting comparison between these two routes, take Captain Whipple's modified distance—1,952 miles—from Fort Smith to San Francisco, and add 250 miles in a direct line from Fort Smith to Memphis, from the general railroad map above referred to, and we have from the same initial point (Memphis) a distance to San Francisco of 2,202 miles.

Thus the difference in the distances of the two routes between the Mississippi river and San Francisco is too inconsiderable to become material.

As a pioneer route for the first great railroad that may be constructed to the Pacific, the Postmaster General has bestowed upon it all the labor and examination which the multiplied business of his Department would allow of. If all or a greater portion of the railroads from the large cities and the States east of the Mississippi had concentrated at any one point on that river, such point would have been selected for the overland route to California. But such is not the fact. They concentrate chiefly at St. Louis, Cairo, and Memphis. Cairo is mentioned in this connection because, through the Illinois Central, nearly all the railroads constructed for St. Louis may be said also to connect with the Mississippi at Cairo. Finding, therefore, no common center on the Mississippi, the next desirable object was to find some common point west of that river from which a main stem could be projected passing westward to California. If you started out from St. Louis west you must lose all the connections with the Cairo and Memphis railroads; but by starting out from St. Louis, and diverging south with her railroad now making to her Iron Mountain, you will presently receive the great railroad coming out from Cairo, so richly endowed that it is sure to be made at no distant day. Still bearing south-westward, we presently receive, at Little Rock, the other branch of the road from Memphis, connecting the line with all the great railroads of Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and Kentucky. Not far from Little Rock the Vicksburg and New Orleans and Texas railroads fall in, bringing in, from almost every portion of the great river, all the connections which all the Atlantic States north and south can make to that great highway which we are trying to establish. Thus it is that we have found west of the Mississippi what we could not obtain on it—a common concentration of railroads to a single point from which the future railroad may commence, swollen and enlarged in its common stem by the contributions of the railways coming in from nearly every State of the Union.

This diversion of the route to a southern direction, by Little Rock or Preston, has, however, other advantages than any to which we have as yet adverted:

"By starting from St. Louis, the great western mart, and connecting at Little Rock or Preston with the line from Memphis, the two great sections of the country are accommodated."

"Instead of projecting this mail and its attendant benefits into the wilderness, from the frontiers of Missouri, to buffet with north winds and snows upon the plains of Kansas in winter, and drag over monotonous, waterless, treeless wastes in summer, it was located through the center of Missouri, of Arkansas, and throughout the western frontier of Texas. It will thus develop hitherto unknown resources in those States. It will open a vast agricultural and mineral region in Missouri; lend a helping hand to the young, growing, and unappreciated State of Arkansas; and conduct the hardy pioneer to the delightful woodlands and prairies of Texas. For nearly a thousand miles the traveler will be traversing a country abounding in beauty and in healthfulness, possessing a salubrious climate and a fruitful soil."

Nor should it be forgotten that the southern location of the route, especially if it shall be followed by the construction of a railroad, may serve a valuable purpose in reference to the neighboring Republic of Mexico. In time of peace it will shed its blessings on both nations, whilst in time of war it will furnish a highway for troops and munitions of war, which might enable us to vindicate our rights, and preserve untarnished our national honor.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AARON V. BROWN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
December 3, 1857.

SIR: The naval force which has been employed during the past year has been sufficient to give adequate security to our commerce, and to the persons and property of American citizens in all parts of the world.

The home squadron, under the command of its flag officer, Hiram Paulding, has consisted of the steam-frigates Wabash and Roanoke, the sloops-of-war Saratoga and Cyane, and the war-steamer Susquehanna and Fulton. The unsatisfactory state of affairs in New Granada and portions of Central America required the increase of this squadron, and the almost constant presence of a considerable force in the neighborhood, both on the Atlantic and the Pacific.

In January the Wabash returned from Aspinwall to New York, with the officers and crew of the St. Mary's; in April sailed for Aspinwall; in June returned again to New York, with one hundred and thirty-eight of the destitute and suffering American citizens who had been involved in the troubles of Central America; and on the 29th of July sailed again for Aspinwall, where she still remains.

In May the Cyane sailed from Aspinwall upon a short cruise, touching at Carthagena, thence to San Juan del Norte; in June received on board, and transported to Aspinwall, the men who were brought home by the Wabash, and proceeded herself to Boston with fifty-three of the sick and wounded. On the 2d of September she sailed on a cruise to the eastward, returned to Hampton Roads October 30, and on the 19th of November sailed for Cape Haytien to the relief of an American vessel and two American seamen, seized upon suspicion by order of the Haytien Government.

The Roanoke, while making her six months' trial trip at sea, was under the command of Captain Montgomery, temporarily attached to this squadron. On the 30th of May she sailed for Aspinwall, and returned on the 4th of August, with two hundred and five of Walker's men. It being necessary to put her in dock, she was sent from New York to Boston, and put out of commission.

All these men were brought home without previous orders; but such was their deplorable condition, that it was an act of humanity which could not and ought not to be dispensed with; and the Department approved it. The expense of providing for them necessary food, clothing, and medicine, while on shipboard, amounted to $7,376 16, for which an appropriation is recommended.

The Saratoga having returned to Norfolk, in December, proceeded, on the 16th of January, on a cruise, visiting St. Domingo, St. Thomas, Venezuela, Curaçoa, Aspinwall, and San Juan del Norte; thence, by way of Aspinwall, the Island of Grand Cayman, Havana, and Key West, she returned to Norfolk, where she arrived on the 29th of April. On the 23d of May she left Norfolk for Aspinwall, and will soon be relieved by the Susquehanna.

The Fulton was put in commission in September, and sailed from Washington on the 14th of October for Mobile, New Orleans, and Chiriqui, in New Granada, for the purpose of intercepting and preventing unlawful expeditions from the United States against Costa Rica, Nicaragua, and Mexico. Instructions, having the same object in view, were given to Commodore Paulding at Aspinwall, and Commander Chatard at San Juan del Norte.

The Susquehanna, having been ordered from the Mediterranean to the home squadron, has doubtless arrived at Key West and proceeded to San Juan del Norte with similar instructions.

If any unlawful expedition from the United States against Nicaragua, Costa Rica, or Mexico, shall succeed in effecting a landing, it will be because it has been able to elude the vigilance of this squadron.

The Jamestown is now preparing at Philadelphia to join it, and will soon be ready for sea.

The force in the Pacific, under the command of the flag officer, William Mervine, has consisted of the frigate Independence, the sloop-of-war St. Mary's, John Adams, and Decatur, and the war-steamer Massachusetts. A large part of this squadron has been much usefully employed at Panama and on the coast of Central America, where its presence was deemed indispensable.

The Independence sailed, August 3, from Panama to San Francisco, to be stationed at the navy-yard as a receiving ship, and for the general purposes of the yard, under the command of Commander Fairfax. During her long stay at Panama, her officers, at intervals of leisure, were engaged in surveys and expeditions of much interest. A party was dispatched, in charge of Lieutenant James B. McCauley, to explore the timber resources about the Gulf of San Miguel, the mouth of the Darien, one hundred miles from Panama. The expedition was eminently successful.

The John Adams was ordered home, in September, to Norfolk.

The Massachusetts, having been stationed in Puget Sound to aid in preventing Indian disturbances, when her presence was no longer required was ordered to San Francisco; and, arriving there in April, was, in June, put out of commission.

The Decatur was also employed on the north-west coast in suppressing Indian hostilities, from which she proceeded to San Francisco, thence to Panama, and arrived there March 9. On the 1st of April the officers and crew were relieved by others, sent across the Isthmus. In June she sailed from Panama for Punta Arenas and San Juan del Sur; August 5 she returned to Panama, with twenty-five of Walker's men.

The St. Mary's sailed from Panama, in January last, with orders to touch on the coast of Central America, and thence proceed to Jarvis and New Nantucket islands, which were supposed to possess valuable deposits of guano. She was detained on the coast of Central America by the condition of affairs there, and did not continue her course to those islands until June. Commander Davis had instructions to visit them, to make soundings, to ascertain their location, and the quantity and quality of their guano deposits, to make other observations useful to navigation, and to return by the Sandwich Islands to San Francisco. She proceeded to Jarvis and New Nantucket islands, made the soundings, surveys, and examination which had been ordered, and, proceeding thence to Honolulu, arrived there on the 23d of September. Commander Davis reports that nothing resembling guano was found at either of those islands. He, however, procured several samples of the soil from a sufficient variety of places, fully to illustrate the character of the deposits. The American Guano Company having previously, under the act of August 18, 1856, given to the State Department the proper notice of discovery, and entered into the required bond, Commander Davis, no conflicting claims appearing, took formal possession of the islands in the name of the United States, and deposited in the earth a declaration to that effect, executed on parchment and well protected.

In view of the large fleet of whale ships, in number about two hundred, carrying seven thousand men, that usually visit the Sandwich Islands in the fall of the year, Commander Davis, at the earnest solicitation of the United States Commissioner, and of many of the principal American merchants, decided to prolong his stay there.

Commodore Mervine having been ordered home, and the Independence to San Francisco, Captain John C. Long has gone out to succeed him, sailing from Boston, October 17, in his flag-ship, the Merrimack. The steam-frigate Saranac, under Captain John Kelly, has sailed for the Pacific to supply the place of the John Adams. The Vandalia has recently left Portsmouth, New Hampshire, for the same station.

It was deemed necessary, as a measure of humanity and policy, to direct Commodore Mervine to give General Walker and such of his men, citizens of the United States, as were willing to embrace it, an opportunity to retreat from Nicaragua. Before these instructions were received, Commodore Mervine had sent Commander Davis, with the St. Mary's, to San Juan del Sur, with instructions to protect the persons and property of American citizens. With this authority only, Commander Davis negotiated with General Walker terms of capitulation, under which he surrendered with his men, and was conveyed to Panama, whence he proceeded to the United States. Commander Davis also received from General Walker the surrender of a small schooner which he had detained, called the Granada, and delivered her to the Nicaraguan authorities. The action of Commander Davis, so far as he aided General Walker and his men, by the use of the St. Mary's, to retreat from Nicaragua and return to the United States, was approved by the Department; but his interference with the Granada, and her transfer to the Nicaraguan authorities, by his intervention, was not approved. The whole number of men surrendered and carried to Panama was about three hundred and sixty-four. Commodore Mervine, finding his squadron suddenly incumbered with these men, in the most wretched condition, suffering for the want of everything, and endangering the health of those under his command, had no mode of relief except by turning them adrift, which was impossible, or sending them by the railway to Aspinwall. Adopting the latter alternative, he was under the necessity of drawing on the Department, in favor of the railway company, for $7,475, being the amount which would be due for transporting them across the Isthmus at the usual rate of charge. This bill has neither been paid, accepted, nor protested. The company voluntarily relinquished the personal responsibility of Commodore Mervine, and put the bill at the disposal of the Government. I submit it, with an expression of my conviction that Congress should make reasonable provision for it; and also for the expenses of providing these men while on shipboard with necessary food, clothing, and medicine, of which an estimate will hereafter be furnished.

The Mediterranean squadron, under its flag officer, Samuel L. Breese, was composed of the frigate Congress, the steam-frigate Susquehanna, and the sloop Constellation. The Susquehanna, having aided in the attempt to lay the telegraphic cable across the Atlantic, has been ordered home, as already mentioned, and attached to the home squadron; and Commodore Breese having been ordered, with his flag-ship, the Congress, to the United States, they will not be replaced by others until the opening of the spring, leaving the Constellation, under the command of Captain Charles H. Bell, to look after the interests of the United States in that quarter.

The vessels of this squadron have visited many ports in the Mediterranean, where their presence has had an important influence by giving a feeling of security to citizens of the United States residing there, and thus promoting our commercial interests.

The Brazil squadron, during the past year, has been under the command of flag officer French Forrest, and has consisted of the frigate St. Lawrence and the sloops Falmouth and German town. The German town, being ordered home, arrived at Norfolk February 9, and having been repaired, sailed for the East Indies on the 4th of August, to be employed as part of the force on that station. The Falmouth having been sent home by Commodore Forrest for repairs, which being completed, she was sent back at the earliest moment to rejoin the St. Lawrence. It is proposed, at an early day, to add the brig Perry to this squadron.

These two squadrons, the Brazil and the Mediterranean, have been able quietly and effectively to perform the duties required of them, respectively, without any act of direct interference.

The Jamestown, Cumberland, St. Louis, Vincennes, Dale, and Dolphin, have been employed on the coast of Africa. Commodore Crabbe, late in command on that station, arriving at Philadelphia with the Jamestown, on the 2d of June, was succeeded by the present flag officer of the squadron, Thomas A. Conover, who, on the 23d of the same month, sailed from Boston in his flag ship, the Cumberland. The Dale left Norfolk May 5 to relieve the Dolphin, which arrived at Boston July 22. The Vincennes left New York on the 20th November, to relieve the St. Louis. The sloop Marion is preparing to join the squadron. The force on the coast of Africa has fully accomplished its main object, by discharging the obligations we are under by the treaty of August 9, 1842, for the suppression of the slave trade.

The steam-frigate San Jacinto, Commander Henry H. Bell, and the sloop-of-war Portsmouth, Commander Foote, and Levant, Commander William Smith, have constituted the East India squadron, under flag officer James Armstrong. The duties of this squadron have been arduous, and the officers and men attached to it distinguished themselves on a memorable occasion.

On the 15th of November, 1856, as one of the boats belonging to the squadron was passing up the river to Canton with the American flag fully displayed, it was several times fired upon by the Barrier forts, endangering the lives of all on board. This outrage was promptly resisted and redressed by the capture and destruction of the forts, and razing their walls to the ground. These forts, four in number, commanding the approach to Canton, were among the strongest defenses of the Empire, mounting one hundred and seventy-six guns. The prompt and decisive course pursued by Commodore Armstrong, his officers and men, has caused the flag of the United States to be respected by the Chinese, contributed largely to the security of our citizens in China, and, during the troubles which followed, has probably been the means of saving many lives and much property.

The Portsmouth, in January, sailed for Shanghai, visited all the ports north of Canton open to our vessels by treaty, and in March returned to Hong Kong. In April she was dispatched to Singapore to look into the affair of the Dutch bark "Henrietta Maria," and having accomplished the object of her visit, she proceeded to Siam with Mr. Charles William Bradley, United States Consul at Ningpo, bearing a treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Siam for ratification by that Government. While there she was visited by one of the Kings of Siam, a courtesy never before extended to a man-of-war of any nation. On the 17th of June she sailed with Mr. Bradley for Hong Kong, thence to Shanghai, from which port she sailed on the 29th of August for Simoda and Hakodadi, Japan.

The Levant, in February, was ordered to Manila with invalids of the squadron, to obtain a passage for them to the United States. She left Manila in March for Shanghai, was there docked, and on the 23d of June sailed for Hong Kong. Orders were sent out on the 16th September for her return to Boston.

The San Jacinto, at the latest dates, was at Shanghai, where she arrived on the 23d of June from Hong Kong, having in view the health of officers and crew which required a change of climate.

The open hostilities existing between the English and the Chinese, the consequent embarrassments of trade, and the prospect of obtaining much better commercial arrangements with China, rendered an increase of our naval force in those seas a measure of prudence, if not of necessity. Accordingly, the steam-frigates Minnesota and Mississippi, and the sloop-of-war Germantown were ordered to that station. The Minnesota sailed from Norfolk July 1, the Germantown August 4, and the Mississippi from New York August 19. The Hon. William B. Reed, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States to China, went out in the Minnesota.

The steam frigate Powhatan has been ordered to China to relieve the San Jacinto, and Captain Josiah F. Tattnall to succeed Commodore Armstrong as the flag officer of the squadron.

The late President of the United States, your immediate predecessor, having accepted the offer which you courteously extended to him of the use of a public vessel to convey him and his family to Maderia, the Powhatan will receive them on board at Norfolk and convey them to that island.

Besides the squadrons, other vessels have been in commission. The steamer Michigan, under Commander Charles H. McBlair, is upon the northwestern lakes.

The steam-frigate Merrimack returned to Boston, in March, from a successful trial trip of six months, under Captain Pendergrast; she has since gone out as the flag-ship of the Pacific squadron.

The sloop-of-war Preble, the practice-ship at the Naval Academy, under Commander Joseph F. Green, has, with the first and third classes of acting midshipmen, made the usual summer cruise, from which they have derived much practical information in their profession. The report of the cruise is herewith transmitted.

The store-ship Relief, under Lieutenant Cooke, returned to New York in January, having conveyed stores to the squadron on the coast of Brazil. The store-ship Supply, under Lieutenant A. F. V. Gray, performed a similar duty, sailing from New York in April, returning in August, and has since sailed with stores for the African and Brazil squadrons.

The bark Release, under Lieutenant Simms, dispatched in November, 1856, under the direction of the Department of the Interior, to Dem-arara and Venezuela, to procure cuttings of sugar cane, returned to New Orleans in February, with three hundred tons of the cuttings. She landed her cargo, proceeded to New York, and arrived there March 19. In June, under Lieutenant Brasher, she sailed from New York for Aspinwall with stores for the squadron in the Pacific, and in August returned to Boston.

In accordance with the joint resolution of Congress approved August 23, 1856, the bark Resolute, late one of an English exploring squadron, abandoned in the Arctic seas, purchased by the United States from her salvors, and thoroughly repaired and refitted, was tendered to the British Government.

As stated in the last annual report, the Resolute, under the command of Commander Hartstene, sailed from New York for England November 13, 1856; she arrived at Portsmouth December 12, and on the 16th was delivered to the Queen of Great Britain in person. Commander Hartstene performed the duty assigned him to the entire satisfaction of the Department, and was received in England, both by Government and people, with every manifestation of the high appreciation with which they regarded this signal mark of courtesy and friendly feeling on the part of the Government and people of the United States.

The act of March 3, 1857, "to expedite telegraphic communication for the uses of the Government in its foreign intercourse," authorized the employment of two ships in laying down a telegraphic cable from the coast of Newfoundland to the coast of Ireland. The Niagara, then at New York, nearly ready for sea, was ordered to England to aid in the enterprise. She left New York, under the command of Captain Hudson, on the 23d of April, and arrived in England on the 12th of May. The Susquehanna, under Captain Sands, then in the Mediterranean, was also directed to proceed to England, and to accompany the Niagara across the Atlantic, rendering such assistance as she might require. These vessels, with those designated for the same purpose by the Government of Great Britain, assembled in the Cove of Cork, and on the 6th of August, the Niagara commenced laying down the telegraphic cable. After about three hundred and thirty-four miles of it had been laid, it parted, without fault of the officers or crew of the Niagara, and the fleet returned to Plymouth. The Niagara was ordered, after landing the cable, to return to New York, and has arrived. The Susquehanna returned to the Mediterranean. She has since received orders to join the home squadron, at Key West, and has probably, at that point, received her orders to proceed to San Juan del Norte, with the special instructions which accompanied them.

The act of March 3, 1857, making appropriations for the naval service, appropriated $49,000 "to enable the Secretary of the Navy to arm and man the ordnance ship Plymouth, with a view to the improvement of ordnance and gunnery practice." She was accordingly put in commission, and, on the 7th July, sent to sea on a six months' cruise, under Commander Dahlgren. Her armament consisted of four nine-inch shell guns, one eleven-inch shell pivot gun, two twenty-four-pounder and one twelve-pounder howitzers. She was ordered to cruise by the Azores to Lisbon, along the coast of France to Amsterdam, and, returning, to touch at Southampton or Bristol and the Bermuda Islands.

Commander Dahlgren, having completed the cruise, has returned to this port, and will continue the drill necessary to perfect the training of such seamen as have been found capable of receiving it. The Plymouth encountered long-continued boisterous weather on her return homeward, with some heavy gales, during which the heaviest of the cannon were secured perfectly with ordinary lashings, and were as well under control in a rough sea, when cast loose for practice, as could be desired. One hundred and twenty-one shells were fired at sea, during the cruise, from the eleven-inch pivot gun, and "without experiencing any of the difficulties usually supposed to render such heavy ordnance nearly unavailable on shipboard."

The result of the operations of the Plymouth seems to dispel all remaining doubt whether the heavy cannon which she carried would be manageable, and not only to justify the previous adoption of such ordnance in the steam frigates recently built, but also to render it expedient to extend this plan of armament. I earnestly recommend a renewal of the appropriation, and the permanent employment of a ship on this duty.

The act of March 3, 1857, making appropriations for the naval service, directed the Secretary of the Navy "to have prepared, and to report to Congress for its approval, a code of regulations for the government of the Navy." To aid me in the performance of this duty, I convened in Washington, on the 10th of August, a board of officers, consisting of a captain, commander, lieutenant, the lieutenant colonel of the marine corps, a purser, and a surgeon, to prepare a code of regulations conforming to the requirements of the act. They are diligently engaged in the work, and have made such progress that I shall be able to submit a report to Congress at an early day.

The same act appropriated $25,000 to verify the survey of the Attrato and Truando rivers, with a view to a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Measures were immediately taken by the War and Navy Departments to organize an expedition for this object. Lieutenant Craven, of the Navy, and Lieutenant Michler, of the topographical engineers of the Army, were, by your direction, assigned to this duty. The schooner Varina, of the Coast Survey, temporarily placed at the control of this Department, was prepared at the New York navy-yard for this special service, and, with suitable hydrographical and topographical parties on board, set sail on the 12th of October for the Gulf of Darien. When we consider the magnitude of the object; the influence it is destined to have upon commerce, if accomplished; its effect in binding together in closer relations the remotest parts of our Confederacy, we cannot fail to regard any hopeful enterprise having this object in view as fraught with the deepest interest. It is not without hope, founded upon reliable information, that this enterprise is undertaken.

By the same act of March 3, 1857, making appropriations for the naval service, the sum of $25,000 was appropriated to extend and complete the exploration of the Parana and the tributaries of the Paraguay. Early in the season an arrangement was made with Mr. R. B. Forbes, of Boston, for the construction, at his own expense, of a steamer of suitable size and draught for the navigation of those rivers, to be delivered by him at some convenient point on the La Plata, and chartered by the Government for the time that will necessarily be occupied in the survey. The contract for the charter of the vessel has been duly executed. She is now nearly completed, and will soon proceed to the La Plata. It is proposed to send out Commander T. J. Page, with proper officers and men, to meet her there, and to enter upon the exploration authorized by Congress.

The Government of Paraguay having prohibited the navigation by foreign vessels of that part of the river Paraguay which lies within its jurisdiction, some difficulty may possibly arise in completing that portion of the survey; but there are many rivers embraced within the scope of the act, the exploration and navigation of which will probably develop great commercial advantages.

Commander Page informs the Department that four charts of the former survey have been already printed; that the greater portion of the remaining sheets are ready for the engravers; and that the construction and topography of the whole work will be completed in six months, if not delayed by them.

The work of publishing the survey of the late expedition to the North Pacific and Behring's Straits, under Commander Rodgers, is rapidly advancing. Engagements have been made with eminent professors in the various branches of natural history for describing the most interesting of the zoological specimens brought home by the expedition. A portion of the hydrographical work is in the hands of the engraver; the rest in a state of forwardness.

Congress, at its last session, authorized the enlistment of eight thousand five hundred men for the Navy, instead of seven thousand five hundred, the former limit. This increase enabled the Department to employ more vessels of war at sea; but the number of marines has not been increased, so that guards can be provided for them. To obviate this difficulty, under the authority of the naval appropriation act of March 3, 1849, you directed the employment of two hundred landsmen as marines, in addition to the two hundred authorized to be so employed by one of your predecessors. By this arrangement the number employed as privates in the marine corps amounts to thirteen hundred and sixty-eight, while the number of landsmen is thereby diminished. I would respectfully recommend, as has been done by my predecessors, that the privates of this corps be increased. Two thousand men are deemed necessary for the ordinary detail of the service.

Wishing to give greater efficiency to this important branch of the service, I have recently directed that there be furnished to the headquarters of the corps a battery of two thirty-two-pounders and four of Dahlgren's field guns, that the officers and men may be instructed in their drill before being sent to sea. They will then be able to act as infantry, serve a division of heavy artillery on ship-board, or the field pieces on landing.

The naval appropriation act of August 15, 1856, appropriated $96,000 for the erection and completion of marine barracks at Brooklyn, New York, and $60,000 for the same purpose at Pensacola, Florida.

The site for those at Brooklyn requiring piling and filling in, not yet completed, proposals have not been invited for the erection of barracks there. Proposals for those at Pensacola were invited by my predecessor; but as the lowest bid was beyond the limit of the appropriation, plans and specifications were directed to be made for smaller buildings, and on the 21st of September proposals were again invited. Seventeen were received, and those of Mahon & Gibbon for $53,847, being the lowest, the contract was awarded to them.

The marine barracks at Boston, Philadelphia, and Norfolk, are represented to be contracted and entirely unfit for use; and the commandant of the corps recommends that provision be made to purchase ground and erect suitable buildings at those places.

I would respectfully invite your attention to General Henderson's report for the general condition of the corps.

Two appropriations, each of $20,000, have been made for the construction and completion of a coal depot at Key West, in Florida. A wharf has been built, but the foundation having partially failed, it is deemed unsafe. A coal shed has been commenced, but is neither covered in nor paved. The constructing engineer reports that a similar one, parallel to it, is needed for soft coal, that having been designed for anthracite; that the sheds will be of little use without a substantial and permanent wharf from which vessels can receive their supply; that the site of the present wharf is excellent, having a depth of water of twenty-five feet; that the construction of two railway tracks from the wharf to the coal sheds will be necessary; and that to complete what he proposes, would require an appropriation of $175,000, the former appropriation having been exhausted.

In view of the admirable position of Key West for conveniently supplying with coal the steamers of the home squadron, I would earnestly recommend that suitable provision be made, by legislation, for the completion, upon a proper scale and in an economical manner, of this important public work.

The act of January 28, 1857, authorized the President to purchase a site for a naval depot on Blythe Island, in the State of Georgia, and to erect such buildings, and to make such improvements, as may be necessary to repair vessels-of-war, and to afford them refuge. A board of officers, consisting of Captain McIntosh, Commander Hartstene, Lieutenant Brooke, and a civil engineer, Mr. Calvin Brown, were directed to examine the island and the adjacent waters. In pursuance of their report, about one thousand one hundred acres of the southern portion of the island have been purchased for $130,000. The Attorney General having certified that the title is good, and the State of Georgia having consented to the purchase, and thereby ceded the requisite jurisdiction, the purchase money has been paid. Immediate steps will be taken to prepare the site for the purposes expressed in the act of Congress.

The war steamer building at Hoboken by the executor of Robert L. Stevens was first authorized by the act of April 14, 1842. The present contract provides that Mr. Stevens should build the vessel on his own plan, and deliver her to the Government for the sum of $586,717 84; and that, after the sum of $500,000 should have been paid on account, she should be examined by a board; and if she could be completed for the balance of the appropriation, then it should be paid. This balance of $86,717 84 has been appropriated by Congress to enable the Department promptly to make the payment when it should be due. On the 19th of February, 1856, a board was appointed; and, in their report of March 7, 1856, they estimate that, in addition to the sum of $500,000 already paid, there will be required the further sum of $812,033 63 to complete the vessel. The balance appropriated August 16, 1856, remains, therefore, in the Treasury.

Mr. Stevens and his executor have expended upon the vessel the sum of $702,755 37. It is now proposed by the executor that the balance of the contract price—that is to say, the sum of $86,717 84—be paid to him from time to time as an equal amount in work and materials shall hereafter be put upon the vessel, the same being secured to the Government by a pledge of the whole. As the vessel is already virtually owned by the Government, and will be of little value unless completed, it is deemed proper to invite attention to the inquiry whether it may not be expedient to authorize the application of the balance in aid of the means of the executor, and in the mode proposed, to the accomplishment of the work.

The Naval Academy, at Annapolis, now under the charge of Captain Blake, the successor of Captain Goldsborough in the administration of this important and delicate trust, is in a flourishing condition. It is to the Navy what the Military Academy is to the Army—an institution not merely of great utility, but of indispensable necessity, without which, in the present state of science, an accomplished and efficient corps of officers could not be secured. There are now attached to it, for purposes of instruction, one hundred and seventy-six acting midshipmen. At the close of the last academic year fifteen graduated, and eighty-nine have since been admitted.

The report of the last annual board of inspecting officers speaks in terms of high commendation of the discipline and police regulations of the institution; of the performance of the students in field artillery and infantry tactics; in the exercise of the great guns in battery, and in shell and shot practice at the target; of the admirable acquirements of the graduating class, and of the successful management of the academy, now no longer an experiment. It also proposes some measures deserving earnest consideration, and others which in due time ought to be carried into effect.

The joint resolution of March 3, 1857, directing the Secretary of the Navy to cause medals to be struck and presented to Dr. Kane, his officers and men, I have been unable to carry into effect, because Congress accidentally omitted to make an appropriation for that object.

When I entered upon my duties in this Department I found a naval court of inquiry already organized under the act of January 16, 1857. Deeming it important that the investigation directed by that act should be brought to an early conclusion, I immediately organized two additional courts. These three courts have prosecuted their labors with great assiduity. The result in many cases has been presented to you. As to all those cases in which the courts have recommended restoration to the active list, or to the service, or a transfer from furlough to leave pay, you have approved the action of the courts; and when you shall have presented corresponding nominations to the Senate, you will have done as to them all which this act has committed to your discretion. As to those cases in which the courts have recommended no change, the action of the President, whether it be that of approval or disapproval, will not vary the result, but leave the parties in statu quo, as if there had been no inquiry. The President having no power to change the state of any person already in the Navy, except by dismissal, or by promotion with the advice and consent of the Senate, or to restore any person to it except by a new appointment, with the advice and consent of the same body, it is obvious that little could be done to remove or palliate the presumed evil which it was the object of that act to remedy, except by the prompt execution of the act itself. Unwilling to be drawn into any allegation against those officers who had been affected by the action of the retiring board, I examined the act of Congress to see if any such duty had been imposed upon me. I found that it admitted no latitude of construction. It directed a definite inquiry. It prescribed the exact limits of the investigation. It left in the Department no power to enlarge, or to restrict, or to modify. It directed the physical, mental, professional, and moral fitness of the officer for the naval service to be investigated by a court of inquiry. Accordingly the precept to the court in every case directed that precise inquiry. Instructions were given to the judges-advocate in every instance where the party desired it, to take the initiative, and to present all the evidence which they intended to introduce before the party should be called upon to respond to it, and then to give him ample opportunity. They were directed to consent to depositions when necessary or convenient. They were instructed, when reasonable objection should be made to any court, to give way to it, and to interpose no obstacle to the transfer of the case to another court, to which there should be no objection. These instructions were given to insure a fair, impartial, and faithful execution of the intentions of Congress.

The policy has been adopted of shortening the period of the cruise in all remote seas, and several ships have been ordered home in pursuance of it. The necessity of the change has been long felt. It will conduce to the preservation of the health of both officers and men. Long exposed to the enervating influences of hot climates, they are often broken down, or their usefulness in after life impaired. It will facilitate enlistments. Making the service more acceptable to seamen by more frequently returning them to their homes, it will make them more ready to engage in it. It will promote economy. The ships returning from a short cruise of two years, will be ready for sea again without being subject to those searching repairs to which they are generally subjected after one long absence, in view of another equally long. It will contribute to the increased activity, efficiency, and usefulness of the Navy, by making it more a school of actual experience to officers and seamen, and by presenting our ships more frequently wherever there shall be a American commerce or American citizens to be protected. These considerations have led to the adoption of this change, and it will probably be permanent, unless experience shall disprove its utility.

At the same time the proportion of landsmen and boys allotted to a national ship has been increased. There is often great difficulty in obtaining seamen, and still greater in obtaining American seamen—the best in the world for the United States service. The employment of landsmen and boys contributes much to remedy the inconvenience. They soon become trained and fit to take the place of seamen; and instead of being starving supernumeraries in the population of the larger cities, they become efficient and useful members of an improving and valuable class, without which neither a naval nor mercantile marine can be sustained.

Congress having, at its last session, authorized the building of five steam sloops, and appropriated $1,000,000 towards the object, measures have been taken for their immediate construction. They will be built at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Norfolk, and Pensacola—one at each of those places. That at New York will be built by contract, in the yard of Mr. Jacob A. Westervelt. The act having expressly authorized their construction by contract or otherwise, it has been deemed expedient to commit one of them wholly to private enterprise. The object is to open the way to improvement, by summoning the skill and genius of the country to contest the palm of superiority with the navy-yards in the endeavor to give the Government the best sloop-of-war that can be built. But as the Government has its own establishments, provided at immense cost, and thoroughly organized and supplied with the requisite materials, it was thought to be expedient, and, indeed, necessary, to employ them in the construction of the others. The Department, after having advertised for the best model, plan, and specifications, and received thirteen proposals, organized a board composed of the most experienced naval officers, naval constructors, and chief engineers, to aid in awarding the contract according to the terms of the advertisement. I am confident that the result, both as to the ship built by the private contractor, and those built at the navy-yards, will reach as high a point of excellence as is at present attainable. They will be constructed with water-tight compartments—an improvement in the mode of construction which, in case of disaster, will often save the ship from going to the bottom, and ought generally to be introduced where many lives are at stake.

The act authorizing the five sloops-of-war, having specified the class of vessels to be built, did not admit of the construction of small steamers of light draught, which are very much wanted in the public service. For some years past the Government has had no means of supplying its indispensable wants, except by hiring small steamers as occasion might require. At this moment, when much needed, we have no vessels which can penetrate the rivers of China. We have few that can enter most of the harbors south of Norfolk. Harbors which are the recipients of hundreds of millions of our commerce are not accessible to most of our public ships. This state of destitution is so remarkable that it should attract particular attention, especially as some of our greatest interests and most vulnerable points are thus left exposed. Besides, this class of steamers, of light draught, great speed, and heavy guns, would be formidable in coast defense. They cost but little in construction, and require but little to keep them in commission, and, for most practical purposes in time of peace, are as effective as larger vessels, and often more so. One or more of them should be at every point where we maintain a squadron. Three or four should be constantly employed on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Economy, efficiency, and utility, combine to recommend them as almost indispensable. Ten of them would be of incalculable advantage to the naval service, and would cost $2,300,000.

Under the present small appropriation for testing improvements, several trials have been made; but the Department feels itself crippled by the limited appropriation. The sum of $10,000 is not adequate to do justice to improvements which promise public utility. Men of inventive genius are so devoted to the one favorite pursuit that they are most frequently without the means necessary to test their inventions. Were Congress to appropriate tenfold the sum now allotted to this object for naval purposes, a single successful result, after a hundred failures, would reimburse the whole cost, while the influence of the measure in aiding the progress of improvement in the naval service could hardly be overestimated.

It is impossible, without doing injustice, to give a summary of the reports of the chiefs of bureaus of this Department. They have presented a full and detailed statement of the condition of the service in the respective branches committed to their particular charge; of public works prosecuted, of improvements introduced, of evils remedied, and many suggestions and recommendations which deserve the consideration of Congress. Their reports exhibit detailed statements of the expenditures of the present, and estimates for the ensuing fiscal year. I commend them to particular attention, as exhibiting a full view of the actual condition of the Navy and its auxiliary establishments, so far as they are under the immediate supervision of the bureaus.

The estimates for the support of the Navy and marine corps, and for all other objects under the control of the Navy Department, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, are—

For the support of the Navy and marine corps$9,749,515 01
For special objects..... 4,866,783 22

Making.....$14,616,298 23

The aggregate estimates for the fiscal year ending June, 1858, were $13,803,212 77, being $813,085 less than the present estimates. This difference is principally caused by estimating $250,000 for the armament for the five new sloops, $350,000 more than last year for building the sloops, and by estimating for provisions and pay for one thousand additional men, authorized by the act of March 3, 1857.

The expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1857, for all purposes under the control of the Department, were $12,632,696 81; of which $4,343,698 14 being for special objects, the legitimate expenses of the Navy and marine corps for that period were $8,288,997 67.

A review of the present condition of the Navy, and of the establishments connected with it, has afforded me great gratification. I see in them, taken in connection with our commercial marine and our immense resources, the means of promptly putting afloat a naval force equal to any exigency likely to arise in the history of the country.

It is not the policy of our Government to maintain a great navy in time of peace. It is against its settled policy to burden the resources of the people by an overgrown naval establishment. It is universally admitted to be inexpedient to endeavor to compete with other great commercial Powers in the magnitude of their naval preparations. But it is the true policy of our Government to take care that its Navy, within its limited extent, should be unsurpassed in its efficiency and its completeness, and that our preparatory arrangements should be such that no event shall take us altogether by surprise.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ISAAC TOUCEY,
Secretary of the Navy.

To the PRESIDENT.

Report of the Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON, December 5, 1857.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the condition and operations of the Army during the past year.

The Army consists of nineteen regiments, divided into ten of infantry, four of artillery, two of dragoons, two of cavalry, and one of mounted riflemen. The whole strength of the Army, as posted, consists of about 17,984 men; and the actual strength, on the 1st of July last, was 15,764. In addition to the movements which the troops have been called on to make this year, which are set forth in a separate paper, prepared by the Adjutant General and herewith transmitted, this force is called upon to garrison sixty-eight forts of a large and permanent character, so far, at least, as it is possible to supply men for the purpose; and to occupy seventy posts less permanently established, where the presence of a force is absolutely required. The area over which these forts and posts are spread embraces a circuit of about three million square miles, and requires a journey of many thousand miles to visit the principal ones of them.

The external boundary of our country, requiring throughout a more or less vigilant military supervision, is eleven thousand miles in length, presenting every variety of climate and temperature, from the inclement cold of our Canada frontier to the tropical regions of southern Texas. But the occupation of this long line of frontier is a trifling difficulty in comparison with that of protecting the double line of Indian frontier, extending from the Lake of the Woods to the banks of the Rio Grande, on the east side of the Rocky Mountains, and from beyond the river Oregon, on the British frontier, to the head of the Gulf of California, on the western slope of those mountains. Superadded to these lines, requiring to be occupied, are the great lines of intercommunication between the valley of the Mississippi and the Pacific ocean, which imperatively demand that protection which only the United States troops can furnish. These lines are very long, and are now extremely important, whilst every year renders them more and more so. From our western frontier of settlements to those of northern Oregon the distance is about one thousand eight hundred miles; from the same frontier to the settlements of California, via Salt Lake, is one thousand eight hundred miles; from the frontier of Arkansas, at Fort Smith, by Albuquerque or Santa Fe, to Fort Tejon, is about one thousand seven hundred miles; and from San Antonio, by El Paso, to San Diego, near the borders of the white settlements, is one thousand four hundred miles; constituting an aggregate line of six thousand seven hundred miles which ought to be occupied, and which we pretend, in some sort, to keep open and defend.

This simple statement of facts demonstrates, stronger than any arguments could do, the absolute necessity for an increase of the Army.

The policy of our Government and the spirit of our people are alike opposed to a large standing army, and very properly so; but if an army is needful at all, it should be organized in such manner as to answer the purposes for which it is required. Its numbers should correspond with the service it is intended to perform. If from any disproportion in this respect it stops short of efficiency, it becomes insignificant, and entails upon the country expenditures wholly incommensurate with any service it can render.

It will not be denied that an army, properly organized and of sufficient strength, constitutes at once the cheapest and most efficient means by which the indispensable services it is designed to perform can be secured by the Government.

There is no substitute for an army; and to render it at once economical and efficient, adequate numbers are essential. If there is a higher duty than another devolved upon a well-regulated Government, it is to afford perfect protection to its citizens against outrage and personal violence; yet this great obligation is not performed by the Government of the United States. For a large portion of the year, scarcely a week elapses without bringing to us intelligence of some Indian massacre, or outrage more shocking than death itself; and it most frequently happens that these acts go unpunished altogether, either from the want of troops for pursuit, or from their remoteness from the scenes of slaughter, which renders pursuit useless.

In former times, when the hardy pioneer was allured away from the line of white settlements by fertile lands alone, he scarcely ventured so far as to be beyond succor and protection from those he left behind. But far different is the state of things at present. Our Pacific settlements, with their great inducements of rich lands, salubrious climate, and fabulous mineral treasures, present to the inhabitants of the Atlantic States temptations to emigration which the privations of an intervening wilderness and desert, and continual danger from roving bands of savages hanging upon their march for many hundred miles together, cannot deter them from undertaking. This migration strengthens the natural ties between the Atlantic and Pacific States, and adds immensely to the defensive strength of that remote region. Justice and humanity alike demand protection for these emigrants at the hands of our Government.

To render governmental protection to our vast frontier and emigration perfect, a very large augmentation of the Army would not be required. Five additional regiments would answer the purpose if properly posted.

It will be seen from a paper carefully prepared from reliable data by the Adjutant General, that no increase of our forces is so efficient, or near so cheap, as the augmentation of our regular Army.

A line of posts running parallel with our frontier, but near to the Indians' usual habitations, placed at convenient distances and suitable positions, and occupied by infantry, would exercise a salutary restraint upon the tribes, who would feel that any foray by their warriors upon the white settlements would meet with prompt retaliation upon their own homes. In addition to this means of defense, there should be concentrated along our own frontier, at eligible points, large bodies of efficient horse, all or any portion of which could, upon the opening of spring and the first appearance of grass, march to punish aggression or repress any spirit of insubordination. These cantonments for cavalry should be established at points where corn and hay are abundant and cheap. The present is a favorable period for the choice of permanent locations, for the reason that upon a large portion of our northwest frontier, particularly, settlements have nearly reached the limits of cultivable lands, beyond which, while there are spots of rich soil and tolerable pasturage, they are not sufficient for extended settlement. Hence there is no likelihood of military stations being left, as heretofore, in the heart of a thickly-populated country, after the lapse of a very few years. The posts selected in the manner now indicated would become useless only when the Indian tribes ceased to be formidable, or disappear altogether, for they would be upon the line of permanent frontier, which has now been reached.

The concentration of these large bodies of horse at eligible points upon our borders would have the best influence both upon the discipline and effectiveness of the corps. Throughout the winter, when field operations were impossible, the men could be perfectly drilled, and the horses would be put in complete order for the most active and arduous service in the earliest spring. This double line of defense would constitute a perfect protection to the settlements, in the first place, and would soon prove for the most economical system of frontier protection, because it would greatly diminish and cheapen the transportation of military stores and munitions of war, which is now the chief source of our most unsatisfactory frontier expenditure. The infantry stations would not necessarily be large, and supplies could be furnished them from convenient points at very moderate rates.

For these reasons, and many others which readily suggest themselves, I venture to submit to you the propriety of asking from Congress an increase of the Army. I am strengthened in my convictions of its propriety from the recommendations of my predecessor, whose thorough knowledge of the Army and its requirements give his opinions great weight, and from the recommendations, also, of the General-in-Chief.

The Army has been very actively and constantly engaged in the performance of arduous and important duties. The Indian war in Florida claimed the attention of a strong force, composed mainly of the fifth infantry and fourth artillery, during the spring and early part of the summer. This war has been prosecuted with all the vigor which the character of the country and that of the enemy would admit of. The country is a perpetual succession of swamps and morasses, almost impenetrable, and the Indians partake rather of the nature of beasts of the chase than of men capable of resisting in fight a military power. Their only strength lies in a capacity to elude pursuit.

Exigent affairs in the West demanded the removal of those two regiments from Florida to the Territory of Kansas; but they have been replaced by volunteers, and the pursuit of the Indians has been continued by the latter troops up to the present time. The services rendered by these volunteer troops have been spoken of in terms of merited commendation in the reports of officers in command.

Two very important and momentous subjects forced themselves upon the attention of this Department at an early period of my incumbency. These were the complications growing out of the troubles in the Territory of Kansas, and the still more involved and difficult relations borne by the Territory of Utah towards this Government. The latter has recently assumed a very threatening attitude, of which I will presently speak.

The very anxious and earnest representations of danger to the public peace which were made by the Governor of Kansas, growing out of exasperations between the different political parties there, and his earnest call for a large body of troops, required the transfer of the tenth regiment of infantry and fourth regiment of artillery to Fort Leavenworth, and also the recall of Colonel Sumner's command, then in the field, and that engaged in marking the southern boundary of Kansas, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Johnson, of the first cavalry. From other quarters, likewise, troops were moved to Kansas, until a force was concentrated there sufficient, in the opinion of the Governor, to repress all insubordination and to insure the peace of the Territory. The result has fully answered the expectations of that distinguished functionary. The peace of Kansas has been undisturbed.

The requisite provision, however, for this desirable object, agreeably to the wishes of the Governor, necessitated a very important modification of the plans then already determined upon with regard to the movement of troops to Utah. A large portion of both horse and foot, intended for this distant service, was detached and remained behind, leaving the expedition to proceed with the fifth and tenth infantry, the batteries of Captains Phelps and Reno, with a part of the second dragoons, which followed long after the head of the column had set out on the march.

UTAH AND THE EXPEDITION THITHER.

This subject has very recently assumed so extraordinary and important an attitude, that I deem it proper to dwell upon it somewhat more at length than, under other circumstances, would have been required.

The Territory of Utah is peopled almost exclusively by the religious sect known as Mormons. From the time their numbers reached a point sufficient to constitute a community capable of anything like independent action, this people have claimed the right to detach themselves from the binding obligations of the laws which governed the communities where they chanced to live. They have substituted for the laws of the land a theocracy, having for its head an individual whom they profess to believe a prophet of God. This prophet demands obedience, and receives it implicitly from his people, in virtue of what he assures them to be authority derived from revelations received by him from Heaven. Whenever he finds it convenient to exercise any special command, these opportune revelations of a higher law come to his aid. From his decrees there is no appeal; against his will there is no resistance. The general plan by which this system is perpetuated consists in calling into active play the very worst traits of the human character. Religious fanaticism, supported by imposture and fraud, is relied on to enslave the dull and ignorant; whilst the more crafty and less honest are held together by stimulating their selfishness and licensing their appetites and lusts. Running counter, as their tenets and practices do, to the cherished truths of Christian morality, it is not to be wondered at that, wherever these people have resided, discord and conflict with the legal authorities have steadily characterized their history.

From the first hour they fixed themselves in that remote and almost inaccessible region of our territory, from which they are now sending defiance to the sovereign power, their whole plan has been to prepare for a successful secession from the authority of the United States, and a permanent establishment of their own. They have practiced an exclusiveness unlike anything ever before known in a Christian country, and have inculcated a jealous distrust of all whose religious faith differed from their own, whom they characterize under the general denomination of Gentiles. They have filled their ranks and harems chiefly from the lowest classes of foreigners, although some parts of the United States have likewise contributed to their numbers. They are now formidable from their strength, and much more so from the remoteness of their position and the difficulty of traversing the country between our frontiers and Great Salt Lake. This Mormon brotherhood has scarcely preserved the semblance of obedience to the authority of the United States for some years past; not at all, indeed, except as it might confer some direct benefit upon themselves, or contribute to circulate public money in their community. Whenever it suited their temper or caprice, they have set the United States authority at defiance. Of late years, a well-founded belief has prevailed that the Mormons were instigating the Indians to hostilities against our citizens, and were exciting among the Indian tribes a feeling of insubordination and discontent.

I need not recite here the many instances in their conduct and history on which these general allegations are founded, especially the conduct they have adopted within the last twelve months towards the civil authorities of the United States.

It has, nevertheless, always been the policy and desire of the Federal Government to avoid collision with this Mormon community. It has borne with the insubordination they have exhibited under circumstances when respect for their own authority has frequently counseled harsh measures of discipline. And this forbearance might still be prolonged, and the evils life among them be allowed to work out their own cure, if this community occupied any other theater, isolated and remote from the seats of civilization, than the one they now possess. But, unfortunately for these views, their settlements lie in the great pathway which leads from our Atlantic States to the new and flourishing communities growing up upon our Pacific sea-board. They stand a lion in the path; not only themselves defying the military and civil authorities of the Government, but encouraging, if not exciting, the nomad savages who roam over the vast unoccupied regions of the continent to the pillage and massacre of peaceful and helpless emigrant families traversing the solitudes of the wilderness. The rapid settlement of our Pacific possessions; the rights in those regions of emigrants, unable to afford the heavy expenses of transit by water and the isthmus; the facility and safety of military, commercial, political, and social intercommunication between our eastern and western populations and States, all depend upon the prompt, absolute, and thorough removal of a hostile power besetting this path midway of its route, at a point where succor and provisions should always be found, rather than obstruction, privation, and outrage. However anxiously the Government might desire to avoid a collision with this or any other community of people under its jurisdiction, yet it is not possible for it to postpone the duty of reducing to subordination a rebellious fraternity besetting one of the most important avenues of communication traversing its domain, and not only themselves defying its authority, but stimulating the irresponsible savages hovering along the highway to acts of violence indiscriminately upon all ages, sexes, and conditions of wayfarers.

From all the circumstances surrounding this subject at the time, it was thought expedient during the past summer to send a body of troops to Utah with the civil officers recently appointed to that Territory. As the intention then was merely to establish these functionaries in the offices to which they had been commissioned, and to erect Utah into a geographical military department, the force then dispatched and now en route to the Territory was thought to be amply sufficient for these purposes. Supplies were abundant there, and the position was favorable for holding the Indians in check throughout the whole circumjacent region of country. It was hardly within the line of reasonable probability that these people would put themselves beyond the pale of reconciliation with the Government by acts of unprovoked, open, and wanton rebellion. It will be seen, however, from the documents accompanying this report, that flagrant acts of rebellion have been committed by them, in the face of positive assurances given them that the intention of the Government in sending troops into the military department of Utah was entirely pacific.

Great care had been taken, in preparing for the march to Utah, that nothing should seem to excite apprehension of any action on the part of the army in the least conflicting with the fixed principles of our institutions, by which the military is strictly subordinate to the civil authority. The instructions to the commanding officer were deliberately considered and carefully drawn; and he was charged not to allow any conflict to take place between the troops and the people of the Territory, except only in case he should be called on by the Governor for soldiers to act as a posse comitatus in enforcing obedience to the laws.

In conformity with this sentiment, and to assure these people of the real intention of the movement, an active, discreet officer was sent in advance of the army to Utah, for the purpose of purchasing provisions for it, and of assuring the people of the Territory of the peaceful intentions of the Government. This duty was faithfully performed; the chief men of the fraternity were assured that no violence was intended towards them or any one, and that nothing could be further from the intention of the Government or the army than to molest any one for their religious opinions, however abhorrent they might be to the principles of Christian morality. This officer found, upon entering the Territory, that these deluded people had already, in advance of his arrival, or of any information, except as to the march of the column, determined to resist their approach, and prevent, if possible, and by force, the entrance of the army into the valley of Salt Lake. Supplies of every sort were refused him. The day after his departure from the city, on his way back, Brigham Young issued his proclamation, substantially declaring war against the United States, and, at the same time, putting the Territory under martial law. The facts connected with this mission of Captain Van Vliet will appear more in detail from his reports, herewith transmitted.

In view of the menacing attitude of affairs in Utah, and of the importance of a prompt and thorough suppression of the spirit of rebellion reigning there, I must repeat my recommendation of five new regiments, which I am persuaded is the very smallest addition to the Army which the exigencies of the service will allow.

THE STAFF.

Attention has been repeatedly called to defects in the organization of the Army, and to various details in reference to several of its parts. As these evils increase with time and practice under them, I must again bring them before you.

The basis of our existing system is the British army as it served in the colonies before the Revolution, retaining many of the defects, since corrected in Great Britain, under the experience and necessities of long wars. Provisions inconsistent with the existing system, copied from other nations, and partial legislation designed for particular interests, have augmented these evils, and we have committed the fault of adapting our fundamental organization to a time of peace, instead of basing it on the exigencies of war.

One of the greatest errors of detail is the separate, independent character of our staff corps. This removes them from their proper position as aids or assistants to the commander, and constitutes them his equals. It contracts the sphere of observation and experience, and thus unfits the officer for change or advancement, and begets an accumulation of precedent and prerogative at war with the vital principle of military organization—the inviolable and undivided authority of the head. He is bound, as they are, by the law, and his construction of it should govern them, not theirs him.

Another defect is the uncertain and ill-defined rights of brevet rank. We have adopted the word, but not its signification, from the English rule, and applied it to circumstances not contemplated or existing when first established. Repeated decisions and imperfect legislation have only increased the evil by inviting new discussions and adopting new constructions.

We have retained another fault, abandoned, at least practically, in almost every service among civilized nations, even the most aristocratic and monarchical. This is promotion by seniority. Age and experience should bring excellence; but the test lies in the actual possession of the latter, and not merely in the circumstances which it is assumed should produce it. Seniority, with the requirements essential for position, ought certainly to give precedence; but without these, that dignity and respect which belong to rank and command can never be secured.

All that has been urged in favor of retaining it with us is the danger of political or personal favor governing a selection. There may be danger from this source, but, by the rule of seniority, the worst officer of any arm must, if he lives, come to be one of the most important and responsible officers under the Government—the colonel of a regiment. By selection, it is possible that the very best may not be always chosen, though the chances are in favor of this hypothesis; but certainly the very worst never will be, and this is surely a gain on the present rule.

To correct these and other evils, I would urge so to provide by law for the construction of the regiments of horse, artillery, and infantry, as to approach them, as far as our circumstances require, to the practice of all nations long experienced in war, and so as to admit their contraction for peace and their reëxpansion in war without altering this basis.

This can be done without any increase of officers or men, or augmentation of expense, by merely arranging those already in service and the companies of each corps to suit the end proposed.

To place the staff in proper relation to the rest of the Army, the law should collect all the officers doing that branch of duty into one corps, to be assigned by authority of the President to such duties as each may seem to be best fitted for, securing to each the rank and relative position he now holds. But, as some staff corps are confined to duties requiring special instruction and long experience, their separate organization might be retained.

A general provision dispensing with the staff bureaus and giving the President authority to regulate the duties on the principles above stated, and to transfer, when necessary, officers to and from the line and staff, would restore the institution to its proper effectiveness. Thus, the staff near the War Department, representing the authority of the constitutional commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy, would bear the same relation to him as the staff attached to a corps in the field have to the colonel or general who commands it.

To avoid, for the future, the difficulties attending brevet rank, the best plan is to create, permanently, the general offices now exercised under brevets, making as many major generals and brigadier generals as the strength of the Army requires. This would afford promotion to many brevet officers of inferior rank, and thus absorb nearly all; as the strength of the Army requires these officers, and they have always existed under the brevet rank, no increase of expense would follow their being permanently established. The law should then provide that brevet rank should give no right, under any circumstances, unless by the especial assignment of the President in such case, retaining that rank as a mere honorary distinction, except in case of especial assignment, but at all times recommending the bearer as a worthy candidate for promotion.

Promotion may be made a reward of merit and an incentive to zeal by enacting that it shall take place by seniority in corps (unless in extraordinary cases) to the rank of captain, and beyond that by selection from the next grade in the same arm to that to be filled as far as colonel, inclusive. General officers to be at the choice of the President, as they now are.

Much has been said as to the propriety of separating the purchase of stores and supplies, and all moneyed accountability, from the officers proper of the Army.

This system has been adopted in France, but is objected to as giving to the civil officers thus employed an immunity from military control, injurious, if not fatal, to the interests of the service. This objection would be fully met by providing that this class of officers, without receiving military rank, or being entitled to command, should be amenable to military tribunals, and thus act under the same responsibility that the disbursing officer now does.

It is certain that an officer looking forward to military advancement and fame is tempted to incur risks on the field of battle, the fatal issue of which might ruin his family, and some of his friends, and his own reputation, through the disorder which his sudden death might bring into his pecuniary affairs.

These proposed changes would restore our military system to that simplicity which would render such amendments as experience might recommend easy and well adapted to existing circumstances.

I concur with my predecessor in other proposed ameliorations, and especially in preparing for infirm and disabled officers a competent and tranquil retreat, and for the unworthy a substantial dismissal from the service; thus securing that efficiency of the Army which will entitle it to full respect from the country, and which the country have a right to demand.

This should be applied in two ways: First, on the application of the officer; and second, on the direction of the President, as if on accusation. A board of five officers of high rank to be detailed for each case, and the examination to be conducted as though on charges before a court martial; the President to decide on the report of the court. The disposal of the officer to be one of three kinds: First, an honorable release from duty, and from any corps to which he may be attached; remaining as a supernumerary officer with the pay and emoluments of his grade, as on leave of absence: Second, to be retired from the Army, without censure or disgrace, on his pay proper, unless he forfeits it by misconduct: Third, to be retired from the Army, without pay or compensation, except a gratuity of one year's, or six or three months' pay, to secure him from the evil consequences of absolute want.

REPORT OF THE GENERAL-IN-CHIEF.

I call special attention to the report of the General-in-Chief, and ask for his recommendations a favorable consideration. It is certainly true that to call ours a peace establishment is a mere abuse of terms. It is well known that the casualties of the battle-field bear a very small proportion to the loss of life from exposure and hardship encountered in long and perilous marches, and from protracted campaigns. In every particular, with the exception only of the battle-field, no hardships encountered by any army prosecuting any war are greater than those to which a very large proportion of our troops are constantly exposed; and the dangers of battle are far from being insignificant, as the reports of these constantly recurring conflicts will abundantly show.

The plan of regimental depots for recruiting, I am confident will be very advantageous to the service. It will produce a spirit of generous rivalry, conducive in the highest degree to good discipline and military bearing. The tone of the rank and file needs elevation extremely, and every means should be resorted to tending to effect it. If our troops were massed sufficiently to insure perfect drill and discipline; if they were made soldiers instead of day-laborers; if a feeling of pride instead of degradation resulted from their connection with the service, the morale of the Army would soon take that elevation which is most desirable in all armies, and which certainly ought to be preëminent in that of a great Republic. The habit of employing soldiers as laborers is extremely detrimental to the service. They feel degraded because they are deprived of both the emoluments and the sturdy independence of the laboring man, who feels that his vocation is honorable because it is independent and free. The soldier who enters the service with some degree of military aspiration, can but resent as a wrong the order which changes him from his legitimate vocation to that of a mere operative, deprived of his fair wages. I think it would conduce greatly to the elevation of the rank and file if promotion to commission was made readily and certainly attainable by the really meritorious men in the ranks. If our Army was put upon the proper footing, the anomalous spectacle of having two thirds of our rank and file composed of foreigners would certainly not be witnessed.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The expenses of the Army have been and are constantly much augmented by the necessity of moving large bodies of troops, at the shortest possible notice, from remote points, to overawe or suppress Indian outbreaks. The temper and spirit of the Indians are entirely unknown to the War Department, except through communications from the Department of the Interior, which, of course, would never be made, except when forces are deemed necessary for the public safety. The system of defense proposed through the double line of posts, herein recommended, would, I think, in a very great measure, neutralize this evil.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

The surveys heretofore ordered by Congress to ascertain the best route for the construction of a railroad from the western boundary of our States lying west of the Mississippi to the Pacific, have been carefully made, and the results elaborately set forth in eight large volumes. In the opinion of competent judges, there is now no controversy as to the most eligible route for the railroad, assuming that all the material facts in the case have been fully ascertained. The route from El Paso to the Colorado, besides being the shortest of all yet surveyed, possesses very decided advantages over others in several important particulars. The grades are lower, the climate milder, and the distance across the desert region, common to all the routes, is less upon this. Water, too, is sufficiently abundant upon the tract of this survey; so that in selecting a railroad route between the Pacific and the valley of the Mississippi, as far as our present information goes, that by El Paso would be chosen; but the consummation of this project, freed from all other difficulties, would require immense sums of money and a great length of time. Meanwhile, other military roads very urgently require special and prompt opening and occupation. If the railroad were, to-day, completed from El Paso to the line of California, a strong and urgent necessity would still remain for maintaining and keeping open at least two of the other routes, for the passage of emigrants and the transportation of military stores to vast regions of our country accessible only by these routes. Then, as these routes are to be opened in any event, true policy and economy would seem to indicate that it should be done at once.

A line of stockade posts upon two of these routes would not require a very large force to maintain them, and, if placed at proper distances apart, would furnish certain means of a safe and rapid transportation of the mails and perfect protection to a telegraphic line from one ocean to the other, which latter object would, in itself, be worth far more to the country than the cost of the posts, and the expense of maintaining them.

EXPLORATIONS AND SURVEYS.

There is no appropriation of equal amount, in charge of this Department, that is productive of more real and substantial benefit to the public service than that for military explorations and surveys. At this time we are actually ignorant of the geography and general character of large tracts of country lying between the valley of the Mississippi and the Pacific ocean. Every day is adding new and important facts to our present stores of knowledge upon this subject. And, much as has been accomplished within the last few years, it is hazarding but little to say that we have only begun to acquire what it is so useful for us to understand thoroughly.

Two expeditions have been fitted out expressly to explore tracts of country hitherto wholly unknown. The first was sent to the northwest, beyond the waters of the Upper Missouri, towards the "Black Hills," and will, no doubt, bring valuable information. The other is engaged in exploring the Colorado of the West, of which, to this time, nothing scarcely has been accurately known. I am not without strong hope that this exploration will result in discovering the best means by which the transportation of army stores can be effected to the interior of New Mexico and Utah.

But for the assistance rendered these explorations by the troops detailed for the purpose, the appropriations would prove wholly inadequate for any material results.

I transmit herewith the report of the Bureau of Explorations and Surveys, for more detailed information of the expeditions fitted out for these purposes, and of the progress made in the experiment of artesian wells.

MILITARY ROADS.

The military roads heretofore in charge of this Department are progressing satisfactorily, under the superintendence of the officers having them in charge.

Amongst them is one from Fort Defiance to the mouth of the Mojave river, which deserves special notice from the plan adopted for its construction. The appropriation for this work was only $50,000, whilst the length of the road was about five hundred and fifty miles. I directed Edward F. Beale, Esq., to whom I intrusted the construction of this road, to pass over and survey the route throughout the entire length, to lay out the road and make it passable for wagons at all difficult places.

With this party I sent thirty-five camels of those recently imported under the direction of my predecessor. This was intended as an experiment to test the efficiency of those animals as beasts of burden and transportation through the barren and difficult country of the great mountain range separating the Mississippi valley from the Pacific ocean. From the recent reports received from Mr. Beale, it would appear that the camels are likely to answer fully the high expectations entertained of them for military purposes by the honorable Secretary who introduced them into the country.

ARTESIAN WELLS.

Nothing worthy of special note has occurred since the last report upon the subject of artesian wells. I think there is not much doubt of the feasibility of procuring abundant supplies of good water by this means, and the benefits resulting from a successful prosecution of this enterprise are too palpable to require any illustration. For military purposes, these wells are altogether indispensable. The desert country, impassable now for want of water by any considerable military force, will, upon completion of the system of wells, be easily traversed from Fort Fillmore to Albuquerque, and from Fort Union to Santa Fé. The work is still under the direction of Captain Pope, who has hitherto had it in charge.

MILITARY RESERVES.

Several military reservations, heretofore established for the occupation of troops upon the Indian frontier, having become useless for any military purposes, and calculated to retard the settlement of the country, have been sold under a law passed at the last session of Congress. With the exception of the reserve at Fort Ripley, the prices offered for these lands were satisfactory. The bids for the lands of the latter reservation being considered too low, the sale was set aside, and the property retained.

MILITARY ASYLUMS.

Under a law of the last Congress directing the sale of the western military asylum at Harrodsburg, Kentucky, an effort was made to consummate it, but without effect. After due and extensive advertisement of the day of sale, and upon the assembling of bidders, the property was offered at public outcry, but the highest sum offered was considered by the agent for the sale so inadequate that the property was withdrawn.

The asylum in this District is, to a limited extent, answering the purposes for which it was established. It furnishes a quiet and abundant home for the invalid soldiers who are admitted to it.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY.

The importance to the public service of establishing a national foundry has been so often brought to the attention of Congress by my predecessors, that nothing but a conviction of its great consequence to the public and private interests of the whole country encourages me to mention it again.

A well-managed national foundry would very speedily develop and establish facts which would add immensely to our national wealth. It is scarcely to be credited that, with the infinite variety of iron ores and their boundless extent in the United States, we should not have yet discovered a mine capable of making the very best gun, or, if such be discovered, that there are no means by which the public service can be benefited by it; but such is the fact.

A national foundry would serve as a great laboratory at which the qualities and value of metals throughout the whole Confederacy would be tested and fixed. Every variety of iron, with its especial adaptation to particular uses, would, in a few years, be familiarly known to the country, and individual enterprise would be saved in experiments many times the amount which the works would cost, whilst a great national branch of industry might, by this means, receive a legitimate and efficient encouragement.

There is but little doubt that many American iron ores are equal at least to those of Norway; and yet the national armories are driven by necessity to purchase from abroad the Norwegian iron for the manufacture of small arms. Choosing to have the best quality of arms, we must go abroad for the best quality of iron. A national foundry would soon teach to improve the manufacture of iron, and we would be saved the mortification of bringing iron from abroad, and the money, too, we have to pay for it.

The cost of heavy guns would presently be diminished, and their quality would be, undoubtedly, very materially improved.

It therefore appears to me that every consideration of sound policy and economy demands the establishment of a national foundry, which I accordingly respectfully recommend.

ORDNANCE.

The report of the Chief of Ordnance will explain in detail the condition of that most important branch of the public service. Its general operations have, in the main, been satisfactory. The manufacture of small arms at the two national armories continues with very much the same results as heretofore. The arms fabricated are of the most superior quality, although it is more than questionable whether the rifled or grooved musket is any improvement whatever upon the musket of the pattern adopted in 1842 for the use of infantry in the field.

The valuable property at Baton Rouge belonging to the Government is being greatly injured by reason of the decayed condition of the wooden inclosure, which was constructed many years since. It is, therefore, advisable that some provision be made for building a substantial iron fence, and thereby preserving the buildings and grounds, which are now subject to serious damage and constant depredation.

I would also advise that, for the purpose of still further improving the grounds, authority be given to purchase a jut of land near the principal building, and to sell a piece of land at the extreme end of the property, of little value for Government purposes. For these objects a small appropriation will be required.

As a school of practice for the artillery is established at Fort Monroe, which is much needed by the service, it is very desirable that one or two small tracts of land in the immediate vicinity of the post, and directly affected by the target firing, should belong to the Government; therefore authority ought to be given to purchase this land, and thus remove all obstructions to the satisfactory establishment of the school at this important post.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSES.

The report of the Chief Engineer will inform you of the character and condition of our sea-coast defenses. It will be seen that these works are gradually, but certainly, advancing towards completion, and, when finished, will constitute a system of maritime defenses formidable in extent, and of great magnitude.

New York, the great heart of commerce on this continent, where more and greater interests concentrate than at any point on our Atlantic coast, may be considered as impregnable from any attack from the sea when the fortifications now in progress shall be finished. The fortifications will be better, the guns heavier and more numerous than those of Sebastopol.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Upon the general system of sea-coast defense, it is hardly necessary to say a word at this day. The policy of the Government seems to be fixed in that respect; and wisely, too, no doubt, if the works be prosecuted with a wise economy. Fortifications are now very justly esteemed the cheapest and far the most effectual means of defense for every important commercial point: with the heavy guns of the present day no fleet can match a fortification; and, when completed, these works can be kept in perfect repair at a very trifling cost until needed for actual service. A fortification costing not much more than double the sum necessary to build and equip a first class line-of-battle ship, will constitute a formidable defense for a harbor, and will continue to do so throughout any length of time. The value of this mode of defense is becoming more apparent every day. As our population increases, and the facilities for intercommunication are multiplied, a military force of any extent can, with more and more readiness, be concentrated at any given point in the shortest possible time. Fortifications, which will naturally retard the landing of a foreign foe, must give time to concentrate a force at any given point equal to any emergency. A larger force could be thrown into New York in two weeks, by means of internal communication, than could be brought there from abroad in a year by all the means which any European Power could possibly command.

Our ramified system of railroads, spreading throughout the whole country—those sinews of iron which bind with indissoluble ties the commercial interests of our community—confer upon the nation a capability for defense which obviates forever the necessity of standing armies, or of a navy more numerous than is necessary to give protection to our ships in the prosecution of our extended commerce.

PENSIONS.

The attention of Congress has been frequently called to the glaring discrepancy between the enactments regulating the pensions of soldiers and those of sailors. There is an invidious distinction between these two arms of service which rests upon no principle of reason or justice. It would, beyond doubt, conduce to the interest of the Army, and the public service, too, if pensions in the Army were put upon the same footing precisely with those of the Navy. The recommendation of the General-in-Chief I commend to your favorable notice and to that of Congress.

MILITARY BANDS.

The importance of regimental bands to the service admits of no doubt in the estimation of military men. In European armies great attention is paid to the subject, and great excellence exists in this department. Heretofore, in our service, the bands have been supported by contributions from the men in the shape of savings from the ration. Under the new regulations of the Army, this fund, which is certainly the property of the soldier, has been returned to him in the shape of more palatable addition to his subsistence, particularly when complaining from indisposition. The bands will be broken up, unless some means are set apart for their maintenance. This can readily be done by appropriating a sufficient sum for the purpose out of the fines and forfeitures of the Army. This fund could not be devoted to a more desirable object.

OREGON AND WASHINGTON CLAIMS.

By a law passed the 18th day of August, 1856, a commission was directed to be appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the sum of money fairly due to the volunteers of Oregon and Washington Territories for their services in the Indian wars which threatened to lay waste those Territories. In compliance with this law, Captain Smith, of the first dragoons, Captain Rufus Ingalls, of the quartermaster's department, and Lafayette Grover, Esq., of Salem, Oregon, were appointed to examine the accounts and claims, and to make a report in conformity with the law and upon the facts as they existed, so far, at least, as it was possible to ascertain them.

These officers entered upon their duties on the 10th day of October, 1856, and seem to have labored with great assiduity and patience in discharge of them until the 20th day of October last, when they were brought to a close. I have examined this report very carefully, and conclude that, from the data they adopted for their guide as to the prices of stores and subsistence, and time of service rendered by the men, it is not probable a more just or accurate result could be attained than these gentlemen have arrived at. The amount ascertained to be due is a very large one, and Congress will have to make provision for its payment if it is intended they shall be liquidated, of which I presume there can now be no doubt.

BREECH-LOADING ARMS.

The appropriation for the purchase of the best breech-loading rifle has been nearly all expended for arms of different construction—some for experiment in the field, thought to be far the best test, and some have been purchased for use in the Army, having been already approved by trials in the hands of troops in actual service.

I think there existed no arm of the sort at the time the appropriation was made which has not been materially improved since; and much of this improvement has taken place since the trial made of this sort of arm last summer, at West Point, under the direction of a board of officers appointed for the purpose. The variety of breech-loading arms is extremely great, and the ingenuity exhibited in constructing them highly creditable. Some of these arms are best for one sort of service, whilst others answer best for another, and the purchases made have been determined with a view to this object. Improvements are still going on in the construction of this particular arm, and, with some further encouragement, valuable results will no doubt be attained.

Some of these arms combine, in a very high degree, celerity and accuracy of fire, with great force, at long range.

TOPOGRAPHICAL BUREAU.

The clear and complete reports from this bureau will fully apprise you of its labors during the past year, and its present condition.

AQUEDUCT, CAPITOL, AND POST OFFICE EXTENSION.

These works are still under the direction of the officer heretofore in charge of them, and his report will show the progress made in their prosecution, as well as his estimates for money to carry on the work in the future.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S BUREAU.

The operations of this department for the past year will fully appear from the Quartermaster General's report, herewith transmitted.

The sums expended in this branch of the public service are extremely large, but the duties performed are very great, and the necessities for the payment of immense sums of money in this department seem unavoidable. This vast expenditure will cease to be a matter of surprise to any one who, with proper information, reflects fully upon the extent and character of the country over which our military operations are conducted.

We are not apt to carry along, as an element of reflection in drawing a contrast between the present and former expenditures, the enormous increase of distances to be traversed, and the difficulties which multiply themselves from transportation over a wild, barren, sterile, uninhabited waste.

Our territory lying between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean is about twelve hundred miles in length from north to south; its breadth from east to west, in latitude 49°, is fifteen hundred miles; in latitude 38°, eighteen hundred miles; and in latitude 32°, fifteen hundred miles; the area being about two million square miles.

The meridian of 105° west longitude divides this territory into two nearly equal parts. The eastern half is a great plain rising gradually from the Mississippi river to the foot of the mountains along the meridian of 105°, where its elevation, near the northern boundary, is two thousand five hundred feet; in the middle latitude, six thousand feet; and near the southern boundary, four thousand feet above the sea. The western half is a mountain region, the chains of which, so far as yet known, have, generally, a direction north and south.

If we draw a line nearly coinciding with the meridian of 99° west longitude, dividing the great plain into two nearly equal parts, we shall find that portion east of this line differing entirely from that west of it. The eastern part is fertile, the western arid and sterile. The width of the fertile district is from four to five hundred miles; of the sterile, from three to four hundred miles. The surface of this uncultivable region, along the routes generally traveled, is sandy, gravelly, and pebbly. It supports no trees, except a few willows and cotton-woods along the streams, to which mezquite is added in the southern latitudes. The grass is sparse; numerous varieties of cactus are abundant. Portions of the river bottoms (where the soils of the different strata become mixed, and where water can be had for irrigation) are, to a limited extent, cultivable. The minor streams frequently disappear in the sands.

On the western border of the plain the mountains rise abruptly from it. The routes explored by the Pacific railroad parties entered the mountain region through the lowest known passes, whose altitudes vary from four to ten thousand feet above the sea. The mountain ridges and peaks rise above these passes from one to six thousand feet. Nearly the entire distance to the Pacific is occupied by mountains separated by desert plains or basins. The two great chains forming the east and west border of the mountain region have the greatest elevation, inclosing, as it were, the others.

Great aridity and sterility characterize the mountain region, except the Pacific slopes of its western border, and generally the aspect is dreary and desolate in the extreme.

To be sure, at the foot of the western slopes of the highest mountain chains and spurs, fertile soil and the means of irrigation are often found. And there are small mountain valleys that are cultivable, and also river bottoms; but the plains may be called barren, and, with rare exceptions, the soil can only be cultivated when the means of irrigation are at hand. Occasionally belts of forest are found among the mountains, but the instances are exceptional.

The great uncultivated belt, including plain and mountain region, through which all routes to the Pacific must pass, has a width near our northern boundary of eleven hundred miles; in latitude 38°, of twelve hundred miles; and near the southern boundary, of one thousand miles. The length of the roads through the belt is of course greater.

Over nearly this whole region, and over distances quite as great as these, the quartermaster's department is called upon to furnish transportation and supplies for our troops, who are keeping up a continual patrol of that vast territory, and a great portion of the time engaged in warfare with the numerous and hardy savages who range perpetually over those boundless wilds. Heavy expenditures cannot be avoided in the quartermaster's department as long as we keep up a military organization in the West.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD,
Secretary of War.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE,

November 30, 1857.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of this office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, and for the quarter ending September 30, 1857.

The quantity of land surveyed and ready for market, and not advertised, on the 30th of September, 1857, exclusive of lands withdrawn on account of railroad grants, embraces an area of 57,442,876 acres. Of this quantity, there was surveyed and returned to this office during the five quarters ending September 30, 1857, 22,889,461 acres.

The particulars are presented in the following tabular exhibit:

Exhibit of the quantities of Public Lands, exclusive of school lands, prepared for market and not advertised for sale, on June 30, 1857; the quantity advertised for sale during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857; also, the quantities prepared for market during the quarter ending September 30, 1857; the quantities advertised for sale during the same period; and the quantities of unoffered surveyed Public Land on hand September 30, 1857; and an estimate of the probable quantities which will be prepared during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858.

States and Territories.	Quantities of unoffered surveyed land on hand June 30, 1856.	Quantities, plats of surveys of which have been received during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857.	Quantities advertised for sale and not postponed during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857.	Quantities prepared for market, and not advertised for sale, on June 30, 1857.	Quantities, plats of surveys of which have been received during the quarter ending Sept. 30, 1857.	Quantities advertised for sale and not postponed during the quarter ending September 30, 1857.	Quantities of unoffered surveyed public land on hand on September 30, 1857.	Estimate of the probable quantities which will be prepared during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858.

This statement shows an activity in our surveying operations, during the time mentioned in this report, beyond that of any preceding period; and that the quantity of new lands now liable to be disposed of exceeds, by many million acres, the surveyed lands of any former period.

During the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1857, there were sold for cash.....	4,142,744.48 acres.
Located with military bounty land warrants.....	6,283,920.00 "
Making a total of.....	10,426,664.48 "
Reported under swamp land grant.....	2,962,493.96 "
Estimated quantity covered by railroad grants of March, 1857.....	5,116,000.00 "
Making an aggregate of.....	18,505,073.44 "
For the quarter ending 30th September, 1857, there were sold for cash.....	1,157,805.83
Located with military bounty land warrants, 1,097,090.00
Reported under swamp-land grants.....	400,067.00
Being for the quarter.....	2,654,962.83 "
Making an aggregate for the five quarters ending September 30, 1857, of..	21,160,036.27 "

It is estimated that three fourths of the sold and located lands were taken for actual settlement. The estimated quantities covered by railroad grants, by the acts of May, June and August, 1856, and other internal improvements, as stated in last annual report, amount to 15,680,875 acres.

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1857, the receipts from the sales of the public lands amount to, $3,471,522 99
The receipts for the quarter ending September 30, 1857, amount to.....	754,385 19
Making a total, for the five quarters, of..	$4,225,908 18

Upon comparison of the foregoing with the statistics of the last annual report, it is found that the lands sold and located, during the five quarters ending September 30, 1857, fall short of the quantity sold and located during the period embraced in the last report by more than six million acres, and that the cash receipts have fallen off in a still larger proportion. This diminution is attributable to the withdrawal of the extensive bodies of public lands along the lines of the railroads, in the States and Territory to which grants of land were made during the last grants, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, and the quarter ending September 30, 1857:

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

During the year ending September 30, 1857, scrip has been issued upon Virginia military warrants, pursuant to the act of August 31, 1852, amounting to.....52,476 acres.

During the same time warrants have been filed for.....30,479 "
Upon which scrip has issued for.....18,500 "
Leaving suspended.....11,979 "

In addition to the quantity mentioned above as suspended, warrants amounting to 112,000 acres are on file, which are also suspended for defects in the chain of title, and other causes.

The recommendation of the last annual report, in reference to the mode of disposal of the vacant lands in the Virginia military district, in Ohio, is renewed.

During the year ending September 30, 1857, seventeen patents have been issued for lands in that district, embracing 2,144 acres; and twenty-eight patents have been issued on warrants for services of soldiers of the war of 1812, pursuant to the act of May 6, 1812, for 4,460 acres. Scrip for 300 acres, pursuant to the act of May 30, 1830, has been issued in satisfaction of United States military warrants issued under act of September 16, 1776.

The time limited by the act of 3d March, 1855, for the survey of entries, in the Virginia military district, expired on the 3d March, 1857. It is recommended that the time be extended to enable parties to perfect their entries by survey, and obtain patents. Also that authority of law be given for perfecting certain Virginia military records as mentioned in last report; and further legislation is desired, extending the act of 8th February, 1854, for the issue and location of warrants for services in the war of 1812, and for United States revolutionary or continental services.

The time limited by act of 7th January, 1853, for exchanging bounty lands for services in the war of 1812, where found unfit for cultivation, expires 30th June, 1858. An extension of time is recommended, and an enlargement of the statute, to embrace the heirs of the deceased soldier.

Under the acts of 1849 and 1850, granting the swamp and overflowed lands to the States within which they lie, there have been selected and returned to this office 54,174,281.76 acres; of which there have been approved 40,133,564.51 acres, and patented to the States 24,060,396.07 acres. The selections reported during the year ending June 30, 1857, amount to 2,962,408.96 acres. The quantity approved during the same period amounts to 1,141,090 acres, and the quantity patented, of old selections, during the same period, amounts to 11,186,147.53 acres.

The particulars are presented in the following tables:

* Two hundred and forty acres of this amount relinquished by State.

† Special patent No. 1, issued under second section of act of March 2, 1855.

Prior to the passage of the act of 3d March, 1857, the adjustment of the swamp grant was greatly retarded by applications filed on the part of individuals, to contest the right of the State to the lands selected. That act, by confirming the selections with exceptions, put an end to the individual contests, and the adjustment is now rapidly progressing. The character and extent of the contests then pending appear in the last annual report.

The recommendation of the last report is renewed, that a limit be fixed to the time within which swamp selections must be made.

During and since the year 1850, grants of land have been made to ten States and one Territory, to aid them in the construction of fifty railroads, of an extent (part estimated) of 8,647 miles, amounting (part estimated) to 24,247,335 acres. The grants to the States of Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas, for eight roads, have been adjusted. The grantees have accepted the grants of 1856 and 1857, except the States of Alabama and Louisiana. The Legislature of Alabama has not been in session since the date of her grant. The State of Louisiana has accepted the grant made to her in part; the residue is rejected. The attention of this office has been given to the adjustment of these grants, so far as the prerequisites have been furnished by the authorities of the grantees. The adjustment of these railroad grants involves an amount of official labor at least equal to the sale of that quantity of land, the surface to be operated on being a strip of thirty miles broad, along the route of each road, within which previous sales, locations, and preemptions, have to be carefully examined and adjudicated under new rules peculiar to these grants, with a view to equal justice to the grantees, the settlers, and purchasers.

The mode of proceeding in this branch of business is as follows: The lands falling within the probable limits of the railroad grant are, upon application, withdrawn from sale or location; the act of Congress is communicated to the Governor of the State; plats of the road are called for; and the general practice has been for the State to accept the grant, and transfer the same to incorporated railroad companies. Then the maps of the road, duly certified by the Governor under seal, and by the company, are returned to this office, generally on a scale of an inch to a mile, indicating the connections with the sectional lines of the surveys; showing, also, the exact dates of the survey, and staking off the road on the ground; because, from these dates, which must be established by the affidavit of the engineer of the road, the title to the State has legal inception, according to the late Attorney General's opinion.

If there is a material deflection in the route of the road, an explanation is required; and unless it satisfactorily appears that the line taken is the most practicable route between the termini, it is rejected. If the route does not deflect too much between the termini, the map is accepted as the basis of adjustment. The line of the road is then laid down upon our official township plats, with the six and fifteen-mile limits of the grant. Then proper diagrams are prepared for office use in the adjudication of preemptions sales, bounty-land locations, swamp selections.

These diversified interests falling within the railroad belt are required to be examined, and their validity or invalidity tested in connection with the State title under the State grant. The ledgers, or tract books, where all these interests are required to appear, must be posted up to date, and then we begin the preparation of the lists descriptive of the lands which inure to, and are to be certified to, the State—the indemnity selections being, under the decision of this office, limited to the State to which the railroad grant is made. When the granted lands for railroad purposes are ascertained and reported, then the residue remaining to the Government are to be brought into market; and this it is the purpose of the Department to effect with all practicable speed.

The particulars touching these grants are more fully presented in the following table:*

The following is an exhibit of the grants of lands for railroads by Congress, from the year 1850, showing the States to which the grants were made, dates of laws, miles of road, quantity granted, if vacant within fifteen miles, and quantity inuring under each grant; the quantities of those made by acts of 1856 and 1857, not yet adjusted, being estimated:

The acts of 8th August, 1846, 2d March, 1849, 3d August, 1854, and joint resolution of 3d March, 1855, granted lands to the State of Wisconsin, for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, under which the State became entitled to.....684,269.00 acres.
Of which there have been actually certified and approved.....589,387.84 "

Leaving a balance to be adjusted of.. 94,881.16 "
On account of this balance there have been selected, first.....60,832.00 acres which are rejected as being upon unoffered lands and within the limits of the original reserve for this grant.
Second, selections on our files, made at Menasha, in May and December, 1856, of.....14,299.60 "
75,131.60 "

Leaving a balance of.....19,749.56 " to be approved, exclusive of the illegal 60,832-acre selection, mentioned under the first head.

A proposition was made in September last, in behalf of the State, to select other lands in lieu of the aforesaid 60,832-acre selection. The proposal was favorably considered, and the purpose entertained to recommend the introduction into market, by the President's proclamation, of the rejected selections.

On the 16th October, the party appearing for the State filed a communication, withdrawing his previous proposal, on the ground of want of authority, and asking a suspension of action.

It is now recommended that the rejected selections be held in suspense until after the close of the next session, to afford time to Congress to legislate in the premises, with the understanding that if no further act of legislation is had before the expiration of that time, the rejected selections be introduced into market.

DES MOINES RIVER GRANT IN IOWA.

Under act of Congress approved 8th of August, 1846, the account under this law stands as follows:

Quantity approved by the State as per exhibit in last annual report.....725,283.92 acres.
To this add list approved March 10, 1852...143,908.37 "
Making total approved for the grant of.....869,192.29 "

NOTE.—Eight roads adjusted in Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas. Forty-two roads to be adjusted.

The question as to the extent of this grant, under the decision of your predecessor, has been fully considered in the Attorney General's opinion of 29th May, 1856, (Opinions, vol. 7, p. 69;) and the conclusion at which he arrived, as sanctioned by your immediate predecessor, is to this effect:

That a proposition be made to the State of Iowa and its assigns, to acquiesce in and accept the decision of Secretary Stuart as final, which gives to the State the lands along the course of the Des Moines up to the northern boundary of the State; provided the State, or its assigns, agree to acquiesce in and accept that decision as final.

The Attorney General further holds, that if the State declines the propositions, the Secretary is discharged from any obligation to act on the decision of Mr. Walker and Mr. Stuart, and must fall back on the first decision of the Government, and refuse to approve any more selections above Raccoon Fork. No final action on the part of the State authorities in the matter has yet been filed in this office.

The lands above the Raccoon Fork are intersected by three of the railroad grants under act of 15th May, 1856.

SURVEYS.

Michigan.—The original surveys of the islands in the western part of the lower peninsula have been made—four thousand and ninety-five miles of resurveys have been reported during the past year; and, in obedience to the act of March 3, 1857, the office at Detroit has been transferred to St. Paul, Minnesota, and the greater portion of the archives relating to the public surveys in Michigan have been handed over to the authorities of that State; the remainder, not being in a condition for transfer, were removed to the surveyor general's office at St. Paul, and are now in course of preparation for delivery to the Michigan authorities.

Illinois.—The archives of the surveyor general's office are now ready for transfer to the State authorities. This, as the Governor has advised, will be done as soon as suitable provision is made by the Legislature of that State for their reception, in conformity with the act of Congress approved January 22, 1853.

Missouri.—The field work has been confined chiefly to the overflowed lands in the southeastern part of the State, pursuant to an arrangement by which the United States are to pay for the survey of such portions of these lands as may be arable and fit for agricultural purposes; and the counties representing the swamp grant to the State are to pay for the survey of such of the lands as may fall within the swamp grant. Under this arrangement 46,000 acres have been returned during the past year, all of which proved to be swamp land, and the expense of the survey of the same has been paid by the counties in which the lands are situated.

The surveying operations in this State are so nearly completed, that it is anticipated the archives will be in readiness for transfer, and the office of the surveyor general closed by the end of the year 1859.

Wisconsin.—Surveys have progressed with great rapidity; three hundred and sixty-eight miles of township lines, and four thousand two hundred and thirty-nine miles of subdivisions and meanders, have been reported, embracing the difficult surveys of the Apostle Islands, in Lake Superior, the correction of the fourth principal parallel, east of the fourth principal meridian in the Michigan State line, thus affording the basis for all the surveys north of it. All surveys south of the third correction parallel, except two townships, have been completed.

Iowa.—Owing to the severity of the surveying season, and depredations on the part of the Indians, but little has been done in the northwestern part of the State. But nine hundred and eighteen miles of subdivisions and meanders have been reported.

Minnesota.—The new surveying district of Minnesota.

Field operations for the establishment of the principal lines and subdivisions of the public surveys have been commenced in the northeast district on Lake Superior, and in the country south of the northwest district, north of Iowa, to the extent of four thousand and fourteen miles; but, owing to the limited time within which operations have been prosecuted from 23d May last, when the opening of the office of surveyor general took place, no returns of surveys have yet been received at this office from this new surveying district.

Wisconsin and Iowa.—The summary of field work presented by the surveyor general for the surveying district of Wisconsin and Iowa, of which the Territory of Minnesota formed a part prior to the act of 3d March, 1857, has been very satisfactory, embracing the establishment of guide meridians and standard parallels, township and subdivision lines, to the extent of seven thousand and twenty miles. Such portion of the archives of this district appertaining to the Minnesota surveys have been duly turned over to the surveyor general at St. Paul.

Arkansas.—The resurveys ordered in this State are now nearly completed, and the surveyor general is engaged in preparing the land records, with a view to the transfer of them to the State authorities upon the closing of this office, which may take place during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, should no further resurveys be found indispensable.

Louisiana.—The surveying operations of this State are nearly complete. The work now consists principally of resurveys, of surveys of private claims, and of lands which have been supposed to be overflowed, but now found to be agricultural.

Florida.—In consequence of the Indian hostilities, no surveys have been carried on. Should the Indians be removed to the West, the suspended contracts could be completed by the expiration of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859.

New Mexico.—The surveys have been executed to a very limited extent, owing to the Indian hostilities, and have been confined chiefly to the region known as the "Valles" lying northwest of Santa Fe, and west of the Rio Grande.

No surveys have been made of "private land claims" in New Mexico, none having been yet confirmed by Congress. The surveyor general recommends that a board of commissioners be appointed for the adjudication of titles, and that the period be limited for the presentation of claims. A summary, prompt, and final adjudication of Spanish and Mexican claims in the Territory is of great importance; not only to settle titles, but enable the Department to separate private property from the public lands, so that the latter may be disposed of without danger of conflict.

Forty-eight "donation" claims, under the provisions of the act of 22d July, 1854, have been filed in the surveyor general's office since his last annual report, eleven of which are recommended for recognition, the period of four years' settlement having expired.

Twenty-six "private land claims" have been filed since his last annual report, making fifty-seven since the opening of his office at Santa Fe, New Mexico, of which sixteen are recommended by the surveyor general.

The extensive discoveries of the precious metals in New Mexico suggests the propriety, in legislating for the disposal of the public lands in that Territory, of excluding what may be found to be strictly mineral lands from general sales or locations.

Kansas.—The surveys have been prosecuted with energy, returns having been made to the extent of seventeen thousand miles.

Nebraska.—Owing to the late period at which the sixth principal meridian was established, the extent of the surveys are not so great as was expected; yet seven thousand miles of field-work have been returned, and the work is now being rapidly prosecuted, and it is expected that the surveys east of the sixth principal meridian will be closed by the 30th June, 1859.

Utah.—The surveys of the public lands had rapidly progressed before the surveyor general abandoned his position, owing to reported hostilities on the part of the Mormon authorities at Salt Lake City.

This happened early last spring, since which time we are advised of the forcible disbanding of the clerks in the surveyor general's office, but are uninformed as to the safety of the archives of that office.

to the surveys which have been executed in that Territory, but we have no means of judging of the correctness of these statements without actual examination on the ground.

The extent of the surveys, since the beginning of the operations in Utah, exhibits a sphere of field-work embracing 2,000,000 acres, and the work executed at a cost of $90,000.

California.—The surveying operations have been pushed forward during the last year to a degree beyond the anticipation of this office, the liabilities incurred by the late surveyor general on that score having reached an indebtedness of upwards of $220,000 to the United States deputy surveyors, over and above the appropriations. These accounts for surveys under contracts with the surveyor general, have been certified by the latter, and could not be paid for the want of funds applicable to that service. With a view to provide means as early as possible to liquidate that indebtedness, I have, by your direction, ascertained the amount, and submitted a deficiency estimate, so that speedy appropriation may be obtained.

The summary of the field operations in California since the commencement of the service in 1851 to the present time, consists of 82,000 miles of lineal surveys, embracing an area of upwards of 20,000,000 acres, at the aggregate expense of more than $1,000,000; of which there were surveyed during the last fiscal year, ending 30th June, 1857, 20,000 miles—equal to 9,000,000 acres.

Oregon.—The progress of the surveys of the public lands and donation claims have been to such an extent that it is expected the portion of the Territory between the Cascade Mountains and the Pacific ocean will be completed by the operations of another year. The extension by law of the surveying system east of the Cascades is recommended.

Washington Territory.—Owing to hostilities of the Indians, the remoteness of the surveying region, sparseness of settlements, and the arduous and perilous nature of the service in that district, but limited progress in surveying has been made during the past year; yet the duties devolved upon the surveyor general at Olympia have required all his attention.

That officer renews the recommendation of increase in mileage to deputy surveyors to indemnify them for the obstacles encountered in the density of timber, high wages, and cost of transportation of supplies.

These facts considered, and in view of the remoteness of this surveying district from commercial communities, his recommendation is concurred in, with the suggestion of increase also in his compensation.

This table shows the aggregate from 30th September, 1856, to 30th September, 1857. The statement in the first part of this report is for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1857.

At the last session of Congress the following new land districts were created:

In Kansas, the "Delaware," "Osage," and "Western" districts.

In Nebraska, the "Nemaha," "South Platte," and "Dakotah" districts.

In Wisconsin, the "Chippewa" district.

There were also the "northeastern" and "northwestern" districts in Minnesota Territory, established by act of July 8, 1856.

For all these offices the tract books have been prepared and opened here, all the necessary instructions written out, and the blank forms of various kinds transmitted, by mail and express, to the respective offices for the above districts, the registers and receivers for which have entered upon the performance of their duties.

GEOLOGICAL RECONNOISSANCE IN OREGON AND WASHINGTON TERRITORIES.

In March, 1851, it was determined by the Secretary of the Interior, under the third section of the act of 27th September, 1850, pointing out the manner of making surveys in Oregon, to connect, with the land surveys in Oregon, a geological reconnaissance and exploration. With this in view, a transfer from a fund for similar service in the northwest was ordered, of $3,500; and Dr. John Evans was directed, on the 22d March, 1851, to proceed overland to ascertain the general geology of the country west of the Missouri river, toward the Rocky Mountains; to reconnoiter for practicable wagon routes leading to Oregon, over the Rocky Mountains; and, when there, to aid the surveyor general in obtaining the elevations of the country along the principal base and meridian lines, with the latitude and longitude at the intersection of those lines, and to keep his expenditures within the limits of the means placed by the Department under his control.

On the 3d March, 1853, Congress made two separate appropriations—one of $11,984 25 for expenses incurred in a geological reconnaissance in Oregon, undertaken in 1851, and another of $5,000 for completing that geological reconnaissance; whereupon on the 19th April, 1853, the geologist was instructed to complete the service under the latter appropriation, and make his final report thereon; both of which appropriations amounted to $16,984 25; and on 3d March, 1855, Congress appropriated for this purpose the additional sum of $23,560; making an aggregate of $44,044 25.

One item of the last appropriation was $5,692 25, on account of excess of his expenditures over and above the $5,000, per act of the 3d March, 1853; another item of $13,000 25, for the completion of the geological explorations in Oregon and Washington Territories. In placing the latter item under the control of the geologist, on March 20, 1855, he was instructed to complete the work, make final report, and not to exceed it in his disbursements.

The estimates on which the appropriation of $23,560 was based included a third item of $4,867 50, which had been expended by Dr. Evans in coöperating with the expedition, under the authority of the War Department, for making the extreme northern railroad exploration from the Missouri to Washington Territory, thereby reducing to this extent the amount which has been appropriated for geological service in Oregon and Washington to $39,776 75.

In the adjustment of Dr. Evans's accounts to the 4th March last, it is found that he has again exceeded the amount appropriated for the completion of the work, and incurred an additional liability of $3,574 70, to the liquidation of which there are no means applicable under existing laws.

The geologist, in a communication of the 13th November, 1857, states as follows: that "rich deposits of semi-bituminous coal have been discovered cropping out at various points from the British possessions to near the boundary of California, and are almost inexhaustible in quantity, and accessible to sail and steam navigation."

"Ores of iron, lead, platinum, and copper, have been discovered; also, marbles, other limestones, and valuable rocks for building purposes. The analysis of the coals, limestones, and minerals, is completed; also, of many of the soils."

One hundred and five illustrations, and two hundred and seventy-seven pages of manuscript are completed, ready for the engraver and printer. "All the illustrations and analyses are in sufficient progress to keep the engraver constantly employed until the completion of the report."

The illustrations and manuscript referred to, he has filed in this office; but the complete report, which antecedent instructions required at his hands, has not yet been made. He further states that "the report will be about two thirds the size of Dr. Owen's report, and will cost, if published in the same style, $26,526, including the cost of preparing all the maps and other illustrations."

This sum, together with his claimed balance on account of his expenditure over and above the last appropriation, he states, "will amount to $30,000."

The facts in regard to the origin of this service, and the appropriation for its completion at different times, with the progress in it, as reported by the geologist, are respectfully submitted for the consideration of Congress.

LANDS ON THE ALABAMA AND FLORIDA LINE.

Plats have been prepared of the strip of lands in Alabama between the Florida line and Coffee's line. These to be certified by the Commissioner, as ex officio Surveyor General, will be furnished to the authorities of the State of Alabama, and similar plats to the register and receiver at Sparta, within whose district the lands are situated; and hereafter a considerable body of lands which has been held in suspense on the southern boundary of Alabama will be restored to market.

In the northeastern or Columbus district, Mississippi, there are about 32,000 acres of land, the title to which has been held in suspense for more than twenty years, because of the indebtedness of the late Gordon D. Boyd, as receiver.

The mode of proceeding determined upon in this class of cases is to cancel the sales and restore to market about one half of the quantity above mentioned, on which no money was paid; and as the purchasers of the residue at marshal's sale shall pay up for the same, to issue the patents.

INDIAN RESERVES—TRUST LANDS.

The necessary instructions having been issued, and steps taken for the location within the Half Breed, Dakotah or Sioux reserve, of 320,819.48 acres in Minnesota, of the scrip authorized by the act of 17th July, 1854, and a sufficient time, in the judgment of this office, having elapsed for satisfying claims in the reserve, a proclamation, pursuant to the third section of said act, was issued, bearing date the 16th September, 1857, for public sales to take place in March next of the unlocated tracts within the limits of said reservation.

Under the preliminary management of the Indian office, the township embraced in the eastern portion of the Delaware trust lands in Kansas, certain town lots and blocks in Jacksonville, Delaware, Hardville, Lattaville, and Leavenworth City, were offered for sale in November last under proclamation by the President.

The initiative having been taken also at the same office in regard to the lands within the reserves of the Ioways, the western part of the Delaware and the Peorias, Kaskaskias, Piankeshaws and Weas, these lands were offered under proclamation for sale in June and July last.

The Office of Indian Affairs having requested the aid of the General Land Office in selling the Indian trust lands, instructions, prepared with great care, dated 29th September, 1856, in regard to the first sale, were transmitted to the register and receiver at Leecompton, directing them to coöperate with the special commissioner on the part of the Indian Office in selling the lands in question.

At the second sale, the land officers at Doniphan and Leecompton were, on the 10th May, particularly instructed as to the manner in which the sales were to be conducted jointly by themselves and the special commissioner on the part of the Indian Office; and those sales were held and duly closed accordingly.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Only a portion of the returns of these sales have yet reached this office from the Office of Indian Affairs, such portions have been preliminarily examined, so far as to enable us to make an adjustment of the accounts of sales of the Peorias, Weas, &c., and the eastern part of the Delawares; which adjustments were effected on the 2d and 7th October, 1857, and reported to the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

GRADUATION.

Under the provisions of the act of 3d March, 1857, more than one hundred and fifty thousand entries for settlement and cultivation, &c., under the graduation act of August 4th, 1854, have been confirmed; a large portion of them have already been patented, thus relieving the office of a vast amount of labor which, without legislative intervention, would have been required in the final adjustment of these cases.

The act of 3d March, 1857, however, is retroactive, and has no application to any entries subsequent to its passage. Therefore, in regard to all such subsequent entries, the registers and receivers have been instructed to notify purchasers, at the time of making them, that the proof of actual settlement and cultivation would be required within one year from the date of entry, to entitle them to patent. Under this rule, all entries subsequent to act 3d March, 1857, will be held up for one year from their date, unless proof of settlement and cultivation should be sooner produced. In default of such proof, there is no authority to carry them into patent, unless Congress shall otherwise order by further legislation.

I deem it proper again to suggest the necessity of further legislative action to give the proper construction to the act of 20th April, 1818, as recommended in our last annual report, so as to restrict the compensation commission of registers and receivers to a quarterly pro rata allowance of the maximum of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum, their compensation both for salary and commissions to commence and be calculated from the time they enter upon the discharge of their duties. By the rule adopted for the computation of commissions under the construction given to the said act by the Supreme Court, it sometimes happens, as was the case at the Plattsburg office, Missouri, that the same register or receiver, under different commissions, or different incumbents of the same office, have received commissions amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $10,000 in a calendar year; which, in the opinion of this office, could never have been contemplated by Congress.

The fees allowed to the register and receiver for locating military land warrants, under the second section of the act of 22d March, 1852, are required, under the existing rule of this office, to be paid into the hands of the receiver of public moneys, who is held accountable for the same, as in the case of moneys received for ordinary sales of land; and the commission on warrant locations is restricted by law, according to the ruling of the Department, to an amount which, added to the commissions on lands sold, will not exceed, in the aggregate, the maximum of $2,500 for any one official year.

In the last annual report of this office, it was stated that a most liberal policy had been adopted, and ought to be continued, in the disposal of the public domain towards those making settlements thereon; that "except so far as Congress may make grants to the land States and Territories in aid of educational and internal improvement purposes, it is believed to be the true policy of the Government to secure the public lands to actual settlers thereon, and withhold them, as far as practicable, from speculators."

The wisdom of the preemption policy is no longer the subject of controversy. It is established by the history of every neighborhood and settlement throughout the West. This is said in full view of the fact that many fraudulent preemption claims are established by evasion and perjury; and that such will be the case, even under the most diligent administration of this and the local offices, especially during periods such as that through which we have recently passed, when the spirit of speculation has possession of the public mind. But this class of cases, when compared with the great body of honest claims, made by men living upon the lands, is too inconsiderable to weigh against our policy. The title to the lands should pass immediately from the Government to the men who are to cultivate the soil. So far as it may be avoided, the speculator should not be allowed to intervene.

With a view to a complete and practical policy, an amendment of the preemption laws was recommended to the last Congress, to the effect that a time should be fixed, within which the settler upon unoffered land should complete his entry by the requisite proof and payment. The proposed amendment was not adopted, and the preceptor of unoffered land may make payment at his own pleasure, provided it be done "before the time fixed for the public sale of the land." To compel payment and the consummation of the entry, it is necessary to proclaim the land for public sale. Numerous and extensive settlements in Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and in portions of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Michigan, formed during and prior to 1856, have so far matured, and the lands have been so long occupied, as to justify the Government in expecting and requiring payment.

It is recommended that preceptors upon unoffered surveyed lands shall have one year from the date of settlement, and those upon unsurveyed lands shall have one year after the return of the township plats to the local office, within which to pay for the same; and that the right of preemption upon unsurveyed lands be made general, so that the law in this respect may be uniform, the privilege being limited, under existing laws, to California, Oregon, Washington, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and New Mexico.

The twelfth section of the act of 22d July, 1854, relating to Kansas and Nebraska, requires notice of the tract claimed by preceptors to be filed within three months "after the survey has been made in the field." It is recommended that this provision be so modified as to give the three months after the survey has been made and returned, thus assimilating it to the other statutes on the same subject. Where two or more persons may have settled upon and improved the same tract before the survey, the entry should be made by them jointly, and the maximum quantity of one hundred and sixty acres to each allowed on adjacent legal subdivisions of unoccupied lands. Legislation to this effect is recommended.

The recommendation of the last annual report is renewed, that the act of 3d March, 1853, be so amended as to render United States reserved sections along the line of railroads liable to preemption, as well when the settlement may have been made after as before the final allotment; that is, at any time before the public sale.

The general law of 3d March, 1855, and the special act of 3d March, 1857, granting preemptions to contractors carrying the mails through the Territories west of the Mississippi, have engaged the attention of the Department; and to facilitate operations under these laws, a circular letter of instructions has been prepared, in which, as regards the general statute, it is held, that to constitute a right of preemption, the mail route on which the claim is based must form a part of a system stretching laterally across the territory, being a link in or part of a connected route from the line of the States west of the Mississippi to the Pacific, and that no benefit or privilege is conferred by the said act on routes stretching lengthwise in a northerly or southerly direction in the Territory, and forming no part of said connected route.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The class of titles known as "private land claims," which had their origin under the Governments that preceded us in sovereignty over the different sections of country now constituting our territory, are constantly coming before this office for examination in all their diversity of forms; and those finally confirmed and properly surveyed are carried into patent. Under this head, individual Indian reserves also are referred, and are passed into patent after a critical examination of the whole basis of title, as resting on treaties and statutory provisions.

A class of claims at the Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, of which official cognizance had been taken under the act of Congress approved 26th September, 1850, has been thoroughly examined at this office. Eighty-four of these have been finally confirmed; for thirty-two of these, the payments required by law have been made, and patent certificates have been returned to this from the local office.

Returns of the surveys, with the necessary transcripts, showing the final confirmation and survey of ranchos and other claims in California, are coming in, and are subject to critical examination, and carried into patent where found complete in all the proceedings. Eight of these titles have been carried into patent, including an aggregate area of over 190,600 acres, and covering one hundred and seventeen pages of record.

In connection with the geological reconnaissance which has been made in Oregon and Washington, alluded to in the foregoing, and the discovery of extensive coal fields in those Territories, the attention of this office has been drawn to the immense growth and great value of the timber for naval purposes in the Pacific slope.

It is reported that the red fir for masts, roots of the white-oak, cedar, and various kinds of fir, are suitable for ship knees. On Hood's canal, in the vicinity of Fort Gamble, and at Steilacoom, white pine is found in great abundance, and of excellent quality.

The facilities for the transportation of timber from Washington Territory are great; the harbors in Puget Sound being reported deep and quite accessible, admitting ships of the largest draught.

As an incidental matter connected with the disposal of the public lands, this office, in the elder land States, has instituted a system susceptible of extension to any part of the public domain, operating through the instrumentality of the local land offices, for the protection of the public timber.

This system, both simple and economical, has been found efficient in suppressing, to a great extent, the mischief of waste, and has operated in a most salutary manner in constraining trespassers to purchase lands which otherwise would have remained unsold. The evil will be, to a great extent, obviated by an early introduction into market of the pineries which have attracted the attention and stimulated the cupidity of depredators.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Commissioner.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

Abstract of the Annual Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
November 30, 1857.

SIR: Pursuant to the resolution of the Senate of the 25th February, 1855, the following is submitted as an "abstract, or compendium" of the annual report from this office, bearing even date herewith.

This report treats of the following subjects, and is accompanied by the usual statistical tables of the lands surveyed, exposed to market, sold, granted, and otherwise disposed of, to wit:

1. The quantity of lands ready for market and not advertised—surveys returned—aggregate annual statement of sales and lands disposed of.
2. Bounty land warrants—acts of 1847-50-52, and 55—annual statements, with views respecting Virginia military claims.
3. Swamp land grant—statements, and a renewal of recommendation of further legislation.
4. Statement in relation to railroad grants.
5. Grants in Wisconsin—Fox and Wisconsin river grant—Des Moines river grant in Iowa.
6. Synoptical views of the operations of the surveyor general.
7. New land districts created in Kansas, Nebraska, Wisconsin, and Minnesota.
8. Geological reconnaissance in Oregon and Washington.
9. Land on the Alabama and Florida line.
10. Lands in the northeastern or Columbus district, Mississippi.
11. Indian reserves—trust lands.
12. Reference to graduation act and the number of entries confirmed under the same.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

13. Legislation recommended touching the measures of compensation to land officers.

14. Reference to operation of preemption laws—further legislation recommended.

15. Private land claims—and means adopted to protect the timber growing upon the public lands.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,

Commissioner.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

Report of Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,

OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, Nov. 30, 1857.

SIR: The accompanying reports and statements from the several superintendents, agents, and teachers, furnish valuable and interesting information in regard to the condition and prospects of our various Indian tribes, and exhibit in detail the operations of this branch of the public service during the past year.

The New York Indians continue gradually to improve; they have generally adopted agricultural and mechanical pursuits, and, to a considerable extent, the habits and customs of their white brethren. A treaty recently entered into with the Tonawanda band of Senecas, should it receive the favorable consideration of the Senate, will, it is hoped, terminate the complicated and embarrassing difficulties which, for some years, have materially interfered with their happiness and welfare.

The treaties of July 31 and August 2, 1855, with the several bands of Indians in Michigan, provided for a material change in their condition and relations. They were relieved from the obligation to remove west of the Mississippi river, secured limited but sufficient quantities of land, to be held in severalty, and were provided with ample means for educational purposes. Under the liberal legislation of the State they can attain to citizenship; and it is hoped that, by a discreet and judicious supervision of their affairs on the part of the General Government, and such coöperation as may be requisite by the authorities of the State, aided by the kindness and benevolence of her citizens, they may soon be prepared for the enjoyment of that high privilege.

The treaty of 1854 with the Menomonees, and that of 1856 with the Stockbridges of Wisconsin, released those tribes from their engagements to emigrate west of the Mississippi, to which they were opposed, and located them in other positions within the State, where it is hoped they will improve, and eventually become fitted for and invested with citizenship.

The small band of Oneidas, formerly of New York, remain in the vicinity of Green Bay, where they were placed by the treaty of 1837. They are advanced in civilization, and there is no good reason why they should not thrive and prosper, if the State authorities would rigidly prohibit the traffic with them in ardent spirits.

By the treaties of September 30, 1854, and February 22, 1855, the great Chippewa tribe, residing in Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the northern peninsula of Michigan, ceded nearly the whole of the lands owned by them to the Government; there being set apart for the different bands, however, a suitable number of reservations, limited in extent, where it should be the policy to concentrate and confine them, and every exertion used to induce them to adopt the habits and pursuits of civilized life.

As stated in the last annual report of my predecessor, we have no treaty arrangements with the Red Lake Chippewas, and a few other scattered bands of Indians next to the British possessions, and in the valley of the Red River of the North. They are poor and need assistance, and it would be good policy to extinguish their title to lands in that region, and to locate them on a small reservation, where they could be suitably and humanely provided for.

The other Indians in Minnesota consist of the various bands of the Dakota, or Sioux, and the Winnebagoes; the latter located in the southern portion of the Territory, and reported to be doing well. The agent is, however, of opinion that their reservation is too large, and that it would contribute materially to their advancement to reduce it, and to assign them a limited quantity of land in severalty, so as to give them an idea of individual property, and a greater incentive to personal exertion and industry.

The principal body of the Sioux consist of the four bands of Med-a-wah-kan-toans, and Wah-pah-coo-tahs, known as the Lower or Mississippi Sioux, and the Wah-pah-toans and Se-see-toans, or Upper Sioux. These are located on two reservations set apart for them by the treaties of July and August, 1851, where strenuous efforts are being made to induce them to improve their habits and condition.

It was a small outlawed and reckless band of these Indians that committed the murders and outrages at the white settlement at Spirit Lake in March last, but who, on the requirement of the Department, have since been severely punished by their brethren for their lawless and atrocious conduct; this having been determined to be a better course than to cause the chastisement to be inflicted by our troops.

A portion of the Indians embraced within the two agencies for the tribes on and in the vicinity of the upper and head waters of the Missouri river have, within the past year, been severely scourged by the small-pox—as many as two thousand of them having, it is estimated, been carried off by that disease; otherwise, nothing of an unusual character has taken place amongst them. These Indians comprise eight different bands of restless and wandering Sioux, with the Arickarees, Gros Ventres, Mandans, Assinaboines, and Crows, all within the lower, and the Blackfeet, who are within the upper agency. But small portions of the country occupied by them are suited for agricultural pursuits; and so long as the buffalo and other game within their reach afford them subsistence, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to break them of their wandering and unsettled habits. The agent reports that the Sioux, to whom General Harney promised presents of clothing for their soldiers, are very much dissatisfied with the non-compliance with that promise, and he recommends that Congress make provision for its fulfillment. An estimate for $200,000, to be placed at the disposal of the Department for that purpose, was presented by your predecessor to Congress at the last session of that body; but as no appropriation was made, concurring in the propriety and importance of the measure, I respectfully recommend that the amount necessary to carry it out be appropriated.

Pursuant to the act of March 3, 1853, providing for negotiations with the Indians west of Missouri and Iowa, for the purpose of procuring their assent to the settlement of citizens of the United States on their lands, and of extinguishing their title thereto, in whole or in part, treaties were made during the preceding Administration with the Ottobas and Missourias, Omahas, Delawares, Shawnees, Ioways, Sacs and Foxes of the Missouri, Kickapoos, Miami, and the united tribes of Kaskaskias, Peorias, Weas, and Piankeshaws. The title of these Indians was thus extinguished to all the lands owned and claimed by them, except such portions as were reserved for their future homes; the lands so acquired for occupancy by our citizens in Kansas and Nebraska amounting to about 13,653,000 acres, and the lands retained for the use of the Indians to about 1,342,000.

The lands ceded by the Delawares, except the strip known as the outlet, for which they were allowed a stipulated amount, and those acquired from the Ioways and the united tribes of Kaskaskias, Peorias, Weas, and Piankeshaws, were to be, and have been, sold for their benefit. The amount realized for those of the Delawares is $1,054,943 71; for those of the Ioways, $184,437 85; and for those of the four united tribes, $335,350. From these amounts is to be deducted the cost of surveying and selling the lands; and the remainder in each case is required to be invested in safe and profitable stocks, except so much as the President may deem proper to be applied to relieve the temporary necessities of the Indians during the time of their becoming settled and established on their reservations. The interest derived from the investments is to be annually paid over to them, or judiciously applied for their benefit.

The treaty of January 31, 1855, with the Wyandott Indians residing at the junction of the Missouri and Kansas rivers, provided for their investment with citizenship and a division of the tribal lands amongst them. This division, it is understood, has been made, and resulted in giving to each soul about forty acres. This measure, the agent reports, has been attended with good results, a spirit of improvement having manifested itself beyond anything of the kind previously known amongst the Wyandotts. My personal observation enables me to concur in the report of the agent.

During the past summer an important and necessary treaty was also made with the Pawnees, through the operation of which, should it be approved by the Senate, the department hopes to be able to place these restless and lawless Indians in a settled location, to control them there, and to adopt effective measures for securing their material improvement. There is the like necessity for a similar treaty with the Poncas, who inhabit and claim a region of country on the Missouri and L'eau qui Court, or Running Water rivers.

No conventional arrangements have been entered into since the act of March 3, 1853, with the following tribes residing in Kansas, viz: the Pottawatomies, the Kansas or Kaws, the Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi, and the Osages. The policy of that act and the welfare, if not the very existence of these Indians, require that new and different arrangements be made with them as soon as possible.

I concur fully with those of my predecessors who have stated that there have been two great and radical mistakes in our system of Indian policy—the assignment of an entirely too large body of land in common to the different tribes which have been relocated, and the payment of large money annuities for the cessions made by them; the first tending directly to prevent the Indians from acquiring settled habits and an idea of personal property and rights, which lie at the very foundation of all civilization; the second causing and fostering a feeling of dependence and habits of idleness, so fatally adverse to anything like physical and moral improvement. With regard to the Indians in Nebraska and Kansas especially, it is all important that these mistakes shall not be perpetuated or repeated. They are in a critical position. They have been saved as long as possible from the contact and pressure of white population, which has generally heretofore been regarded as fatal to the Indian. They are now becoming rapidly surrounded by such a population, full of enterprise and energy, and by which all the surplus lands, as far west as any of the border tribes reside, will necessarily soon be required for settlement. There is no place left where it is practicable again to place these tribes separate and apart by themselves. Their destiny must be determined and worked out where they are. There they must advance, and improve, and become fitted to take an active part in the ennobling struggles of civilization; or, remaining ignorant, imbecile, and helpless, and acquiring only the fatal vices of civilized life, they must sink and perish like thousands of their race before them. A solemn duty rests upon the Government to do all in its power to save them from the latter fate; and there is no time to be lost in adopting all necessary measures to preserve, elevate, and advance them.

With large reservations of fertile and desirable land, entirely disproportioned to their wants for occupancy and support, it will be impossible, when surrounded by a dense white population, to protect them from constant disturbance, intrusion, and spoliation by those on whom the obligations of law and justice rest but lightly; while their large annuities will subject them to the wiles and machinations of the inhuman trafficker in ardent spirits, the unprincipled gambler, and the greedy and avaricious trader and speculator.

Their reservations should be restricted so as to contain only sufficient land to afford them a comfortable support by actual cultivation, and should be properly divided and assigned to them, with the obligation to remain upon and cultivate the same.

The title should remain in the tribe, with the power reserved to the Government, when any of them become sufficiently intelligent, sober, and industrious, to grant them patents for the land so assigned to them, but leaseable or alienable only to members of the tribe, until they become so far advanced as to be fitted for the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States. Their annuities should be taken and used for the erection of comfortable residences and requisite out-buildings, and otherwise in gradually improving their farms.

Manual-labor schools should be established, where they could learn how to conduct properly their agricultural pursuits, and especially where the boys could be educated as farmers and the girls in housewifery and the dairy, and where also there could be imparted to both the rudiments of a plain and useful education.

Mechanics shops should also be established where necessary, and where as many of the boys as possible should be placed and trained to a knowledge of the mechanic arts suited to the condition and wants of their people.

It is, if possible, more important that the Indian should be taught to till the soil and to labor in the mechanical shops than to have even a common school education.

The adult Indians should be encouraged to cultivate the lands assigned to them, each to have the exclusive control, under the tribal right, of his own possessions, and of the products of his own labor; and, to encourage them to part with their children willingly to be instructed at the manual-labor schools, and in the mechanical shops, the surplus productions of the one, or profits of the other, should be divided among the parents of the children who aided to produce them. All these arrangements should be under the exclusive control of the department, as well as the annuities, so far as they can be withdrawn from that of the tribe, and applied to accomplish the objects mentioned.

No white person should be permitted to obtain any kind of possession or foothold within the limits of the reservations, nor even to enter them, except in the employ or by permission of the Government, and none should be employed except such as would be actually necessary for the instruction of the Indians. Power should be conferred on the agents to eject summarily all intruders from the reservations. They should also be clothed with executive and judicial authority in matters pertaining to their agencies, and appeals from their decisions be allowed to the superintendents, and thence to the department. But to carry out the system successfully it would be necessary to relieve the Indians from the example of the worthless idlers and vagrants of the tribe, as well as those whose wild habits and roving dispositions would preclude them from settling down quietly and orderly. All such should be colonized by themselves in such positions as not to admit of much, if any, communication or intercourse with the settled portions of their tribes. For such colonies places could be found somewhere about Bent's Fort and the heads of the Arkansas and Platte rivers.

This plan is applicable at present only to such Indians as those located in Nebraska and Kansas. The wilder tribes could not be brought at once within the entire system, as they could not at first brook the restraint and confinement. They must undergo a preliminary training, being gradually induced to abandon their nomadic and wandering habits, and to settle down on larger reservations, where, for a time, they would have to be influenced to make the necessary exertions to support themselves by cultivating the soil.

The settlement of the questions arising under various treaties in which reservations have been granted in severalty to Indians in Kansas and Nebraska, presents many difficulties which I know of no way of overcoming except by Congress authorizing the department to sell the lands, and to control the proceeds thereof in such manner as to render them effective for the assistance and benefit of the reserves.

The reports in regard to the four great southwestern tribes—the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, and Chickasaws—are very favorable. Their regularly-organized and stable governments and laws well suited to their condition and circumstances, their general devotion to industrial pursuits, and their comparative national and individual prosperity, evince a most creditable and gratifying degree of advancement in the fundamental elements of civilization. Some, if not all of them, appear to be expecting and preparing for an important change in their political and municipal relations with the United States, and there is no doubt that suitably-organized territorial governments may, with great propriety and advantage, be extended to them at an early day. Until such a change shall become expedient, it is recommended that there shall be United States courts established at suitable points within the territory of these Indians, for the trial of cases arising there under our laws. The embarrassments and expense to which they are subjected, in being compelled to attend the Federal court in Arkansas, and the difficulty of securing the attendance of witnesses, give rise to cases of great hardship, amounting to a denial of justice.

I submit herewith a copy of the late annual message of John Ross, principal chief of the Cherokees, to their national council, which is worthy of special attention, as presenting, doubtless, a correct view of the general condition of the tribe, as well as important questions for the consideration of the authorities of the United States.

For several successive years the tribes in the southern superintendency suffered extremely from drought. During the present season, however, they have had timely and abundant rains, have consequently raised fine crops, and are amply supplied with all the necessities of life.

It is expected the Seminoles will soon remove and settle within the district of country provided for them by the treaty with them and the Creeks of August, 1856, and that having a separate country, and enjoying the right of self-government, with ample means for the improvement and support of the whole tribe, their brethren in Florida can be induced peaceably to emigrate and join them. Both the Creeks and Western Seminoles have manifested an entire readiness to comply with their obligations under the treaty, of co-operating with the Department in its efforts to effect the peaceful removal of the Florida Seminoles; and large delegations of both tribes, in charge of the superintendent for that district, will soon be on their way to the scene of operations for the purpose of endeavoring to accomplish that object. This movement has been somewhat delayed in consequence of the superintendent having been charged with the disbursements of the moneys payable to the several tribes within his superintendency. This service was imposed upon him in conformity with the regulation adopted by the President in March last, to carry out an apparent wish of Congress, as evinced by a proviso in the act making appropriations for the Indian department, passed at the last session, that the moneys due to Indians should be paid by the superintendents, instead of by the agents, as heretofore. The proviso, not being obligatory, was not necessary, as the President had already the power to require the superintendents to make such payments whenever he deemed it proper, and as had been repeatedly done. The President having directed the change, it has been tried, but found to be impracticable without great injustice to the Indians and injury to the public service. It devolves an undue amount of labor and responsibility upon the superintendents, while it leaves comparatively none to the agents, and destroys all their influence for good with the Indians. One tribe has to wait till another is paid, which causes jealousy and ill-feeling; and it requires so much time to pay them in succession, that those last reached receive their money long after it should have been paid to them. It necessarily runs the later payments into mid-winter, when the Indians cannot be assembled without subjecting them to great exposure, hardship, and certain danger of fatal diseases. It is also attended with much greater expense, in consequence of the guards and assistants which the superintendent is compelled to employ for the safety of the moneys while traveling about with them in the Indian country from tribe to tribe, or in providing for those which he has to leave behind. I therefore recommend that the system be abandoned, and that the duty be reimposed upon the agents, with such checks and guards as may be requisite to secure its proper and faithful performance.

It being necessary that the southern superintendent should proceed to Florida on the duty referred to before completing the payments in his district, he was, with the sanction of the President, directed to turn over the unpaid moneys in his hands to the agents for the tribes to whom they belong for payment.

While on the subject of payments to Indians, I beg leave to call attention to the evil effects of per capita payments, which system has been in force for some years. The great body of Indians can be managed only through the chiefs. The per capita system breaks down the latter, reduces them to the level of the common Indians, and destroys all their influence. It thus disorganizes, and leaves them practically without a domestic government; lessens their respect for authority, and blunts their perceptions of the necessity and advantages of any proper and effective system of governmental organization; turning them backward, instead of leading them forward, in the scale of advancement. With the diminished control and influence of the chiefs there is increased lawlessness on the part of the members, and hence the greater number of outrages on the persons and property of other Indians and our citizens. Nor is the per capita payment system of any protection or advantage to the individual Indian. His share of the annuity is known beforehand, and it is an easy matter to induce him in advance to gamble it off, or pledge it for whisky or articles of no material use to him, and at or after the payment to take or collect the amount from him. The distribution of the money should be left to the chiefs, so far at least as to enable them to punish the lawless and unruly by withholding it from them, and giving it to the more orderly and meritorious. They should be allowed to report on the conduct of the individuals of the tribe, being as far as possible held responsible therefor; and the agent to pay the money according to a graduated scale, having reference to the industrious habits and good conduct of individuals, as he should find to be just, reserving to him the right to inquire into the action of the chiefs whenever complaint shall be made, and to change or modify such action whenever he may discover that they have dealt unjustly with any member of their tribe.

It is respectfully suggested that some definite action should be had upon the treaties heretofore made with the Quapaws, the Senecas, and the Senecas and Shawnees, residing adjacent to the southwestern corner of Missouri, which were submitted for the consideration of the Senate at the session of 1854-55.

If not such as should be ratified, others of a proper character should be negotiated; this being necessary for the welfare of the Indians and to carry out the objects of the act of 1853. A treaty should likewise be entered into with the Cherokees to acquire from them the eight hundred thousand acres of land in the same locality known as the "Neutral Ground," on which settlements are already being made, contrary to our obligations to the Cherokees, and which tract they are willing to dispose of, in order to obtain the means of liquidating their considerable national debt, and to augment their insufficient school and orphan funds.

A large tract of land in Kansas was years ago set apart for the New York Indians, who were then expected to remove there; but subsequent arrangements have settled the great body of them on reservations in the State. Such of them as have removed should be assigned the three hundred and twenty acres promised to them, and the remainder of the lands be brought into market for the benefit of our citizens who are so rapidly filling up the Territory.

Preliminary measures have been adopted for colonizing, as soon as possible, on the tract of country leased from the Choctaws and Chickasaws for the purpose, the Wichita and other Indians intended to be located there.

The colonization of the Indians of Texas on the reservations set apart by the State for that purpose is progressing favorably, and as rapidly as the difficulties and obstacles incident to such a measure will permit. The supervising agent represents with much confidence that the several colonies will soon be in a condition to support themselves. In the mean time there will be a gradual and material decrease of expense. The amount requisite for the next year is $91,707 50. The same officer estimates that that for the succeeding year will not be so great by about $30,000.

This is the only practicable system for redeeming the wild, lawless, and roaming tribes within our borders. It is expensive at first, because the Indians have to be subsisted and otherwise provided for and made comfortable until they gradually settle down and commence to work for their own support, which experience has demonstrated they can be induced to do. In the end it is the most economical course; but, however great the expense, it is one which both humanity and good policy require should be incurred.

The resources of these Indians from the chase are rapidly failing them, caused in no slight degree by the extension of our settlements, and their country being traversed in every direction by our people. Many of them are compelled to live by plunder, and hence the frequent outrages against other Indians and the whites. In their dispersed condition the numerous military posts that have to be kept up, and the costly expeditions that have frequently to be undertaken to hold them in check, together with the sums which the Government is bound to pay for losses sustained from their depredations, probably involve an amount of expense far greater than would be necessary to collect and colonize them.

The Indians of New Mexico are beginning to have some understanding and appreciation of our power and resources, and the necessity of their preserving peace with one another, and with the whites. They are generally willing to be settled on reservations, which is essential to their preservation and welfare, as well as for the interests and security of our frontier citizens. A favorable commencement has been made, and liberal appropriations by Congress are necessary to carry out the policy in regard to them.

The Pueblo Indians hold the tracts which they occupy and cultivate, by grants from the Spanish or Mexican Governments, and immediate steps should be taken to have them surveyed and set apart from the surrounding lands. This has become the more necessary in the case of the Pimos and Maricopas Indians, since the establishment of mail routes through their country, which will induce and increase white settlements that may conflict with their rights, and incite them to hostility. For a brief description of the character and situation of these peculiar and interesting people, and the views of this office as to the importance of protecting them from such encroachments, I respectfully refer to the accompanying copy of my report of 28th May last.

Under an act approved March 3, 1857, an agent was appointed for the Indians in the territory purchased from Mexico by the last treaty with that Government; but, from circumstances beyond his control, he has not yet been able to furnish the department with much information in relation to them. To supply this deficiency I submit an interesting communication upon the subject from Lieutenant S. Mowry, of the Army, who has for some time been stationed in the country, and appears to be well informed in regard to the character and disposition of the Indians inhabiting it.

The Indians of the plains within the Upper Arkansas and Upper Plate agencies, and embracing the Apaches, Arapahoes, Camanches, Cheyennes, and Kioways, have, with the exception of the two latter, been quiet and peacefully disposed during the year. The Cheyennes have been in open hostility, and committed many outrages, and though they were chastised during the summer by a body of troops under the command of Colonel Sumner, of the Army, it is feared that they are not yet sufficiently subdued to expect that they will abstain from further lawless acts when opportunities offer of indulging their feelings of hostility. In consequence of their bad conduct their proportion of the annuity presents sent out for them and the other Indians of the Upper Arkansas agency was not delivered to them. Nor should the Kioways, who have also manifested a decidedly hostile disposition, have received their share; but the agent was compelled to let them have it to prevent their taking it by force.

To keep the tribes inhabiting and roaming through the country on the Upper Arkansas under proper subjection, and to protect our communication with New Mexico, it would seem to be essential that there should be a military post established at some proper point in that region.

The scanty information we have in regard to the Indians of Utah is not reliable or satisfactory. It is much to be feared that they have been tampered with, and their feelings towards the United States alienated to such an extent by the Mormons that in any difficulties with the latter a large portion of them may be found on the side of those enemies of our Government and laws. Such a state of things has been apprehended by this office for some time, as will be seen from the accompanying copies of reports upon the subject from the acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs to your predecessor in 1855.

The superintendent for California reports that universal peace prevails among the tribes throughout the State, "that not a hostile sentiment is entertained by the Indians in any portion of the State, and a general feeling of security pervades the entire white population." He further states that "the progress of the reservations is attended with as great a degree of success as could be expected or desired by the most sanguine friend of that system;" that "the Indians perform with entire willingness all the labor required;" and that "the progress they have made in acquiring a knowledge of the pursuits of industry is remarkable and in the highest degree encouraging to the friends of the system of subsisting Indians by their own labor." Among other interesting evidences of this good result, he cites the fact that at the Nome Lake reservation the wheat crop of this year, consisting of over ten thousand bushels, was entirely harvested, threshed, sacked, and hauled to the storehouse by the Indians, attended only by two white men as overseers.

An extreme drought has cut off the crop on the reservations in the southern part of the State, and additional expense may have to be incurred to save the Indians from suffering from that cause, which every effort is being made to prevent.

Five reservations in all have been established, viz: Sebastian or Tejon, Klamath, Nome Lake, Mendocino, and Fresno Farm, on which about eleven thousand two hundred and thirty-nine Indians have been colonized, and are in course of being successfully trained to habits of industry. From the representations of the superintendent, there must be a marked difference in the habits and condition of those who have settled on the reservations and those who have not yet submitted themselves to this beneficent plan for their preservation and improvement. A most reprehensible practice has prevailed to some extent in California of kidnapping Indian children and selling them for servants. This practice has been confined to a few persons, and I am happy to say that it has been condemned and discountenanced by the great mass of the people. There have, however, been some difficulties growing out of it; but energetic measures having been adopted by the Government to suppress it, and some of the parties engaged in it having been convicted and sent to the penitentiary, it is believed that there will not be a renewal of these troubles. A large number of claims have been presented for payment for supplies furnished the Indian service in California during the years 1851 and 1852, which have not been paid for want of appropriations, but which have been constantly pressed on this office. Attention was called to this matter by Commissioner Lea, on the 7th April, 1852, in a communication to the Secretary of the Interior, in which he recommended that an appropriation should be made to enable the Department to investigate the claims. On the 13th of the same month, in response to a resolution of the Senate, he renewed this recommendation, but no action was taken by Congress in reference to it until 1854, when, by the act of 29th July of that year, a special appropriation of $183,825, with interest thereon from the 1st day of June, 1851, at the rate of ten per centum per annum, was made to pay John Charles Fremont, who was one of the claimants; Congress having thus acknowledged the validity of these claims. I beg leave to renew the recommendation of Commissioner Lea, that they should be investigated with a view to their final settlement. As the matter stands at present, some of the commissioners are charged with large sums of money, and as they allege that they were surrounded with such a state of affairs as to make these expenditures necessary in order to avert an Indian war, and that their action did have that effect, it is proper that their conduct should be investigated, and, if found justifiable, that they should be relieved from such heavy liabilities, and have their accounts adjusted with the Government.

I would invite special attention to the report of the superintendent for Oregon and Washington, from which it appears to be manifest that our relations with the Indians in those Territories are in a very critical condition, and that under the existing state of things there is a constant liability to a general outbreak on their part from any disturbing cause, which must involve the expenditure of millions to subdue them, as well as the most lamentable loss of life and property, by the insufficiently protected white inhabitants. The non-ratification of the treaties heretofore made, to extinguish their title to the lands necessary for the occupancy and use of our citizens, seems to have produced no little disappointment, and the continued extension of our settlement into their territory, without any compensation being made to them, is a constant source of dissatisfaction and hostile feeling. They are represented as being willing to dispose of their land to the Government, and I know of no alternative to the present unsatisfactory and dangerous state of things but the adoption of early measures for the extinguishment of their title, and their colonization on properly located reservations, using and applying their consideration agreed to be allowed to them for their lands to subsist and clothe them until they can be taught and influenced to support and sustain themselves. The losses and damage to the Government and to the citizens resulting from another general outbreak on the part of these Indians would, probably, fully equal, if not exceed in amount, what would be necessary to buy out and colonize them, so that they could be effectually controlled, if not improved and civilized.

Our settlements, as well as the friendly Indians along Puget Sound and the waters of Admiralty inlet, suffer materially from the predatory incursions of the Indians from Vancouver's Island, and the other adjacent British and Russian possessions. They are an enterprising, warlike race, and generally make their expeditions by water in large boats or canoes; some of them large enough to carry a hundred men, which they propel with much swiftness. To afford the necessary protection to our people from their frequent depredations, the employment of a light-draught armed steamer in those waters, to intercept and chastise them, is essential.

Referring to the report of the superintendent for the southern superintendency, who has elaborately and ably discussed the subject in its application to the Indians of his district, I urgently repeat the recommendation of my immediate predecessor, that there be an early and complete revision and codification of all the laws relating to Indian affairs, which, from lapse of time and material changes in the location, condition, and circumstances of the most of the tribes, have become so insufficient and unsuitable as to occasion the greatest embarrassment and difficulty in conducting the business of this branch of the public service.

All of which is respectfully submitted by your obedient servant,
J. W. DENVER,
Commissioner.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

Report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

PENSION OFFICE, October 19, 1857.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you the following report of the operations of this branch of your Department for the past year. The duties with which, under your supervision and direction, it is charged, are comprised under two general heads, viz: pensions and bounty lands. Under the first, it has been customary, of late years, to confine the annual reports of its labors to the last preceding fiscal year; and, under the second, to the year ending the 30th of September. For convenience and readiness of comparison, I have adhered to this plan.

Report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

SENATE & H. OF REPS.

PENSIONS.

The accompanying table, marked A, exhibits the number of original claims for Army pensions and applications for increase of those previously granted which have been admitted during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June last, and the aggregate annual amount of the same in the several States and Territories.

Table marked B, shows the amount of arrears of pension allowed and payable at the date of allowance in the several States and Territories during the same period.

Table marked C, is a statement of the number of Army pensioners on the rolls 30th June last, in the several States and Territories, and the aggregate yearly amount of their pensions.

Table marked D, shows the amount paid for Army pensions in the several States and Territories during the last fiscal year.

Table marked E, exhibits the balance in the hands of each of the agents for paying Army pensions on the 30th June last.

Table marked F, has exclusive reference to Navy pensions, and shows—

1. The number and yearly amount of original applications and number of claims for increase of Navy pensions admitted during the last fiscal year.

2. The number of pensioners on the rolls in the several States and Territories, on the 30th June last, and the aggregate yearly amount of their pensions.

3. The amount paid for Navy pensions in the several States and Territories during the last fiscal year.

4. The balances in the hands of the several agents for paying Navy pensions, at the close of the fiscal year.

The whole number of original Army pension claims admitted during the year under the act in force, was eight hundred and seventy-two, involving the aggregate annual sum of $64,619 03; and the number of pensions previously allowed, which have been increased, was one hundred and seventy-seven, amounting to the sum of $8,950 48. The total amount of arrears of pensions involved in these admissions, and which were payable at the date of issuing the certificates, was $230,501 72. The whole number of original Navy pension claims allowed during the same period was seventy-five, amounting in the aggregate to the annual sum of $9,464 50; and the number of pensions increased was four, for the sum of $121 25. The aggregate sum of the arrears due and payable at the time of issuing the certificates, was $10,833 68. The total amount paid for Army and Navy pensions at the several agencies during the past fiscal year, was $1,365,717 54. The whole number of pensioners on the various rolls on the 30th June was thirteen thousand one hundred and eighty-six, whose annual pensions amounted to the sum of $1,136,386 50.

The sum of the balances in the hands of the paying agents on the 30th of June last was $174,346 08, being $53,754 03 less than at the close of the preceding fiscal year. This results from the care taken to prevent the undue accumulation of funds in the hands of the agents by unnecessarily large advances to them.

Of the $230,501 72 arrears in virtue of Army pensions admitted during the last fiscal year, the sum of $19,658 was allowed under acts granting invalid pensions; $52,162 59, under the acts of 15th May, 1828, and 7th June, 1832, granting pensions to revolutionary soldiers; $125,682 93 under the several acts granting pensions to the widows of revolutionary soldiers; and $32,998 20 to the widows and minor children of deceased officers and soldiers who have been pensioned for service subsequent to the revolutionary war.

The first act of general application, granting pensions for revolutionary services, was that passed on the 18th of March, 1818, which gave a pension to all officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, musicians, mariners, and marines, who had served in the Continental Army or Navy to the close of the war, or for a period of nine consecutive months—an allowance to commissioned officers of twenty dollars, and to non-commissioned officers, privates, &c., of eight dollars per month, "if, from reduced circumstances, they should be in need of assistance from the country for support." The amount paid out under this act, to the 30th of June last, was, in round numbers, $22,320,000.

The next in the series of revolutionary pension acts was that of 15th of May, 1828, which, without qualification as to property, gave, in effect, to all officers and soldiers who served in the continental line of the Army to the close of the war, or, in the case of officers, if they became supernumerary, the amount of their full pay in said line, not to exceed in any case, however, the pay of a captain in the line. Under this act, the amount paid to 30th of June last was $2,601,000.

Then came the more comprehensive act of 7th of June, 1832. The provisions of this act embraced all persons who had been engaged, in a military capacity, in the revolutionary war, whether in the militia, State troops, the navies of the several States, or in the continental line, provided the term or terms of service aggregately amounted to as much as six months—a service of two years entitling the party to the full pay of his grade, and a shorter period of service to a proportionate allowance. The amount expended under this act, to 30th of June last, was $18,090,960.

Then followed a series of acts granting pensions to the widows of revolutionary soldiers.

The first of these acts—that approved 4th July, 1836—granted for life to widows of revolutionary soldiers the same amount of pension their husbands would have been entitled to receive under the provisions of the act of 7th June, 1832, provided their marriage had taken place prior to the expiration of the last period of their husband's service. The amount paid out under this act, to 30th June last, was $6,183,581.

The act of 7th July, 1838, granted to those widows whose marriage took place subsequent to the expiration of the last period of their husband's service, but prior to the 1st of January, 1794, a like amount of pension, but for five years only. These pensions were renewed for a further period of five years, by the acts of 3d March, 1843, and 17th June, 1844. The amount expended under these three acts was $7,045,317.

By the act approved February 2, 1848, the class of pensions created by the act of July 7, 1838, was placed upon the same footing as to duration as the class provided for by the act of 4th July, 1836, viz: for life; and by the act of 29th July, 1848, like provision was made for those widows whose marriage took place at any time prior to the year 1800. The amount paid under these two acts up to 30th June last was $3,275,166.

The last of this series of widows' acts, as they are called, is that of February 3, 1853, which created still another class of pensioners, viz: those widows of revolutionary soldiers who had been married at any time subsequent to the year 1800; and under this law there had been paid, to 30th June last, the sum of $1,798,596.

It will be perceived that, under the acts enumerated, upwards of sixty-one million dollars in pensions have been paid on account of revolutionary services, either to the soldiers themselves, their widows, or their representatives.

You have recently decided, in accordance with the legal views of the Attorney General, that the practice which has heretofore prevailed—but not wholly without interruption or question as to its legality—of permitting the children or other representatives of such deceased persons as might have got themselves placed upon the pension rolls, to present and establish such claims, and receive the pensions the soldiers or their widows might have enjoyed during their lives, was without warrant of law; and, by your direction, the practice has been discontinued. What portion of the vast amount above stated was paid to others than the soldiers and their widows could only be ascertained by an examination of all the numerous claims heretofore admitted. This would involve a length of time and amount of labor which would not be justified by any practical result to be obtained. In order, however, that some idea might be formed on the subject, I caused a partial examination to be made, and found, of the aggregate amount of arrears allowed and paid during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1856, under all the acts granting pensions to the widows of revolutionary soldiers, (excepting the act of 3d February, 1853,) one half was allowed after their decease, and paid to their representatives; and that, of the $232,498 96 allowed and paid under the acts of 15th May, 1828, and 7th June, 1832, as arrears during the four years intervening between the 1st July, 1853, and 30th June, 1857, $199,454 03 (being about six sevenths of the whole amount) was paid to the representatives of deceased soldiers.

Although these facts do not furnish correct data by which to arrive at the proportion paid at earlier dates under the pension laws to revolutionary men and their widows on the one hand, and to their representatives on the other, still they conclusively show that a very large amount has heretofore been paid the latter. At this late day, but few, if any, valid original claims can be presented by revolutionary soldiers or their widows, except those widows of the class provided for by the act of 1853. If, therefore, the practice of permitting the representatives of those parties to establish and recover such claims should be legalized, they would become, in future adjustments of pensions, with but a fractional abatement, the sole recipients of the bounty granted by Congress to the beneficiaries designated in the various pension laws as the proper objects of the beneficence of the nation.

In view of the possibility that the practice in question may be revived by law, and extended so as to entitle grandchildren or other representatives where no children of the soldiers or their widows survive, I deem it proper to state, in advance, that not even an approximate estimate could be made of the additional amount which would be required under it, as the office could have no information as to the number of cases outstanding, and which have not been presented in any form because of the well-known fact of the exclusion of representatives other than children, by the rules of the Department, from any benefits under the pension laws.

When it is considered that the large amount herein shown to have been paid out by the United States in the form of pensions on account of revolutionary services, is exclusive of the disbursements made to revolutionary invalids; of the pensions granted by private acts and paid out of special appropriations; that it is exclusive of the amount paid to the officers of the Revolution as commutation in lieu of half pay for life, (estimated to have been $5,000,000,) and of the amount paid under the provisions of the act of July 5, 1832, by which the United States assumed the obligations incurred by Virginia to a portion of her State troops; that it is exclusive also of land bounty provided by the United States, and of pensions as well as land bounty provided by the several States; and exclusive, as matter of course, of all sums which will hereafter be paid to pensioners now on the rolls and to those who may hereafter be placed thereon, it can no longer be justly charged that the Government has been unmindful of its obligations towards those patriotic men of the past who willingly sacrificed, in their country's cause, everything but their honor.

Attention has frequently, and in various ways, been invited to the discriminations between the invalid and half-pay pensions provided for the Army, and those for the Navy, whether as regards the rates, the conditions under which granted, or their duration. For instance: in cases of total disability, the highest rates of pension are, in the Army, $30 per month; in the Navy, $50. The lowest rates for the same are, in the Army, $8 per month; in the Navy, $3; and in the marine corps, $3 50. Can any just reason exist for these discriminations against the higher grades of the Army, and the lower grades of the Navy and the marine corps?

But as regards the half-pay pensions to widows and orphans, the inequalities are still more striking, as well as more numerous. As an illustration: Two officers, or others, one of the Army, the other of the Navy, die whilst in the service. The widow of the latter only is pensioned, because in Navy cases it is sufficient if the husband shall have died of wounds or disease incurred in the service, and in the line of duty; whereas, in the Army cases, death must not only have resulted from the same causes, but such causes must have originated in time of war. On the other hand; the death of the Navy officer must have occurred in the service, while, as to the Army claimant, it is immaterial whether the death occurred in or out of the service. Again, as to the duration of half-pay pensions: Army pensions to widows are for the term of five years, renewable for a second term of five years. If terminated by marriage, the right thereto is revived by subsequent widowhood. Navy pensions to widows are during life or widowhood; and if terminated by marriage, are not renewable upon recurrence of widowhood.

Report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

These discriminations are obviously unjust, and ought to be removed; and the pension system so modified as to make equal provision for the officers and men of both arms of the service, (having proper regard to their relative rank,) and for their widows and orphans.

I would also particularly invite your attention to the insufficiency of the lower grades of pension to afford, what was doubtless the benevolent intention of Congress, the means of support. It cannot be supposed, for example, that $3 50 per month would support either an invalid totally disabled, or a widow; especially should she have, as is often the case, helpless children depending upon her; and as disability is the meritorious ground of claim upon the country for assistance, the relief afforded should commence and end with the disability, and be subject to corresponding mutations, and be increased or diminished accordingly; but no person holding a Federal office, or in the receipt of a regular salary, should be allowed at the same time to draw pension as an invalid; nor should any officer, &c., of the Army or Navy be permitted to draw a pension whilst in the service and in the receipt of pay equal to that of the rank held at the time of becoming disabled.

BOUNTY LAND.

The several acts of Congress granting bounty lands to certain of the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, of the war of 1812, the war with Mexico, and the various Indian wars since 1790, which were passed prior to that of 3d March, 1855, had then been so nearly executed that it seems useless longer to recapitulate the annual operations of the office under them.

On the 30th September, 1856, the number of bounty land claims on the files, under the act of 3d March, 1855, which had been examined and suspended, and were awaiting explanation or additional evidence, and, therefore, constantly liable to be called up for reexamination with a view to their admission, or to answer inquiries relating thereto, was..... 43,740

During the year 41,483 warrants have been issued, requiring to satisfy them 5,952,160 acres of the public domain, as follows:

The number of claims on the suspended files on the 30th of September last, was 59,190; so that, at that time, the whole number of claims in the different offices where the rolls are kept, and those undergoing some of the various processes in this office prior to final action, was 8,116.

The quantity of land granted under operation of all the bounty land laws of the United States, to the 30th September last, is as follows:

During the past year ten persons have been convicted, and are now undergoing punishment, for the presentation to this office of false and forged bounty land claims, for the purpose of defrauding the United States. Others are under indictments yet pending; and there are several others against whom the evidence of guilt was so conclusive that steps have been taken for their arrest. The quantity of land involved in these fraudulent applications is about sixty-three thousand acres, all of which will doubtless be saved to the Government by the timely entry of caveats against the issuing of patents in cases where warrants had issued before the frauds were discovered. But while the office has been fortunate enough in most cases to detect the fraud in time to prevent loss to the United States, it has not always been able to do so in time to institute the proper judicial proceedings within the period of two years fixed by the statute of limitation. If any change in the statute of limitations, in respect to frauds or offenses generally, be repugnant to justice or sound policy, it is, nevertheless, respectfully suggested whether the ease with which frauds may be perpetrated against this office, and the difficulty attending the collection of the proofs, should not constitute an exception to the general policy.

There is another class of frauds, but for which, it has been decided in the United States circuit court in the State of Ohio, punishment cannot be inflicted under existing laws, viz: the imitation or counterfeiting of bounty-land warrants or certificates. The office is aware of recent attempts to renew this kind of imposition, but to what extent, or with what success, is not known. The attention of Congress was invited to this subject by your immediate predecessor; but no remedy for the evil having been provided, it is thus brought to your notice for such further action as you may deem necessary and proper.

The labors of the office under this head during the past year do not compare favorably with those of the preceding year, if we look alone at the number of bounty land claims received and warrants issued. It should, however, be borne in mind that the reexamination of suspended claims involves greater care and more patient investigation than original or new claims do; that with the lapse of time since the passage of the act, the impatience of parties to learn the fate of their claims increases the number of inquiries to be answered by letter and otherwise; that a considerable portion of the clerical force of the office is now engaged in reexamining and correcting the old temporary registers, and in the preparation of new and permanent ones; and that, withal, the number of clerks employed was reduced during the first six months of the year from one hundred and thirty-five to eighty-seven, and the expenditures on account of clerk hire from $195,640 to $129,240, besides material reductions in the contingent expenses.

The business of the office is generally as nearly up to date in its various branches as its nature will permit.

I cannot, with justice, close this report without bearing willing testimony to the fidelity and zeal manifested by the officers connected with this bureau, in the discharge of their various duties.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant, GEO. C. WHITING,

Commissioner.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

Report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

OFFICE COMMISSIONER PUBLIC BUILDINGS, October 15, 1857.

SIR: I am required by the fifteenth section of the civil and diplomatic act approved August 4, 1854, to report to you annually the operations of this office, and the manner of applying the appropriations to be disbursed under its direction, in time to accompany the President's message to Congress, and I now respectfully proceed to discharge this duty.

In addition to the usual annual repairs of the Capitol, I have been obliged to repair the heavy damage it sustained from the great hail-storm that occurred on the 21st of June. Every skylight in the building was broken, not only the exterior, but the costly interior glass; and the copper roof was materially injured. The roof also unavoidably suffers much damage from the work going on in rebuilding the dome, but by carefully watching it, and making repairs as soon as needed, I think it can be preserved from leaking. I have also caused such portions of the wood and iron work about the Capitol as was likely to be injured from exposure to the weather to be repaired. The chandeliers in the Senate Chamber and Hall of Representatives, which had become much defaced and out of order from long use, have been thoroughly repaired and renovated, and all the gas fittings throughout the building are now in good condition. The annoyance occasioned by the frost in the winter and spring of 1856, in frequently preventing half the lamps from burning, induced me to send an agent last fall to the northern cities to inquire into the manner of lighting, and the means of preventing the troubles which were the source of so much complaint in this city. His inquiries resulted in the ascertainment of much interesting and useful information in regard to the whole subject of gas lighting. He was enabled to apply an effectual remedy to the evils of which we complained, and ever since there has been no interruption to the lights from the effects of frost. The roof of the President's house has also suffered much damage from the hail-storm. The copper was perforated in many places, and the joints generally loosened. The consequence was, the roof had to be overhauled, thoroughly repaired, and painted. This involved a considerable expenditure, which was not taken into account in preparing my estimate for the usual annual repairs of the house and grounds.

The green-houses in the President's garden were likewise very much damaged by the hail: more than five thousand panes of glass were destroyed.

The ceiling of the east room and the wood-work of the principal stories have been appropriately painted. Many other improvements have been made in and about the building, which were absolutely necessary, and with which it would not be proper to lumber this report. I will, however, mention that a ventilating flue was built from the basement to the upper story, which has evidently produced a great improvement in the atmosphere of the house, which before was pent up and damp whenever the windows were closed for a few hours.

The new stable for the President's house has been erected, and is ready for use. A conservatory has been built on the west terrace, and is so near completion that in a few days the plants may be transferred to it. The President's house, as is well known, is in a very unhealthy location. Its inmates are subject to intermittent fever, which of late years has proved obstinate and difficult of cure. The knowledge of this fact has frequently elicited the suggestion that a country residence, convenient to the city, ought to be provided for the President, where he could take up his abode during the sickly months of summer and fall.

A new building in some other part of the city would doubtless obviate the objection to the present location, but none so central and convenient could be found. The cost of a summer residence for the President would be inconsiderable in comparison with the object desired to be attained.

The frequent and heavy rains with which the city has been visited during the past summer operated very much to retard work of every description. There were often days together when nothing could be done, either from the constant fall of rain or from its effect upon materials which rendered them unfit to be worked. The out-door works, such as grading streets and public grounds, were very much damaged by the rains, which added considerably to their cost. Since the weather has become more settled, the various works in progress have been urged forward with the utmost speed consistent with a due regard to stability, and much more has been accomplished than could reasonably have been anticipated from the unfavorable circumstances that attended the greater portion of the working season.

The following works, which were stated in my last report to be then in progress, have been finished, viz: the repairs, improvements, and extension of the seed-room and green-house in the botanic garden; the grading and improvement of the mall, between Twelfth and Fourteenth streets; the trapping of the mouths of the sewers on Pennsylvania avenue; the extension of the culvert on Indiana avenue, and the alteration of the District court-room. In regard to the sewer traps, it affords me pleasure to inform you that they answer the purpose admirably for which they were intended. Before they were constructed, the offensive odor that arose from the sewers was a constant source of complaint, but now not the slightest unpleasant smell escapes from them. The traps ought to be frequently cleaned out, and especially as there is no ordinance of the city to prevent the litter of the stores, such as paper, straw, and the like, from being swept into the gutters, which is soon floated by the slightest stream of water into the cylinders of the traps, and collecting and becoming impacted prevents the water from flowing freely through them. A very small appropriation would keep them unobstructed.

An addition to the green-house in the botanic garden has been erected in conformity with the adopted plan of the building, and is supplied with water from the Capitol, in pipes, as provided for by an appropriation of the last session of Congress. Two additional propagating houses have also been built.

A lot was purchased last fall on which to erect an engine-house for the Franklin Fire Company, but possession could not be obtained until the spring. A large, commodious, and substantial building has been reared upon it, which, in a few days, will be turned over to the company.

New Jersey avenue has been graded and graveled from D to I streets, and the curb set and the gutter paved on the west side of it. From I street to New York avenue it has been graded, and fifty feet in the center graveled. It will be necessary to curb and gutter the whole length of the avenue, on both sides, to prevent its being washed by the rains. This was not included in the estimate submitted to Congress. More than was contemplated has been accomplished by the appropriation.

The work for continuing the improvement of the mall is now progressing rapidly in that portion of it on which the armory is situated. I am in hopes of having the grading finished by the termination of the working season. The plan that has been adopted harmonizes with the object for which the armory was erected, and will doubtless add very much to the appearance of the mall, which is destined to be one of the most interesting features in the plan of the city.

The footway on the south side of Lafayette square has been taken up, under-drained, and relaid. Lamp-posts and lamps have been set upon the three sides of the square which have not been heretofore lighted, and they show the square to great advantage. As an evidence of the favor in which Lafayette square is held by the public, it is only necessary to direct attention to the crowds that visit it on every fair evening.

All the footways across Pennsylvania avenue, which were very much broken, and in many of them whole pieces of the flagging were removed, have been repaired. Workmen have been for some time and are still engaged in repairing the carriage-way. It is difficult to keep the avenue in good condition, as the cobble-stones of which it is paved are easily started from their beds by the momentum of the heavy vehicles that run over them.

Congress at the last session made an appropriation of $5,000 for repaving Pennsylvania avenue, at the intersection of Seventh street, on the plan known as "Belgian pavement," and one thousand square yards of the avenue have been paved with that description of pavement, at an expense of five dollars per yard. It was intended as an experiment. The part of the avenue selected subjected the experiment to the severest test, as it is more traveled over by heavy vehicles than any other portion of the avenue or any other street. The pavement was laid in June, and up to the present time it remains firm and compact, and I have not the slightest doubt of its durability. It is claimed for the Belgian pavement that it is as durable as any other, and possesses great advantages over all others. The Russ pavement in New York is said to have proved a failure; it soon wears smooth, and becomes so slippery that horses in traveling upon it frequently fall, and in wet weather they can scarcely be kept upon their feet with every possible care. The Russ pavement is laid upon a concrete bottom, which prevents any drainage except such as is conveyed off by the gutters, and the consequence is, the evaporation from the surface frequently occasions very offensive effluvia. Another great objection to the Russ pavement is the difficulty of removing it, when necessary to open it for laying pipe or other purposes, and the still greater difficulty of replacing it in anything like the condition in which it was before disturbed.

Iron pavements are represented to be very injurious to the feet of horses. They are dusty in dry and dirty in wet weather, owing to the space between the prongs being filled with earth. I understand that it is necessary to file them frequently.

None of the objections that exist against the Russ and iron pavements can be urged against the Belgian pavement. The rock of which it is constructed is broken in size adapted to the feet of horses, which affords them a firm foot-hold without injury, and does not wear smooth. It is laid in sand, can easily be removed and readjusted when necessary to open the street, is thoroughly drained, free from everything offensive, and perfectly clean. So far as my information extends, I believe it is much cheaper than either the Russ or iron pavements. If it should be determined to repave Pennsylvania avenue, I do not think as good a pavement could be selected for the purpose as the Belgian.

The flagging of the main entrance to the Congressional burying ground has been finished as far as the Government vault. The estimate was made for flagging the whole avenue, but by some inadvertence in wording the appropriation it was made to stop at the vault. Doubtless Congress will rectify the mistake by authorizing the balance of the appropriation to be applied in extending the flagging the whole length of the avenue, as was originally intended.

The appropriation for erecting a bridge across the canal in a line with Maine avenue, has not been used, as the language of the appropriation requires a double track to be made, which would seem to indicate that it was a bridge intended to be for the accommodation of carriages and other vehicles. The canal forms the eastern terminus of Maine avenue, and as Canal street is only forty feet wide, a sufficient elevation could not be given to the bridge to allow of the passage of boats under, and of vehicles over it. The appropriation might be usefully applied to the erection of a foot bridge, and I incline strongly to the opinion that Congress intended it for that purpose, as the slightest examination of the location will render it obvious that no other description of bridge is practicable.

The central avenue in the botanic garden, and the walks leading from it to Maine and Missouri avenues, will be paved with flagging, as provided for by an appropriation of the last session of Congress, on or before the first of next month, unless prevented by unfavorable weather or some disappointment not now anticipated.

The injury sustained by the Potomac bridge from the tremendous and unusual flood of ice at the breaking up of the last winter, was well nigh putting an end to that means of communication between the two shores. Several sections were swept away entirely, and most of what was left was so much damaged that it was a matter of surprise the whole had not been carried off. The interruption of this medium of intercourse between the District and Virginia shores was immediately felt in the markets of the city by a diminution of supplies and an enhancement of prices. The difficulty and expense of reaching the city through other channels of communication not only deprived the producers, who have to cross the river, of the benefit of the increased price of products, but actually reduced the profits on the products of their labor so low as scarcely to make it an object for them to come to market. This state of things was regarded by the citizens of Washington and Alexandria county as a great grievance, and they earnestly appealed to you to remedy it, by directing me to use such means as might be applicable to the object for the immediate reestablishment of travel across the bridge. In view of the action of Congress at the last session, which was fully apprised of the condition of the bridge and failed to make an appropriation for the reconstruction of the portion that had been carried away, and of the doubt that was entertained as to the sufficiency of the usual appropriation for casual repairs to place it in anything like a safe and permanent traveling condition, you decided that it would not be advisable in me to attempt to repair it in its then condition.

The Corporation of Washington, finding that the Government would not undertake to repair the bridge, and yielding to the demands of public sentiment, made an appropriation to reconstruct it, at least so far as to reestablish communication between the shores, to be expended under the direction of the Mayor and a committee of one member from each board of the city councils. The breaches in the bridge were accordingly closed, and other portions of the structure strengthened, so as to allow of the usual travel over it. I did not consider it my duty to interpose any obstacle to the accomplishment of the object the corporation had in view, and therefore made no attempt to arrest the work; but as soon as the bridge was thrown open to public travel, and I was notified by the Mayor that he had withdrawn his workmen, it then became necessary for me to resume charge of it, and to make such additional repairs as were deemed important to render it perfectly safe.

Congress, at the last session, refused to make the usual appropriation for paying the draw-keepers of the bridge, which imposed upon me the necessity of assuming the responsibility of employing them, as otherwise the navigation of the river above the bridge would have been closed to vessels destined for the port of Georgetown and that portion of the canal that passes through the city. The great inconvenience and loss which the public suffered from the interruption of travel over the bridge demonstrates the importance of keeping up the present structure until a new bridge shall have been erected.

The Navy-Yard bridge was also very much injured by ice, which has been repaired in as substantial a manner as it would admit of, having been originally built of bad materials, and in a very slight manner. The bridge requires new piles from one end to the other, as there is scarcely a sound one in the whole fabric. There are two short roads connected with this bridge, which were made by the company from which the Government purchased it, and they were a part of the appurtenances of the bridge. For several years after the purchase, they were kept in repair by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and the expense was paid out of the appropriation for the repairs of bridges. It was, however, a few years since decided that no part of the appropriation could be applied for that purpose, and that it must be confined to objects within the plain meaning of its language. The levy court of the county declined exercising jurisdiction over the roads, as they belong to the Government; and the consequence has been, they are now in such bad condition that it is with the utmost difficulty they can be traveled. It is due to the public who travel across the bridge that these roads should be repaired by some authority or other. My own opinion is, that they should be placed under the control of the levy court, which has jurisdiction over all the other highways of the county. It would not be just, though, to saddle the county with them in their present condition; and I would, therefore, respectfully recommend that an appropriation be made sufficient to put them in first rate order, which shall be paid to the levy court on condition that the court agree to take charge of them, and forever keep them in repair.

The Anacostia bridge is in good condition. The usual annual repairs will, without an accident, preserve it sound for many years.

The grading of Judiciary square has progressed as far as was contemplated by the appropriation for that purpose, but much still remains to be done before the grading is completed. I, however, think the work, preparatory to ornamenting the square, has proceeded to such an extent that due notice ought now to be given the Corporation of Washington to remove the school-house standing upon it, and I the more incline to this opinion as opportunity ought to be afforded for the erection of another building for the accommodation of the school before it is deprived of the use of the one now in its occupancy.

Eighty-one lamps have been set up in Georgetown, and are now regularly lighted with the other lamps of the town. They give great satisfaction, and are duly appreciated as an evidence of the kind interest which the Government takes in the town. The appropriation was not sufficiently large to allow of as many lamps being put up as would fully light the streets. Thirty lamps more would accomplish that object, which will cost $810, all complete. It is no fault of mine that the appropriation was not large enough, as I was not called upon for an estimate. The information was derived from other sources, usually very reliable, but in this instance incorrect. I carefully regarded in my expenditures the restriction of the proviso to the clause making the appropriation. The lamp-posts and lamps cost considerably less than those on Pennsylvania avenue, and I pay the same price for the gas consumed by them.

The west wing of the Patent Office building, with the exception of the saloon, which will soon be finished, has been completed, and is now occupied. The portico has also been erected. It affords me pleasure to assure you that the whole work of this wing has been constructed in the most substantial and satisfactory manner, and that great credit is due to Mr. Clark, the architect, for the intelligent and vigilant superintendence he has exercised over it. In order to overcome, in some measure, the great depression in the square at the corner of F and Ninth streets, it will be necessary, in laying the pavement on Ninth street, to set the curb as high as possible, consistent with the proper grade of the street. This will devolve upon us the necessity of filling up Ninth street at least two feet, which will not, however, raise it above the established grade.

Contracts have been made for the granite and marble work of the north front of the building. The sub-basement has been set, and workmen are now engaged in preparing the granite and marble, so as to be ready to take advantage of the earliest opening of spring to press forward the building. We hope, at the close of the next session, to make a handsome show of the amount of work that has been done.

The floods occasioned by the heavy rains of the past summer have proved that the plan adopted for the protection of the botanic garden against the violence of Tiber creek was ineffectual. The walls of the creek having been laid dry on foundations not sufficiently deep and solid, the water percolated them, and, washing out the earth from behind and beneath them, they were in many places thrown down. The work ought to be reconstructed on a timber foundation similar to that under the culvert across Indiana avenue, which should extend from Pennsylvania avenue to the canal, and, instead of dry walls, they should be laid in full cement. The plan I most approve would be to raise the walls two feet above high water mark, from which a very flat slope, well sodded, should extend to the general surface of the grounds. This plan would afford a larger bed for the stream when swollen, diminish its force, and lessen the chances of its doing mischief, and it would unquestionably present a much more elegant appearance than the present one.

I beg leave to renew the recommendations contained in my last report for the improvement of Franklin square, of the triangular spaces formed by the intersection of New York and Massachusetts avenues and Tenth and Twelfth streets, of the triangular spaces on Pennsylvania avenue between Eighteenth and Nineteenth streets, and of the space on the south side of Pennsylvania avenue between Twentieth and Twenty-first streets; the grading of North Capitol street, of Sixteenth street west, and of Delaware avenue; the removal of the naval monument from the Capitol grounds; the purchase of a lot, and the erection of a house for the keeper of the upper Eastern Branch bridge, and the reorganization of this office.

East Capitol street is directly in front of the center building of the Capitol, and in stepping on the portico it immediately arrests attention. It should be graded and graveled. This improvement is not only required for public convenience, but is necessary to give the Capitol proper effect in approaching it from that direction, and to present a fine vista in looking out from its main portico.

Boundary street extends from Rock creek to the Anacostia, around the entire northern portion of the city. The remainder of the city is bounded by water courses. All of the large avenues run out to Boundary street, with the exception of Pennsylvania and Virginia avenues. It is skirted nearly its whole length by beautiful groves of forest trees, and if opened and graveled, would make a pleasant ride around the city, which is at present very much wanted.

As it was doubtless intended for the benefit of all residents and sojourners in the city, and cannot be of any special advantage to those who live in its immediate vicinity, it would seem that Boundary street is one of those that present peculiar claims to the favorable consideration and liberality of the Government.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the fee simple to all the avenues and streets in the city is in the Government. The aggregate length of the streets is one hundred and ninety-nine miles, and of the avenues sixty-five miles. The city has taken upon itself to open and grade the streets under authority given to it by the Government, but is unwilling to do anything to the avenues, unless absolutely necessary for public convenience, and Congress will not make provision for them. This unwillingness proceeds from a want of ample means, and a strong conviction that the Government is bound in justice, as its share, to construct the avenues. Most of the streets have been opened and graded, and the work is prosecuted as fast as the revenue of the city will justify, but still it lags far behind the march of the improvements.

Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, are the only important avenues that have been opened and graded, and they only partially so.

The grand jury having repeatedly condemned the jail as unsafe and in all respects unsuited for the purposes of a prison, the Interior Department was called upon by the Senate for estimates and a plan for such a building as would meet the demands of the public. A plan was accordingly prepared with great care and submitted at the last session of Congress. The estimated cost of erecting the building was $150,000. There was, however, no definite action had upon the subject.

The present jail is situated on Judiciary square, in the very heart of the city, which is certainly a most improper location for a prison.

The judges of the several courts of this District, and the members of the bar, addressed a communication to your predecessor setting forth the great want of suitable accommodations for the criminal court and the important records of the clerk's office, and earnestly requesting him to bring the matter to the attention of Congress. Their request was complied with, and a plan was prepared for the extension of the court-house portion of the City Hall in harmony with the general plan of the building, the cost of which, including furniture, heating apparatus, inclosure, &c., was estimated at $30,000.

The orphan's court and the office of register of wills occupy very contracted and inadequate rooms in the city's portion of the same building. If the extension of the building should be made, which I think is very necessary, suitable provision can be made in it for the accommodation of the orphan's court and register of wills.

I ask your attention to the fifteenth section of the city charter, approved May 15, 1820, and the twelfth section of the amended charter, approved May 17, 1848. You will perceive that they require of me to make certain improvements, and to pay the expense of the same out of the proceeds of the sales of city lots belonging to the Government. All the Government lots that could command a purchaser have been sold. The few remaining lots are so situated that they would not bring their very low assessed nominal value. I could not, when recently offered at public sale, obtain a purchaser for them at any price.

The improvements provided for in the sections to which I have asked your attention are indispensable, and as the source from which the means to pay for them were to flow has dried up, it strikes me that there is no alternative but for the Government to make a small annual appropriation for the purpose.

The great nuisance heretofore complained of as occasioned by the Center market-house, has in some respects been mitigated. Commodious sheds have been erected in the rear of the market-house, on Canal street, for the accommodation of vendors, and consequently, the misshapen shanties which used to disfigure Pennsylvania avenue have been removed. Wagons and other vehicles which attend market, are no longer permitted to occupy and obstruct the avenue, and it is now free of the litter they produce, which, for a series of years, had been complained of as an abominable nuisance. But the old white-washed, moss-covered market-house still remains to mar the beauty of the avenue, and to excite the wonder of strangers that such an unsightly building should be permitted to occupy so conspicuous a position. Unless the corporation shall soon make provision to have it taken down, and to erect in its stead some more appropriate and imposing building, the Government ought, in my opinion, to resume control of the reservation, and not suffer it any longer to be occupied as a market-place.

The time is at hand when the work of extending the Capitol grounds ought to be commenced. The extent to which they should be enlarged is a matter for Congress to determine, and, therefore, it does not become me to express any preference between the various plans that have been suggested. I may, however, be permitted to express a hope that some plan will be adopted in the early part of the approaching session, and an appropriation made to carry it out, so that the work may be commenced as soon as the spring opens.

It is well known that great numbers of strangers are attracted to this city in pursuit of different objects. Many of them are taken sick, and not a few are destitute of the means of procuring the necessities of life and medical treatment. It would be unjust for the city to be saddled with the expense of taking care of this class of persons. To provide for its own destitute sick is as much as can be expected of it. Congress, actuated by a humane and benevolent spirit, annually makes an appropriation for the admission of eighteen sick non-resident paupers in the Washington Infirmary, where they are well provided with every necessary comfort, good nurses and skillful physicians. It will be perceived, on reference to the report of the resident physician, hereto appended, that during the year ending the 30th of June last, one hundred and nineteen patients were medically treated in this institution on the charity of the Government, of which number eighty-nine were discharged as cured or improved, only eleven died, and nineteen still remained under treatment. It is useless to make any comments upon this report. It tells for itself of the great amount of human suffering relieved and of human life preserved.

This field of benevolence might be greatly enlarged by an increased appropriation, as I have vastly many more applications for admission than the number I have a right to send to the Infirmary. Judging from the favor with which this charity has heretofore been regarded by Congress, I have every reason to believe that the sphere of its usefulness will be cheerfully extended.

The drainage of the city is mainly accomplished above ground, and the consequence is, the streets are overflowed whenever there is a heavy fall of rain, from the incapacity of the gutters to receive and carry off the vast quantity of water that seeks an outlet through them. It is almost impossible to keep streets clean that are subject to be overflowed; and the sediment which is left in them when the water passes off soon becomes offensive to the smell on exposure to the sun. The fact is well established, that countries liable to inundation are generally sickly, owing to the alluvial deposits; and the same cause might reasonably be expected to produce disease in cities. Washington, however, seems to be an exception to the rule of induction; for, notwithstanding the frequent overflow of the streets from heavy rains, medical statistics prove beyond a doubt that it is one of the healthiest cities in the country. To obviate the inconvenience resulting from the overflowing of the streets, and to prevent the possibility of sickness arising from this cause, a judicious system of sewerage should be adopted and carried into effect. In most of our large cities great attention has been bestowed upon the arrangement and construction of sewers, and they have reaped the benefit of them in the purification of the atmosphere, and a corresponding improvement in health. The Government has constructed several large sewers in this city, and the corporation a like number, but still there is a great deficiency for the wants of the city. What has already been done in the way of sewerage is but the beginning of what is needed, and speedy attention should be given to the subject, not only for sanitary purposes, but to provide for the disposal of the greatly increased quantity of water that will be used for bathing, washing pavements, cleaning streets, and other similar objects, when the aqueduct shall have been finished, and shall introduce into the city an abundant supply from the Great Falls of the Potomac.

To construct the necessary sewerage will require a large outlay of money, and considering the interest the United States have in property in the city, it may be deemed but just that the Government should bear a fair proportion of the expense. It is important that Congress should take this matter into consideration at the approaching session, and provide in some way for its accomplishment.

I hereto append a statement of receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JNO. B. BLAKE, Commissioner.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

Report of Lieutenant General Scott.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
NEW YORK, Nov. 20, 1857.

Sir: As the immediate commander of the army, under the President, I have the honor to submit the usual annual report on its general condition and wants.

Our regiments, horse and foot, including artillery, (serving mostly as infantry,) are, as I have remarked in former reports, anything but a peace establishment. For years they have been almost constantly in pursuit of hostile Indians, through swamps and mountains, in heats and snows, and with no inconsiderable loss of life from frequent combats, and a still greater mortality from excessive labor, deprivation and disease. In other wars those hardships are occasionally broken by rest and comfort, now long unknown to nine tenths of our troops; and hence another great evil—the numerous desertions which daily thin their ranks.

As a partial illustration of the extraordinary activity and sufferings I have spoken of, I beg leave to annex copies of two of my orders—Nos. 4 and 14—of the present year.

To mitigate those evils, and to enable us to give a reasonable security to our people on Indian frontiers, measuring thousands of miles, I respectfully suggest an augmentation of at least one regiment of horse, (dragoon, cavalry, or riflemen,) and at least three regiments of foot, (infantry or riflemen.) This augmentation would not more than furnish the reinforcements now greatly needed in Florida, Texas, New Mexico, California, Oregon, Washington Territory, Kansas, Nebraska, and Minnesota, leaving not a company for Utah. If the reinforcements should be authorized as early as January, it would be easy, in the present unfortunate want of profitable employment for the thousands of able-bodied men to be found idle in every populous district of the country, to make the number of recruits needed, and in time for them to reach the theaters of military operations in the summer and autumn of 1858. Of the relief which the measure would afford to our general population I may not speak in a military paper; but to the Army, and exposed frontiers under its protection, it would be immense.

It is eminently desirable, by all the reasonable means at the disposition of the Government, to attempt the moral elevation of our enlisted men—that is, all below commissioned officers. In physical comforts, whether they are sick or in health, the justice of Congress in respect to physicians, medicines, hospital stores, the pay, clothing, and subsistence of everybody, has scarcely left anything to be asked for. (The subject of quarters will be noticed in the sequel.) So, too, in respect to religious instruction; through some twenty and odd military chaplains—considering the great number of sects and the habitual dispersion of the troops—I have nothing practical to suggest. But to render the service honorable, so that citizens may freely enlist without the fear of harsh, arbitrary, or capricious treatment at the hands of any superior, some additional legislation seems indispensable. I allude to a revision of the rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States, particularly the forty-fifth, sixty-fifth, sixty-sixth, sixty-seventh, and ninety-ninth of those articles—all respecting the administration of justice. In order, among other things, to provide for the legal punishment of petty offenses, substituting, when necessary, courts consisting entirely of sergeants, so as to deprive commanders of small detachments and isolated companies of all pretexts—the want of officers to compose courts, &c.—for taking the law into their own hands, accordingly I recommend that the subject be in the first instance referred to a board consisting of intelligent officers of great experience with troops, and if their report be approved, that it next be submitted to Congress. The same board might, with great benefit, revise the general regulations of the Army and the conflicting systems of infantry tactics now in force.

In connection with penal justice, it is due to all good men in the ranks to say that they are directly interested in the suppression of crimes, disorders, and neglect, prejudicial to good order and military discipline, inasmuch as offenses hurt the just pride of the corps, and every offender put under guard or in arrest increases the duties and fatigues of his meritorious companions of the same class or rank.

I have a word to say in respect to quarters for troops on the sea-board. In our regular fortifications we have but little shelter, other than casemats for fighting siege guns, and these arches are too damp and otherwise uncomfortable for the lodgings of the troops. In respect to the Indian frontiers, except at one or two interior points for reserve, the troops are—when they chance to be allowed short rests—either in tents, winter as well as summer, or such miserable bush and mud huts as they have hastily constructed for the moment. Hence another cause of desertion, disease, and mortality. It is true that the frontiers are constantly shifting by the extension of settlements, and hence a great difficulty in providing permanent quarters, except for reserves, and we are far from having a regiment, or even a company, to be so posted.

The instruction of our artillery regiments in their appropriate duties with light and heavy batteries has been much neglected of late years—first, by capriciously dismounting several of the light companies, and sending others to the most unsuitable posts, in respect to supplies and health; and, second, by the necessary employment, from deficiency in other troops, of the greater part of each regiment as infantry on the Indian frontiers.

A school of practice, however, for garrisons, sea-coast, and siege artillery, is now being organized, on a small scale, at Fortress Monroe, to be enlarged as the regiments may be withdrawn from the Indian frontiers, when—also on regarrissoning our principal fortifications—each may be made a subordinate school. In the mean time, respectfully ask that the light companies remaining on foot be remounted, as authorized by law.

Of recommendations in former reports I beg leave specially to recall two:

1. A system of recruiting by and for the respective regiments, which it is conceived would create and nurture the esprit du corps—a family feeling in each—always highly conducive to moral elevation and military efficiency.

2. A revision of the pension laws, so as to place the Army on a like footing with the Navy, volunteers, and militia in this respect, as there can be no conceivable reason of any sort for a discrimination to our prejudice.

Please see vol. 2, p. 229, of the President's message, &c., December, 1856.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high respect, your most obedient servant,

WINFIELD SCOTT.

Hon. J. B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

NICARAGUAN AFFAIRS AND THE LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

SPEECH OF HON. L. Q. C. LAMAR, OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES;

January 13, 1858.

[WRITTEN OUT BY HIMSELF.*]

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the President's annual message—

Mr. LAMAR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is not my purpose to discuss the various questions involved in our Central American relations. Should I avail myself of a future occasion to do so, I may be forced reluctantly to dissent from some of the views so ably presented by my distinguished colleague, [Mr. QUITMAN.] However painful this may be to myself, I nevertheless feel confident of his generous indulgence, especially when he sees in my course only the reflex of his own spirit of independence; a spirit which runs like a stream of fire through all his acts and writings: which enabled him a few years since to light up the ardor of a thousand patriots, to fire his countrymen to the assertion of their rights, and at this day enshrines him in the hearts and affections of the people of his State, without distinction of party.

Mr. Chairman, any proposition which has for its object the advancement and progress of southern institutions, by equitable means, will always commend itself to my cordial approval. Others may boast of their widely-extended patriotism, and their enlarged and comprehensive love of this Union. With me, I confess that the promotion of southern interests is second in importance only to the preservation of southern honor. In reading her history and studying her character, I delight to linger in the contemplation of that stern and unbroken confidence with which the South has always clung to the integrity of her principles and the purity of her honor. In that unfortunate division which has separated our country into sections, natural causes, beyond our control, have assigned to her the weaker section. A numerical minority finds safety and protection alone in the power of truth and invincibility of right. The South, standing upon this high ground, has ever commanded the respect of her friends, and defied the assaults of her enemies. When ruthless majorities have threatened wrong and injustice, their hands have been stayed only by the deference which the worst spirits unconsciously pay to the cause of justice. In the long and bitter contests which have marked our internal struggles, the South has made but one demand—the Constitution of our common country, the claims of justice, and the obligations of States; and it is our boast to-day, that we can present a record unstained with a single evidence of violated faith or attempted wrong. The same regard for truth, justice, and honor, which characterizes our intercourse with the various sections of our own country, furnishes the safest rules for our dealings with other countries. As the Constitution is the law of our conduct at home, so let good faith be the rule of our conduct abroad.

If I could do so consistently with the honor of my country, I would plant American liberty, with southern institutions, upon every inch of American soil. I believe that they give to us the highest type of civilization known to modern times, except in those particulars dwelt upon so elaborately and complacently by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER.] In that particular form of civilization which causes the population of a country to emigrate to other lands for the means of subsistence, I concede to the North great superiority over our section. [Laughter.] There can be no doubt that New England, and especially Massachusetts, is a splendid country to emigrate from, and, in this respect, stands unrivaled, with perhaps the single exception of Ireland. [Laughter.] And right here I desire to express my acknowledgments to the gentleman for the very apt and classical comparison which he instituted between his section and the officina gentium. It never occurred to me before; but since he has mentioned it, I must confess to the resemblance, in many respects, between the recent emigration from New England and the irruption of the Goths and Vandals. [Laughter.] It is also due to candor that I should say that the gentleman's vindication of the emigrant aid societies places the objects and motives of that enterprise upon more defensible grounds than we of the South supposed to exist. For one, I am perfectly satisfied that the thing was demanded by necessity, and has resulted in benefit to all the parties concerned; that the country was benefited by getting rid of the population, and the population greatly benefited by leaving the country. [Laughter.]

To return from this digression: while I am a southern man, thoroughly imbued with the spirit of my section, I will never consent to submit the fate of our noble institutions to the hands of marauding bands, or violate their sanctity by identifying their progress with the success of unlawful expeditions; and most especially, when I see them receiving the countenance and sanction of a distinguished Senator, whose course on the Kansas question is so fresh in our recollection.

Before I consent to any new schemes of territorial acquisition, to be effected, as usual, by the prowess of southern arms, and the contribution of southern blood and treasure, I desire the question of the South's right to extend her institutions into territory already within the Union, practically and satisfactorily settled by the legislation of this Congress. These territorial acquisitions, so far, have been to the South like the far-famed fruit which grows upon the shores of the accursed sea, beautiful to sight, but dust and ashes to the lips. We learn from the President's message, that the people of Kansas, having reached the number that would justify her admission into the Union as a State, she has, by her duly constituted authorities, taken all the steps necessary to the attainment of this object, and will, in a short time, demand the redemption of the pledge of the Government, that she "shall be admitted, with or without slavery, as her constitution may prescribe at the time of such admission." But in advance of her application, we are informed by the distinguished author of the Kansas bill, and gentlemen upon this floor, that her case has been prejudged, and her claims rejected. This presents a question before whose colossal magnitude the wrongs of Walker and the criminality of Paulding sink into insignificance.

I propose to examine into the grounds upon which this violation of plighted faith is attempted to be justified. The ground principally relied upon is, that the constitution which she presents was framed by a convention not called in pursuance of an enabling or authorizing act of Congress, but on the mere motion of the Territorial Legislature. Now, sir, apart from the practice of the Government, which has not been uniform on this subject, I, for one, admit, to the fullest extent, the propriety and importance of such an act of Congress. I have always held that the sovereignty over these Territories was vested in the people of the United States; that the power of legislation in reference to them belonged to Congress, and that this power was limited only by the Constitution and the nature of the trust; and that before the inhabitants of the Territory are competent to form a constitution and a State government, it is necessary that Congress should first withdraw its authority over the Territories. The necessity of an enabling act I concede to the fullest extent. Whenever individuals in a Territory undertake to form a State government, without the previous assent of Congress, they are, in my opinion, guilty of gross usurpation and flagrant disregard of the rights of the United States and the authority of Congress. Under such circumstances, it becomes a question purely of discretion with Congress, whether to remand them to their territorial condition, or to waive the want of authority, and to ratify the proceedings as regular and lawful. The question now presents itself, do the circumstances attending the application of Kansas for admission into the Union present such a case?

Was the convention at Lecompton an unauthorized and revolutionary assemblage, usurping the sovereignty of the State, and throwing off, unlawfully, the authority of the United States? I hold that it was a convention of the people called by the regularly constituted authority, and with the previous assent of Congress. I hold that the Kansas bill was an enabling act, vesting the Territorial Legislature with power to call such a convention. In analyzing the provisions of that noble law, we find that it looks to higher objects and more enduring results than the mere organization of temporary territorial governments for Kansas and Nebraska. It looks beyond the territorial status; it provides for its admission as a State; and in express terms pledges the faith of Government that it shall be received into the Union "with or without slavery, as its constitution may prescribe at the time of such admission." It also declares the "intent and meaning of this act" to be, "not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of this act."

Now, had the bill stopped here—had it gone no further—there might be some ground for the objection that additional legislation by Congress is necessary. For the bill might guaranty to the people admission as a State, and the right of forming their constitution, and yet reserve to Congress the all-important power of determining when the people had attained a sufficient maturity and growth to fit them for the enjoyment and exercise of this highest and most glorious right of self-government. It might reserve to itself the power of determining who should constitute such a people—who should be the qualified voters—and in short, of prescribing all the steps preliminary to a call of the convention of the people. I say Congress might well have reserved all these high and delicate discretionary powers to herself, and there might be some ground for claiming them in behalf of Congress, had the bill stopped with the clause which I have quoted.

But, unfortunately for the enemies of Kansas, the bill does not stop here. It goes on to confer the most ample powers on the Territorial Legislature. In section twenty-two, after providing for the first election, it says:

"But thereafter the times, places, and manner of holding and conducting all elections by the people, shall be prescribed by law."

Again, after providing for qualifications of voters for the first election, it says:

"But the qualification of voters, and of holding office, at all subsequent elections, shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Territorial Legislature."

In section twenty-four, it is further enacted that the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the constitution.

These clauses, taken together, embrace the entire subject in dispute, and vest all powers connected therewith in the Territorial Legislature. What can be a more clear and rightful subject of legislation than to determine the time when a people shall emerge from their condition of territorial pupillage into that of State sovereignty, of calling a convention of the people, prescribing the qualification of voters, and arranging the usual details preparatory to the application for admission as a State. Indeed, sir, according to the well-settled maxims of civil law, no people can undertake to form or abolish a constitution, except in obedience to the summons or invitation of the existing legislative authority. It was in this view that Congress has delegated these high and important matters of legislative discretion to the territorial government. You may take up any enabling act passed by Congress, and you cannot find a provision in it which is not involved either in the specific grants or general delegation of powers contained in the Kansas bill.

The conclusion which the language of the bill authorizes is strengthened and sustained by its history. When this bill was first reported, it contained the usual power, which you find in all territorial bills, of congressional veto, revocation, or repeal of the territorial laws; but it was stricken out, and the bill became a law, with no reservation of power to Congress touching this point, limiting the broad grant of jurisdiction to the Territorial Legislature "over all rightful subjects of legislation." If the language of the bill and its history could leave any doubt as to the correctness of this construction, it would at once be removed by a recurrence to the debates when the bill was pending in Congress. The speeches of both friends and foes are replete with the proof of what I say. I could quote from the author of the bill, and from its supporters in this House, to show that their object was to transfer to the people of Kansas the entire control over her internal affairs, including slavery, untrammelled by any congressional legislation. But, sir, it is not necessary.

It may be said that, if this construction be true, the bill embraced two entirely distinct and dissimilar subjects: one organizing a Territory, and the other providing for the admission of a State. Well, sir, if I am not mistaken, this very objection was made, to wit: that the bill was against all regular parliamentary procedure. And a distinguished gentleman from Missouri, after exhausting his powers of invective, like a man in a fight, reserving his most potent weapon for the last blow, threw at the bill an immense word, which sent our venerable Secretary of State, stunned and reeling, to the dictionaries. He said it was "amphibological." But the framers of that bill were not after parliamentary symmetry or harmony of outline. Their object was to settle great questions of strife which threatened the integrity of the Union; to bind in one compact and durable structure, the equality of the States, the authority of Congress, and the glorious right of self-government; to build a platform on which the rights of every section in the Union might rise above the turbulent waters of sectional strife, and proudly defy all the attacks of fanaticism. In confirmation of the view I have taken, I desire to invoke the authority of the distinguished publicist and jurist who is now lending his influence to the enemies of the South and of Kansas. Mr. Robert J. Walker, in his inaugural address, as Governor of Kansas, speaking of the Lecompton convention, says:

"That convention is now about to be elected by you, under the call of the Territorial Legislature created, and still recognized by the authority of Congress, and clothed by it, in the comprehensive language of the organic law, with full power to make such an enactment. The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, were fully sustained by the act of Congress."

Again he says:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution, to participate, freely and fairly, in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage; but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of voting authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency; and the absentees are as much bound, under the law and Constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as though all had participated in the election."

It is true that the distinguished author of the bill denies that it confers any such power. And yet the very ground upon which he rests his opposition to the admission of Kansas seems to break the moral force of this denial. His position is, that the Kansas bill intended that the constitution, when adopted, should be submitted to a direct vote of the people; that this was its intent and meaning. Now, sir, if the bill went so far as to prescribe the mode of adopting the constitution, it certainly contemplated the framing of it. A constitution cannot be submitted to the people until it is formed.

Having demonstrated that this convention, assembled to form the constitution, possessed every attribute heretofore regarded requisite to complete the work effectually, it is easy to refute the objection that before it can present a valid title to this Congress, it should be first submitted, for adoption or rejection, to the people; not to the people whose delegates framed it, but to them and such settlers as may have come into the Territory during its progress to completion! In order to show how empty and ridiculous are the pretexts for rejecting Kansas, I propose to give this argument in the language of its author. Speaking of what the President says of the convention at Lecompton, the distinguished gentleman to whom I refer [Mr. DOUGLAS] says:

"The President does not say, he does not mean, that this convention had ever been recognized by the Congress of the United States as legal or valid. On the contrary, he knows, as we here know, that during the last Congress I reported a bill from the Committee on Territories to authorize the people of Kansas to assemble and form a constitution for themselves. Subsequently, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] brought forward a substitute for my bill, which, after having been modified by him and myself in consultation, was passed by the Senate. It is known in the country as the 'Toombs bill.' It authorized the people of Kansas Territory to assemble in convention and form a constitution, preparatory to their admission into the Union as a State. That bill, it is well known, was defeated in the House of Representatives. It matters not, for the purpose of this argument, what was the reason of its defeat. Whether the reason was a political one; whether it had reference to the then existing contest for the Presidency; whether it was to keep open the slavery question; whether it was the conviction that the bill would not be fairly carried out; whether it was because there was not people enough in Kansas to justify the formation of a State; no matter what the reason was, the House of Representatives refused to pass that bill, and thus denied to the people of Kansas the right to form a constitution and State government at this time."

Proceeding then to discuss the power of the Territorial Legislature to call a convention, he concludes as follows:

"If you apply these principles to the Kansas convention, you find that it had no power to do any act as a convention forming a government; you find that the act calling it was null and void from the beginning; you find the Legislature could confer no power whatever on the convention."

Upon a subsequent occasion, defending his position, he says, as follows:

"In other words, I contend that a convention constituted in obedience to an enabling act of Congress previously giving assent, is a constitutional body of men, with power and authority to institute government; but that a convention assembled under an act of the Territorial Legislature, without the assent of Congress previously given, has no authority to institute government."

"This was my position in regard to the effect of an enabling act. I then went on to show that, there having been no enabling act passed for Kansas, the Lecompton convention was irregular."

It is rather late in the day for this gentleman to begin to rectify such irregularities. We need go no further back than California. She was begotten by a military general, and forced into the family of States by the Cæsarean operation of an executive accoucheur. [Laughter.] Yes, sir, without any previous assent of Congress, without even the authority of a Territorial Legislature; without any census; a land of roaming adventurers was lugged into the Union over all law and precedent, as the coequal of the oldest State in this Union, because it happened to be a free State. What then said this stickler for enabling acts? How spoke the putative father of these latter-day doctrines? Mr. DOUGLAS said, in 1850:

"I come now to consider California as a State. The question is now presented, whether we will receive her as one of the States of this Union; and, sir, why should we not do it? The proceedings, it is said, in the formation of her constitution and State government, have been irregular. If this be so, whose fault is it? Not the people of California, for you have refused, for the period of two years, to pass a law in pursuance of which the proceedings would have been regular. Surely you will not punish the people of California for your own sins—sins of omission as well as of commission."

"It will be recollected by every Senator present—I trust the fact will not be forgotten—that more than one year ago I brought in a bill to authorize the people of California to form a State constitution, and to come into the Union. Had that bill passed, the proceedings would have been regular."

"Well, the bill was defeated, and the people of California, acting upon those suggestions, and relying upon the precedents cited, have formed a constitution and presented themselves for admission. Now they are to be told that they cannot be received, because Congress failed to pass a law, and the proceedings are irregular without it. I do not precisely understand what is meant by the irregularity of these proceedings. I have examined the precedents in all the cases in which new States have been admitted into the Union, from Vermont to Wisconsin. I will not go over them in detail," &c. "Those precedents show that there is no established rule upon the subject. There are several cases in which there have been no previous assent of Congress, no census taken, no qualifications for voters prescribed. There is no rule, and consequently can be no irregularity."

"I hold that the people of California had a right to what they have done—yes, they had a moral, political, and legal right to do all they have done."

How different is his language to Kansas! The very refusal of Congress to pass an enabling act for California is urged as a justification of her monstrous proceedings, and is presented as her strongest title to admission. But when Kansas applies, the same action by Congress is relied upon as an insurmountable obstacle to her admission. The California convention had the perfect right, moral, legal, and political, to do what they have done. But the Kansas convention, although acting under an act of Congress which pledged the faith of the nation to her admission as a State, acting under a regular and legal call of her people, every safeguard provided, is held to have no power to do any act as a convention forming a government, that the act calling it was null and void from the beginning, and that Congress, in refusing to pass an enabling act, (no matter what the motive,) denied to the people the right to form a constitution and State government.

Sir, how are we to reconcile such glaring inconsistency? There is but one solution, and every day is riveting it in the southern mind; and that is, where a State applies for admission with a constitution excluding slavery, no irregularity can be too enormous, no violation of precedent too marked, no disregard of constitutional procedure too palpable, no outrage can be too enormous for its admission as a State into the Union; but when a State applies for admission with slavery in its constitution, no excuse can be too trivial, no pretense too paltry and ignoble, to keep her out. Sir, the direct tendency, and with some the avowed object, of all this opposition, is to delay the admission of Kansas until she becomes a free State. I do not charge this on that gentleman. But why does he pursue this course? It is but an offshoot of that damnable policy which has been preying upon the vitals of the South for the last forty years—that of buying peace from the turbulent and fanatical at the expense of the quiet and orderly. When Missouri applies for admission, Abolitionism gets up an excitement about slave territory. For peace sake Congress overleaps the Constitution, and marks out a line beyond which slavery shall not go. Abolitionism raves to be heard in Congress about slavery generally, and for the sake of peace, Congress allows it to fill the Capitol with abolition petitions, which it has no power on earth to grant. Abolitionism hires armed bands to go and drive slaveholders out of Kansas, and Robert J. Walker, for peace sake, would hand it over to them. To pacify a band of rebels, reeking with the blood of southern men, women, and children, to whom he is indebted for all he is, he turns against his benefactors, he violates his pledge, abuses his trust, disgraces his office, truckles to the vile, tramples on the just, and scatters the firebrand of discord throughout Kansas, the Union, and the Capitol. And STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, who was for lassoing California and dragging her into the Union over all law and precedent, and the violated rights of fifteen of the sovereign States of this Union, would now subject Kansas to all the rigors of the Inquisition to keep her out of the Union.

But we are told that it is a contempt of the authority of the people of Kansas—that it is an inroad upon popular sovereignty to withhold from them a revision of their constitution. Sir, the authority of the people is fully recognized; popular sovereignty, as a principle, is fully enforced when an opportunity is afforded to the legal voters to deposit their votes for delegates to a convention. Sir, are not those delegates the people's agents? Is there a lawyer present who would teach his client that the acts of an authorized agent are invalid if not submitted for ratification to the principal? Would he tell them that such acts unsubmitted would be insulting to the principal's dignity, or intrusive upon his prerogatives? Would you say that no respect should be paid to the acts, or to the principal himself, if he suffered them to go forth as his own, unratified? The truth lies just in the opposite direction. "The right of electing delegates to a convention," in the language of the profoundest writer on the philosophy of government, "places the powers of the Government as fully in the mass of the community, as they would be had they assembled, made, and executed the laws themselves without the intervention of agents or representatives."

The people act in their sovereign capacity when they elect delegates; and the delegates thus elected, and convened, are, for all practical purposes, identical with the people. Sir, I take higher grounds. I hold that the highest embodiment of sovereignty, the most imposing political assemblage known to our Constitution and laws, is a convention of the people legally assembled, not en masse—for such an assemblage is unknown in our representative system—but by their delegates, legally elected. When such a body, with no declared limitation upon their powers, are deputed to form a constitution, and they execute their trust, the constitution, ipso facto, becomes the supreme law of the land, unquestionable and unchangeable by any power on earth, save that which ordained it. This is no novel doctrine. It has the sanction of the wisest and greatest men known to American history. Mr. Calhoun, speaking of a convention of the people, says it implied "a meeting of the people, either by themselves, or by delegates chosen for the purpose in their high sovereign character. It is, in a word, a meeting of the people in the majesty of their power—in that in which they may rightfully make or abolish constitutions, and put up and down government, at their pleasure."—(Calhoun's Works, volume 2, page 612.) Our present Chief Magistrate, in standing by the action of the Lecompton constitution, is only acting in accordance with his opinions, long since recorded. In the debate on the veto power, he said:

"The Senator [Mr. Clay] asks, why has not the veto been given to the President on acts of conventions held for the purpose of amending our constitutions? If it be necessary to restrain Congress, it is equally necessary to restrain conventions. The answer to this argument is equally easy. It would be absurd to grant an appeal through the intervention of the veto to the people themselves against their own acts. They create conventions by virtue of their own undelimited and inalienable sovereignty; and when they speak, their servants—whether legislative, judicial, or executive—must be silent."

Such was the convention of Lecompton, and the constitution it presents was established under laws, Federal and territorial, to which every man in Kansas (except rebels) has given his consent. These laws direct the election, prescribe the order of it, the qualification of voters, and the times of holding the meeting, and the duties and qualifications of the presiding officer. In this way the delegates were elected. They met, and upon mature deliberation framed a constitution—a constitution republican in form, and securing to the people of Kansas all those great institutions of freedom which have ever been regarded as the only and surest bulwarks of civil liberty. Violating no law, inconsistent with no principle of the Federal Constitution, it preserves and guaranties to the people of Kansas all the great agencies of freedom, the right of habeas corpus, trial by jury, freedom of the press and speech, and liberty of conscience, as inviolate and pure as when they were first given to us, baptized in the blood of our revolutionary fathers. Now, sir, can a greater insult be offered to the understanding of the American people than to say that a constitution thus established would gain anything of credit or sanctity by a ratification like that contended for? I grant that the people, through the Legislature, may reserve to themselves the right of ratification, or the delegates may recognize it in the constitution itself; and in either case a ratification would become necessary to the validity of the instrument; but without those terms it would become absolute as soon as sanctioned by the delegates.

I go further. I boldly maintain that wisdom, prudence, and policy demand that the delegates should be entirely untrammelled in framing the fundamental law. The people in mass cannot deliberate upon a constitution, adopt what is good, and amend what is faulty in it. They must adopt or reject it in the entire; and thus, on account of objections to a single clause, they might reject the most admirable constitution ever devised by the wisdom of man. The radical error which underlies the whole argument of these gentlemen is this: they assume that there is a general agreement of opinion, a collective sentiment of the people, as a unit, as to what shall be the principles and provisions of their fundamental law, and that this common sentiment is to be ascertained only by a direct vote of the people. And yet, sir, such a course might result in a grave and capital delusion. If a method could be devised for collecting the opinion of each citizen, upon each clause of a constitution, the diversities of sentiment would be equal to the number of voters, and, perhaps, greater. The theory of ratification, however, does not allow to the people the right of framing a constitution, or even offering amendments and modifications. They can only, like a witness on cross-examination, answer "yea" or "nay." And I repeat, a constitution which might stand an imperishable monument of human wisdom, could be voted down by an immense majority, of which each individual member might be in an actual minority on the particular subject-matter of his dissent. Such a process, so far from evoking the general pervading sentiment of a people as to what shall be their fundamental law, may signally fail in eliciting the true view of a single individual.

Sir, I admit that a direct vote of the people is a fair test of their will, when you submit to them a single isolated proposition, such as the question of excluding slavery, submitted by the Kansas convention. But whether it is the best mode or not, depends upon circumstances. It depends, for instance, upon the number voting on the question of ratification, as compared with the number who vote for delegates. Now, so far as I have observed, the elections in which the people manifest the least interest are those in which they are called upon to pass upon constitutions and constitutional questions. It is not the way the people choose to exercise their right of self-government. In the ancient city of Athens, where democratic absolutism existed in its purest form, the number of citizens entitled to vote amounted to about twenty-five thousand persons; and yet not more than five thousand were generally given on the most interesting questions. And on questions of ostracism, six thousand votes were sufficient. If you will consult the poll-books of the different States of this Union, where men and propositions claim the suffrages of the people at the same time, you will generally find that the men get three votes where the proposition gets one. I could call attention to numerous instances of this kind, which have fallen within my own observation.

We accordingly find that nearly all writers on governmental and social science, representing every class of opinion, (except a few run-mad red republicans of Germany and France,) unite in condemning this theory of direct appeal to the people. Montesquieu, in his "Spirit of Laws," speaking of democracy, says:

"The people, in whom reside the supreme power, ought to do of themselves whatever conveniently they can; and, what they themselves cannot rightfully perform, they must do by their ministers."

"The people are extremely well qualified for choosing those whom they are to entrust with a part of their authority."

"Should we doubt of the people's natural ability, in respect to the discernment of merit, we need only cast an eye on the continual series of surprising elections, made by the Athenians and Romans, which no one surely will attribute to hazard. But are they able to manage an intricate affair; to find out and make a proper use of places, occasions, moments? No; as most citizens have a capacity of choosing, though they are not sufficiently qualified to be chosen, so the people, though capable of calling others to an account for their administration, are incapable of the administration themselves."

A distinguished Senator has laid down the proposition that, under the power to admit new States, Congress is forced, by a paramount duty, to see that the constitution of a State asking admission into the Union imbeds the will of the majority of the people. Sir, I hold that a constitution presented by the regular and legally constituted authority, is conclusive upon Congress as to the will of the people. We will not allow any such issue to be presented. We assert the right of the people to form their government; but we hold, and I think I have already shown, that the highest and purest exhibition of their sovereign will, is a people acting by their own chosen delegates in convention assembled. The Federal Government, and half of the States of this Union, were formed in this way, and they need no improvement from the constitutional tinkering of this day.

To object that the convention may have abused its powers, and that the constitution should be submitted to a direct popular vote, in order that it may be ascertained whether it accords with the will of the people, is to beg the question, and to strike at the very root of all constitutional and legal authority. It is an objection not to the constitution of Kansas alone, but to the very genius and framework of all representative government. Upon the same ground that a constitution framed by delegates should be submitted to the people, it may also be demonstrated that every law enacted by Congress, or by a Legislature, and that every verdict by a jury, or decision of a court, should likewise be submitted for the approval of the people. Sir, a delegate may misrepresent the people; a Senator or Representative may misrepresent his constituents; but the remedy does not lie here in this central power of the Republic, (more liable to abuse than any other;) it lies in the hands of the local constituency, to whom the representatives are immediately responsible. And here lies the efficacy and power of our form of Government. The direct responsibility of our rulers to their constituents, the right of suffrage among the people, aided by that great moral engine of freedom, the liberty of the press, are the vis medicatrix nature of our political system, sufficient to remedy every disorder and throw off every impurity, without resorting to violent irregularity and revolutionary action.

When a State applies for admission, Congress is bound to subject her to no restrictions except such as Congress may constitutionally impose upon the States already composing the Union. There is but one limitation which you are bound to impose, and that is, that her form of government should be republican. But, under the power to guaranty a republican form of government, you have not the right to range with unlimited discretion through every provision of her constitution, interfere with her internal and local distribution of political power, adjust questions of majority and minority, lay down arbitrary rules of your own as to what constitutes republican government, and, by compelling her to conform to them, to substitute the will of Congress for hers as to what shall be her fundamental law. Are not the constitutions of the original thirteen States pretty fair tests as to what constitutes republican government? Can any one say that the Kansas constitution, tried by this test, the only one which you can rightfully apply, is not a republican form of government? Where is the feature in it contrary to our republican institutions, or repugnant to the paramount Constitution of the Union?

We are told by a distinguished gentleman that he would "pass over forms, ceremonies, and organizations, to get down deep to the will of the people." Sir, the will of the people can only be obtained through these forms, ceremonies, and organizations; and the structure of our Government is intended to provide these forms and organizations, through which the people can speak authentically and authoritatively. What can he mean by passing over and disregarding these forms? The Constitution of the United States is a form. Times, places, and manner of holding elections, and qualifications of franchise, are but forms, through which the people exercise their power. This matchless Government, springing from the Constitution and the division of power between the Federal and State Governments, is but an organization. Would he pass over all these to get down to what he sees proper to consider the will of the people? The doctrine is monstrous, dangerous, and disorganizing. It gives to the action of the regular government no more authority than belongs to an ordinary, voluntary assemblage of citizens, outside of the Constitution and law. If these views be correct, we had better, at once, tear down this splendid fabric of American architecture, and discard conventions, legislatures, and Congress, as inconvenient, cumbrous superfluities, and resort at once to the democratic absolutism of Athens. The doctrine has been in Europe omnipotent for pulling down forms, ceremonies, and organizations, but powerless for reconstruction; like those serpents in the East, which, while they inflict a death-blow, breathe out their own life in the wound of their dying victim.

We were told by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] that the constitution is not republican in form, because it prohibits amendment, alteration, or change, until after 1864, and then hampers the perfectly free action of the people by requiring a majority of two thirds of the Legislature to concur before they will allow the majority to call for amendment. But the climax of anti-republicanism is the provision that "no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves;" a doctrine that would tumble into irretrievable ruin the Federal Constitution, and the constitutions of half the States in the Union, including that of the gentleman's own State; for there is not one of these which does not contain as stringent and dilatory limitations as are found in this Kansas constitution. The argument by which he supports this view is, that the "Democracy, as taught in Ohio, believes in the repeatability of everything by the popular voice." Do the Democracy of Ohio consider the clauses of the Constitution securing all those great rights—such as freedom of speech, freedom of the press, liberty of conscience, inviolability of property—repealable by the popular will? Do the Democracy of Ohio believe in the repeatability of that clause guaranteeing the right of a State to equality of representation in the Senate of the United States? This may be Democracy in Ohio; but I hope it is a Democracy confined to Ohio alone. It may be republicanism, but it is not the constitutional republicanism of America; it is the red republicanism of France. The very tenure by which the gentleman exercises the privilege of uttering these objections against the Kansas constitution, is an oath to support a Constitution liable to them all; a Constitution imposing the heaviest restrictions on the power of amendment; a Constitution whose framers intended it, not as an instrument of power, but as an instrument of protection against power.

It would be well for these gentlemen to consider when, and by whom, this particular mode of adopting a constitution, which they insist is the only true mode, was first established. It was not by the fathers of this Republic—the men of 1776. The Federal Constitution was not submitted for adoption to a direct vote of the people, nor were the constitutions of the Old Thirteen. The first instance in modern times, so far as my researches go, was the constitution of 1799, which was submitted to the people of France, and accepted by a vote of three million to fifteen hundred. This was in accordance with the teachings of Rousseau—the doctrine of unlimited, indivisible, undelerated power of the people—a doctrine almost identical in terms to that upon which the opposition to the admission of Kansas rests. What was the result? The sovereignty of the people was established and recognized, the King was beheaded, the nobility were banished, the religion abolished, property confiscated, and France converted into one moral and political volcano, from the conflict of whose discordant elements arose the demon of centralization and military despotism, the rod of whose power smote down all the valuable rights of the people, and the cherished interests of humanity. It was during the progress of this fanatical and bloody drama, that one of its most conspicuous and sanguinary actors, appalled by the magnitude of the power which he had invoked, exclaimed, "Do you not see the project of appeal to the people tends but to destroy the representative body? It is sporting with the sovereign majesty of the people to return to it a work which it charges you to terminate promptly."

The new constitution submitted to the people was the consular constitution of 1802—only three years later—making Napoleon Bonaparte Consul for life, and conferring on him the power of naming his successor and the Senate; in other words, a despotism. It was submitted to the vote of the people of France, and accepted by three million five hundred and sixty-eight thousand eight hundred and eighty-five against eight thousand three hundred and seventy-four. And from that time the unlimited sovereignty of the people has been the potent instrument by which the Napoleons have fastened upon France a despotism more grinding and debasing than that of the Autocrat of Russia. The fathers of our Republic proceeded on principles totally opposite. Adopting as a fundamental dogma that all political power springs from the people, they insisted, and incorporated it into their organic law, that this power should not be unlimited and absolute. They accordingly established our grand system of representative government, with its checks, balances, guarantees, and organic laws—the noblest political institution that adorns the pages of the history of civilization, and which experience has shown to be the only means of securing and diffusing among the people that broad, civil liberty which constitutes the distinguishing features of the American and British Governments. I say British Government; for the statesmen of 1776 founded our institutions, not upon Utopian theories, but upon those great fundamental principles of the common law inherited from our Saxon ancestors, which guaranteed to English freemen the right of personal security, personal liberty, and private property, with their judicial safeguards and protecting forms, as inviolable and irrepealable by any power on earth.

The convention in Kansas, having declared in their fundamental law that the right of property in slaves, already existing, shall not be interfered with, has only given a constitutional sanction to a principle as old as the foundations of free government. And, sir, Congress is bound by the most solemn obligation that honor can impose, to admit her with this very clause in her constitution. Sir, we of the South demand the redemption of your pledge. The issue is boldly tendered, and we are ready to go before the great Areopagus of the American people upon it. And when the enemies of Kansas shall attempt to justify their opposition to her by invoking a principle which has deluged Europe in blood, only to sink her into more degraded despotism, we will justify her admission upon the principles which lie at the foundation of our Republic. We will call upon the people to stand true to the traditions of our ancestors and the practice of the Government when Washington was President, and the men of the Revolution ministered at the altars of liberty.

One word on the bill introduced into this House by a member from Massachusetts, [Mr. Banks,] calling another convention in Kansas for the purpose of framing a second constitution to be submitted to the people for acceptance or rejection. Mr. Chairman, Congress has no more right to call a convention of the people of Kansas than it has to call such a convention in New York. By the act of Congress, and the action of her people, the entire relation of Kansas to this Government has been changed. It is no longer a Territory of these United States. She has, by your own authority and permission, thrown off the habiliments of territorial dependence, and stands now a State, clothed with all the attributes and powers of a State, and asks admission as an equal in this noble confederation of sovereignties. You may reject her application, if you will; but it will be at your own peril. To remand her to her territorial condition you cannot, any more than you can roll back to their hidden sources the waters of the Mississippi. Kansas is a separate, organized, living State, with all the nerves and arteries of life in full development and vigorous activity. Between your laws and her people she can interpose the broad and radiant shield of State sovereignty, and may laugh to scorn your enabling acts:

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

SPEECH OF HON. JEFF'N DAVIS, OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE SENATE, February 10 and 11, 1858.

[REVISED BY HIMSELF.*]

The Senate having under consideration the bill to increase the military establishment of the United States, and the pending question being on the motion of Mr. TOOMBS to strike out the first section, in the following words:

"That there shall be added to each of the regiments of dragoons, cavalry, infantry, and of mounted riflemen, two companies, to be organized in the same manner as the companies now composing these arms respectively, and to receive the same pay and allowances, and to be entitled to the same provisions and benefits in every respect, as are authorized by the existing laws; they shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and the enlisted men are to be recruited in the same manner as other troops, with the same conditions and limitations."

Mr. DAVIS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The proposition before the Senate is to strike out that section of the bill which provides for adding two companies to certain regiments of the Army, being those regiments which now have but ten companies. I hope the Senate will decide to retain that section, for reasons which I will offer at this time.

I think the organization, as I stated on a former occasion, will be more complete, because it will give regiments divisible into three battalions of four companies each. It will give the power to divide regiments without dividing battalions so as to garrison three posts by each regiment, or, if you please, six posts, without reducing any post to a single company. I will here say to Senators as a military question, that it is a very great disadvantage to troops to separate them into garrisons consisting of a single company, and that that disadvantage is not to be overcome by multiplying the rank and file. You must have the number of officers to perform the duties that devolve on commissioned officers, and cannot advantageously be intrusted to anybody else. To maintain discipline and to perform the duty in a responsible manner, you require at least the number of officers that will be afforded by two companies. You cannot, therefore, without injury to the public service, rely on one company to constitute a garrison instead of two, though the rank and file may have been doubled.

That is one reason. Another is, that by increasing the number of companies, you give that advantage which the Senator from Texas [Mr. Houstons] has illustrated in stating his opinion of the present defect in the Army—the want of an opportunity of promotion and inducement to the rank and file. These additional companies not only increase the number of non-commissioned, but also the number of commissioned officers. They give an increased opportunity to worthy men, who enter the ranks of the Army by enlistment, to rise to the grade of commissioned officers. They give additional nucleus on which, in time of war, you can aggregate the raw material of recruits, and increase the power of the standing Army of the United States.

Here I would say to the Senator from Texas, that he was egregiously mistaken in his argument that a law had grown up by usage, which, for the benefit of the graduates of the Military Academy, now excludes the rank and file from promotion in the Army. He said it is not as it was in the war of 1812. I wish to correct that error; for, in the wisdom of Congress upon the recommendation of the last Administration, the two Houses of the last Congress, adopted a provision, for the first time in this Government, which made it quite easy for the Executive to provide for the certain promotion of a non-commissioned officer who proved himself worthy. For the first time, I say, since the organization of our Army, the last Congress did provide for conferring brevets on non-commissioned officers, and thus made them certain of promotion, though the graduates of the Military Academy should be equal to all the vacancies which should occur within the ensuing year. The Senator, therefore, was mistaken in assuming that the door to promotion had been closed against the rank and file of the Army.

Another Senator (the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] I think it was) asserted that, for a great number of years, no such promotions had occurred. There the mistake was equally great; such promotions have been made from time to time.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator is mistaken; I expressed no opinion on that point.

Mr. DAVIS. It was not, then, the Senator from Georgia, but somebody else; but as I am making points, not on individuals, but on the merits of the question, it makes no difference who it was. Whoever it was, it is erroneous. Promotions of that kind have been made by nominations to the Senate, and confirmations by the Senate. Those who had been sergeants were also appointed to the grade of commissioned officers in the new regiments that were provided for three years ago; where no vacancies exist for an appointment, the recent law authorizes promotion by brevet; and never before, in the history of the Army, has the rank and file had so wide and open a door, during peace, to enter into the grade of commissioned officers as now. Nor is this opportunity for promotion rendered illusory and impracticable of attainment for the want of that high degree of education which the standard of West Point requires of its graduates. A military examination is required, and is necessary to prevent the attainment of such promotion by favoritism only; but that examination requires only the elements of a common school education; no more than is necessary for the proper discharge of a subaltern's duties. This proposition to increase the number of companies is but widening that door which admits the rank and file to rise to the grade of commissioned officers. It increases the number of commissioned officers who will serve in detached posts, thus relieving them from the danger and the toil of a responsibility which they cannot properly meet if reduced to the small number of two or three, to perform, not only their regular duties, but all the staff duties of a garrison.

I hope, therefore, that the Senate, if they think that the addition of the thirty companies and the increase of the maximum of the strength of each company to ninety-six will give more troops than are required, will prefer rather to keep down the maximum, as it is now, to seventy-four, and give the additional companies. I believe it will create a more effective force than is to be obtained by increasing the maximum of the rank and file of the Army—a measure which will have really but little effect, on account of the power of the War Department to send out unattached recruits, and thus bring them to the distant posts at a time when the company has been wasted below the maximum of seventy-four.

If, then, the purpose of the Senate be to limit the size of the Army to any certain standard, it is suggested to them that they shall, in consideration of the great interest which is involved, strike from the bill the second section, taking the numerical strength away which that would confer, and leave the first section, which perfects our system and enables us to occupy the great number of posts we now have with our small Army, without reducing the number of commissioned officers at each post below that which will enable them efficiently to perform every duty.

On account of the statements which have been made in relation to the strength of the Army, so greatly exaggerated beyond the reality, I have thought it necessary to make an exact statement of what the Army is. It is now composed, including all arms of the service which go into the field, (not including engineer soldiers or ordnance soldiers,) of one hundred and ninety-eight companies, which, according to the fixed establishment of the Army, to be found in a table in the Army Register of this year, at page 41, gives a number of privates equal to nine thousand and sixty-six, supposing every company to be full up to the organization of the peace establishment; adding non-commissioned officers and musicians, you get the total of enlisted men eleven thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight. In 1850, on account of the necessity of troops on the frontier, Congress provided that at distant stations, and on the emigrant routes, the President should have authority to increase the privates in any company so employed to seventy-four; and this is the number which is taken from the Secretary of War's report. It is not the peace establishment; it is not the fixed establishment of the Army; but it is the increase authorized by Congress to be made in certain contingencies. The Army being now stationed almost entirely on the frontier, an authorized and actual strength is casually obtained as set forth in the report of the Secretary of War. If every company in the Army was on frontier duty, or in campaign, there would be a still higher possible number. It might in that contingency go up to about nineteen thousand.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. I have an authentic statement from the Adjutant General's office, showing the present numerical distribution of the Army by military departments. The department of the east, including forts and fortresses, has eight hundred and sixty-nine men; the department of Florida, three hundred and thirty-seven; Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Arkansas, three thousand six hundred and seventy-six; the department of Texas, two thousand and forty-nine; New Mexico, two thousand two hundred and forty; the department of the Pacific, two thousand five hundred and seventeen; the army of Utah, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven; making the total of the Army of the United States at present only thirteen thousand five hundred and seventy-five. That is the whole Army at present.

Mr. DAVIS. That is in consequence of the wasting which occurred after the month of June, when the actual force was stated in the report of the Secretary of War, which has been so often read to the Senate. The actual number is a fluctuating number; and the only thing upon which any calculation can be made in relation to the broader question of the policy of the Government, is the fixed or legal establishment—not how many men may happen to be in the service to-day, or may be to-morrow, fluctuating under the sliding scale established by the act of 1850, but what it is proper to have for a permanent peace establishment. That should be determined by principles of statesmanship much broader than the mere question of how many men are necessary to chase down some Indian tribe. The policy of our military establishment was framed by men who stood upon a higher pedestal, and looked over a wider sphere. It was to carry out the policy proclaimed by Washington, "in peace prepare for war." It was enabling our Government to move step by step, and keep easy progress in military science with foreign nations with whom we might be involved in war.

A certain portion of the Army was from the beginning employed in the defense of our frontier settlements, then an easy task. As that task increased in difficulty, the Army was increased, and past attempts at reduction have proved unfortunate. It has been very well established that the war with the Sacs and Foxes, commonly known as the Black Hawk war, which extended over two campaigns, resulted from the fact that we had not a sufficient number of troops in a position to prevent the first acts of aggression. It has equally well been established in regard to that long and vastly expensive war in Florida, where, per capita, more money has been disbursed than one would deem it possible could have been fairly expended on a worthless Indian tribe; that if one, or at most two regiments had been in position when the first movement commenced, those expensive wars of 1838 and 1842 might have been avoided.

But, as already stated, our predecessors had a broader policy than merely protecting the frontier settlers. They had the policy of keeping our Army instructed in all that belongs to civilized war; training artillery, and other arms of service in that science of war which is not to be learned merely by campaign duty.

The necessities for frontier service, outstripping the augmentations of the Army which have been made, have caused its whole disposable force to be thrown to the interior of our territory, and scarcely any are left to hold the great fortifications along the sea-board, and there to learn those lessons in artillery practice that would be so essential to us in war. We have no dragoons or cavalry in schools of instruction or practice. They are kept constantly on the frontier; and only so much as may be learned in winter cantonments, in long marches, and after hot pursuits of Indians in occasional encampments with jaded horses, can be taught the cavalry arm of the United States. It is not the increase of the Army, but the refusal to keep up those garrisons where military instruction may be perfected, which is the great departure from the policy of our fathers.

According to the report of the Secretary of War, we now have one hundred and thirty-eight posts. According, also, to his report, we have an exterior boundary of eleven thousand miles; and of emigrant routes requiring military supervision by the military force, we have six thousand seven hundred miles; giving a total of seventeen thousand seven hundred miles. From this aggregate is excluded the whole amount of our Indian frontier, being two lines, extending from our northern to our southern boundary, and the whole amount of the reservations where, by the reports to the Secretary of the Interior, from his agents in different parts of the country, it is made apparent that the fulfillment of our obligations to the Indian tribes require the establishment of new posts. This may be taken as quite equal to the amount stated in the report of the Secretary of War; and then we have seventeen thousand seven hundred miles stated, which may be considered as about half the demand; and for which we may possibly have, by posting them as stated, an army of seventeen thousand five hundred men, or less than one man to the mile; or if you include the Indian frontier and the Indian reservations, less than one man to two miles. That is the Army the augmentation of which is considered so great as to become dangerous to the peace and liberty of the country! Taking the posts at merely the number we now have, one hundred and thirty-eight, the companies of the Army being one hundred and ninety-eight, it follows that you have not companies enough in the Army to establish two companies at each post; and less than two never should be the garrison of any post. It destroys discipline; it impairs responsibility; it greatly depreciates the efficiency, and I might say respectability, of the troops, to segregate them into such small detachments, and leave them, like mere policemen, to a round of fatigue duties which wear out all military ardor.

The main argument in opposition to an increase of the Army, as I understand it, has been that there has been no showing of the necessity. I have, therefore, referred to what is to be drawn from the report of the Secretary of War, and the report of the Secretary of the Interior; and without wearying the Senate to read from it extensively, will merely refer to a single passage at page 62 of the report of the Secretary of the Interior, where he reports the number of Indians three hundred and twenty-five thousand, of whom three fourths belong to the hostile and roving bands. Two hundred and forty-three thousand five hundred of our Indians belong to bands of that roving and hostile character which requires the interposition of military supervision. Where Indians of friendly temper have been drawn into reservations, I have, in looking hastily through this volume, found, in a great majority of cases, that the report of the sub-agent superintending the reservation says there is a necessity for the establishment of a military post to perfect the plan of the Government for bringing these Indians to an agricultural condition, and to give them that protection which is essential for their future progress. This is all in addition to what is contained in the report of the Secretary of War. These reports, too, are further sustained by the report of the Commanding General and of the Adjutant General, and in each of them it is shown, as I think, very conclusively, that the necessity exists for a force greater than we now have, and that economy is best to be promoted by increasing the regular army of the United States.

Thus it is that in urging this measure I do not make it rest on the necessities of the expedition against Utah, nor the necessity of keeping troops in Kansas. I did not say, as sometimes represented, that no troops were necessary for Utah, or for Kansas. I assumed no such position, nor proposed an increase of troops for that purpose; because I believe if those difficulties were ended to-day the troops would be necessary; and that now they can be used in one or both of these places, only by withdrawing them from other purposes for which troops are required. I have not said that there is no necessity for the use of troops in either of those Territories, and decline now to enter into the question as to whether the campaign should have been commenced against the Mormons or not.

I hope the anticipations of the President, that in a contingency which he expects soon to occur, troops will no longer be required in Kansas, may be realized; but, at the same time, it is due to candor to say that I do not entertain the hopes which the President expresses, having yet seen no evidence that the reign of terror in Kansas is to terminate in any contingency now foreseen. It seems more probable that the lawless are to continue their aggressions; that men are to be intimidated for political ends, their houses to be burned, and assassinations to occur all over the Territory, the moment the strong arm of the Federal Government is taken away. I cannot go to the extent of the Senator from Georgia, and refuse to give a man to preserve peace. I cannot go to the extent which would declare that I prefer that civil war should rage in the land, rather than to increase the Army and maintain order by the presence of troops in the Territories of the United States. In the first place, I should be willing to use troops anywhere to put down civil war and insurrection within the United States, when a contingency, such as is contemplated by the law, arises.

In the next place, I do not hold that the Territories occupy the same position as States. I do not admit, as I have never subscribed to the doctrine of squatter sovereignty, that the Government of the United States has no more power in a Territory than in a State. I hold that the Territories are dependencies of the Federal Union; they are in a condition of pupillage, to be governed by the States; the property of the States; and that if men, either foreign or native, should aggregate themselves upon a Territory of the United States, and raise the standard of rebellion against the Government, and in defiance of its laws, it is not only within the power, but it is the plain, palpable duty of the Government to put down such an insurrection, and to compel obedience.

I am at a loss to understand how any one entertaining the doctrine that this Government has power to acquire territory, can at the same time deny that it has power to control it. If we may acquire a Territory with a population not comprehending our institutions, having no attachment to them, can we admit at the same time that we have no more right to use coercive measures within the limits of that Territory than in one of the equal States of the Union? It would be the Dead Sea fruit ashes on the lips of those who gathered it. The population might at once erect a government anti-republican, destructive of all the great principles that lie at the foundation of our Constitution. If we may acquire an island, or a Territory, or a subjugated State, the whole population of which were in a State of barbarism, or from education attached to monarchical government, will it be contended, after we had expended thousands of lives and millions of treasure, that the population should be allowed to do what they please within their own limits, and the Government that has acquired the Territory by conquest or by purchase have no authority to exercise control, and preserve civil order among them?

Increase of the Army—Mr. Davis.

SENATE.

The use of troops in a Territory of the United States does not stand in the same relation to constitutional questions as the use of troops in a State of the Union. I deny, as emphatically as any one, the power of this Government to coerce a State. That is a question which was discussed in the convention that formed the Constitution, and which was so powerfully stated by Mr. Hamilton to be a proposition, not to form a Union and preserve the States, but to provide the means for the destruction of the States. A State may, through its Legislature or its Governor, invoke the aid of the Federal Government, and of the other States; but the Federal Government has no power to invade the limits of a State, there to attempt the coercion of its people.

With this broad distinction I think the whole argument falls, except in the minds of those who still insist that the inhabitants of a Territory have all the political rights of the people of a State. I belong not to that school.

As a natural consequence of denying the right to use the troops as heretofore, it is said that in a period of profound peace, and of financial embarrassment, the startling proposition is made to increase the military establishment of the United States! Peace, it is true, exists between our country and all foreign countries, and I hope long may continue; but, in the mean time, we are engaged in frequent hostilities with Indian tribes. All around that vast territory which lies between the Pacific settlements and those of the Mississippi valley, is a constant succession of conflicts with roving bands. If this is our condition in profound peace, when but eight hundred and sixty-nine men, officers and enlisted soldiers, can be left to garrison all the great fortifications on our seaboard, what, I pray, would it be in war? That proportion was left during the war with Mexico; and is altogether inadequate for the purposes for which those fortifications were built. It is not a state of peace so far as the Army is concerned.

The financial embarrassments of the country, the diminution of revenue because of a failure of the usual supply from duties on imports, constitutes no sufficient reason for not discharging any of the duties that belong to this Government. I wish your great army of retainers and your numerous palaces for customs purposes were all disbanded, all evacuated, and that we would go back to that simple process of collecting money from the people themselves. Then would the people look to the mode in which it was expended.

Proceeding to answer the objections in their order, the next was, that the Indians, by removal to the west of the Mississippi, had had their strength broken; that they had no power to resist us; and the next, in connection with it, was, that by the improvement of communication twenty-five thousand men had been made equal to what one hundred thousand were twenty-five years ago. Is it true that the concentration of the Indians on the west side of the Mississippi has diminished their strength? Is not the reverse true? When they were separate tribes, living surrounded by an active, intelligent population, driven themselves, by the small amount of territory they inhabited, to agricultural pursuits, when they lived in towns and villages where they could always be found, when they were dependent on their crops, the destruction of which must always bring them immediately to submission, it was an easy matter to control them, compared with the condition in which they now exist. On a wide extent of territory, brought into contiguity with each other, no longer surrounded by white population, driven to the chase for subsistence, returning every year more and more to their roving and original habits, these people have not only been made stronger, but they have been made more disposed to hostility than they were in their former position.

Again, by the acquisition of territory, and the extension of our settlements into territory long since acquired, we have been brought into contact with those tribes which, heretofore unacquainted with the white men, must go through the same process which had rendered the eastern Indians, before their removal, harmless in their contiguity to the whites. Not only this, but our population has poured over the mountains, and commenced extending from the Pacific as a front; our people have pressed the Indians back from the fertile valleys they inhabited, and from the soft climate where they were reared in proximity to the coast, and have driven them into the mountains—into a country so arid that a large portion of it can only be cultivated by irrigation. They have thus again reduced them to the chase for subsistence, and those Indians may well look on the valleys, and, like the Gaels in the Highlands, claim the right to redeem from the plain and the valley the means of subsistence as long as one sheaf of grain shall stand, or herd shall stray along the heritage from which they have been driven. These forays have been and are to be perpetrated, until a new state of things shall be brought into existence. During that period of transition, when the Indians may be gathered from these vast hunting grounds on reservations which they will and can cultivate, it will be necessary to preserve a military force sufficiently large to rule them by coercion; and this is the opinion of every intelligent sub-agent whose opinions I find recorded in the volume which contains the report of the Secretary of the Interior.

These are facts on which the Senate might reach the conclusion that the recommendations of the President and the Secretary of War have not been made without some due consideration. These volumes have been but recently printed, and laid on the tables of Senators. I trusted that as they progressed in the examination of them, many of those objections and doubts which were expressed two or three days ago would vanish. I believe the increase which is proposed by the committee to be the least which the present exigencies of the country will permit. If the Senate had indicated a purpose to adopt the recommendation of the Secretary of War, the committee were ready at any time to withdraw their bill and allow the Senate to pass the other; but on the vote it was made apparent that that was impossible; it was not within the view of the Senate, getting but eight votes, and some of them hostile to any increase of the military force, and therefore given for parliamentary advantage.

I know that the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Houston,] whose familiarity with Indian character I do not doubt, has proposed to us a remedy which every man's heart would respond to as much more desirable, if it were attainable. He proposes an Indian policy which is to substitute kindness, justice, and generosity; from which one might suppose that the Government had pursued a different policy; but his remarks put it out of the question that he meant the Government had pursued any other policy than this, except through the regular Army. Now, sir, I believe that the argument of the Senator from Texas is somewhat answered by the argument of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs.] The Senator from Georgia says that the regular Army is entirely harmless as against Indians; so that if the Senator from Texas thinks they are dangerous, I must refer him to his friend from Georgia, who assures him that the Army is quite harmless in relation to the Indians.

He proposes to appeal to the high motives and the generous character of the Indians to remove the necessity for any military force. The efficacy of the theory is answered by those who speak from observation. In the first place, Indian agents do not seem to entertain that idea. In the next place, the officers of the Army, who are the frontier men, and know more of the Indians than anybody else, dissent; and much as the Senator himself has seen of Indian tribes, I should say he had not seen as many weeks of Indian service as every field officer of the frontier regiments of the Army has seen years. I do not think, therefore, his opinion is to outweigh, when put in opposition to that of the sub-agents of Indian affairs, and that of military officers who have served on the Indian frontier the greater part of their lives.

I have no confidence in the high principles that are ascribed to the Indians. They have a certain sort of morality—a certain sort of religion, if you may so call it; they are in some things good. Take them as a mass, they are as deceptive, as bloodthirsty, as treacherous, as cowardly a race of men as are to be found on the globe. If our frontier inhabitants have sometimes committed aggressions on them, where is the frontier settlement that does not record the most cold-blooded and cowardly murders of women and children? Where is the frontier settlement that does not bring with its traditions, tales of torture at the stake of prisoners when powerless in the hands of a hostile savage band? Are these the high principles to which the Senator appeals? Are these the noble qualities that are to make the Indian an exception, and lift him at once out of barbarism to shine as an example of those qualities which man is to possess when the millennium shall come? In the mean time I rely, as everybody connected with the Indians, as every frontier inhabitant whose wife and children are exposed to be tomahawked by these Indians, relies, on force of some kind as the only means for giving that protection which the Government owes to its people.

Thus we proceed to inquire what the character of the force should be; and, in this connection, the regular troops of the Army have been pronounced as ineffective. It is said they do not kill the Indians; but that the volunteers become excited, and do kill them. The Senator from Texas says, that if regular troops ever did pursue the Indians, they might become excited and possibly do the same thing. I am not to be put in the attitude of depreciating the volunteer force of the country; nor shall I engage in recrimination against the volunteers. My relation to the volunteers and the regular troops is the same. At one time or other, in the course of my life, they have both been my companions. My remembrance of both brings to mind many associations, the dearest of my life. I have seen all that adorns the American soldier in the ranks of both regulars and volunteers. Why should this unfriendly comparison be made between these forces? Shoulder to shoulder they stand upon the battle-field; together they bleed, even exchanging men from one kind of force to the other, when it is necessary. There, when the flag of their country required them to do their utmost in the presence of a hostile foe, these jealousies and depreciations of one by the other did not arise. They were left for the debate in the Senate, and for a time of piping peace, and for places remote from the battle-field where they fought for a common cause, inspired by common sacrifices, for a common country.

But the Senator from Texas says, surely with entire sincerity, that he has not heard of any pursuit of Indians by regular troops; that all that has been done, has been by volunteers. Well, sir, in the volume which has been laid upon his desk, the report of the Secretary of War, he will find some cases cited—not all, but some which have been cited because of their prominence. They have been cited to show that the Army as it now exists is not on a peace establishment; to show the constant active service on which it is engaged. Not only is it to be found in this volume, but it has been circulated over the country in general orders from the head-quarters of the Army as long ago as November 13th last. Not only that, but some of the brilliant acts of service, therein recited, occurred within the limits of the Senator's own State. Let me read some of these instances from the general order to which I have referred:

"1. On the 17th of February, 1856, Captain James Oakes, with a part of his company C, second cavalry, from Fort Mason, Texas, after a pursuit of six days, and on the ninth day from his post, overtook a party of seven or more Indians, killed one and wounded several others; capturing all their animals and other property; sergeant Reis and private Kuhn, severely wounded. The troops were exposed to very cold and wet weather, and for more than seven days subsisted on two days' allowance of bread and coffee, such game as they could kill, and the flesh of horses they were obliged to abandon."

That sounds to me something like pursuit; and it was a pursuit of a party that invaded the Senator's own State. Again, the seventh case recited in this order is:

"VII. On the 13th of April, 1856, a party of fifty-five Indians were overtaken on the head waters of the Nueces, by detachments from companies B and D, mounted riflemen, and F, first artillery, from forts McIntosh and Duncan, Texas, under the command, respectively, of Captain Thomas Claiborne, junior, and Brevet Captain George Granger, mounted riflemen, and Second Lieutenant George H. Elliot, first artillery. One Indian killed and four made prisoners, their camp and all their animals captured.

"The vigilance of the Indians, and the character of the country, which enabled them to discover pursuit at a great distance, prevented a more complete success. In this case, from the time of leaving their posts until the termination of the pursuit, the troops marched three hundred and fifty miles in eight days. They suffered from want of water; and for four days, two in the pursuit and two after its termination; had no provisions but a small allowance of rice and coffee, accidentally obtained in crossing the El Paso road.

"The mayor of Laredo, Señor Don Santos Benevidas, Mr. Edward Jordan, and some twenty-five other citizens of that place, participated in this pursuit, and are represented as having rendered valuable service."

Again:

"XII. September, 1856. A detachment of troops from Fort Clark, Texas, commanded by Captain James Oakes, second cavalry, and composed of Captain Charles C. Gilbert and eighteen men of company B, first infantry; Second Lieutenant Henry W. Closson and twelve men of company I, first artillery; and Second Lieutenant James B. Wetherill and thirty men of company C, second cavalry, penetrated the country between Fort Clark and the mouth of the Pecos, western Texas, hitherto not visited by troops, and considered very difficult of access. The expedition was conducted with so much judgment and energy that, in the operations of a day, three parties of Indians were surprised between the Rio Grande and Pecos, near their junction. Four of the Indians killed and four wounded. Their animals and other property taken or destroyed."

The Senator from Texas knows Indians well enough to know the difficulty of surprising an Indian camp. He understands that men, ignorant of the frontier and its service, as he described the Army to be, would never surprise an Indian camp, and yet here is a gallant soldier who three times surprised Indians in one day. Then again:

"XIV. November 30th, 1856. A detachment composed of men of company G, first dragoons, and company C, mounted riflemen, in all twenty, commanded by Second Lieutenant Horace Randal, first dragoons, followed a party of fifty warriors of the Gila Apaches, and after a chase of three hundred and, in one day, of eighty, miles—going over mountains and plains of snow, the trail frequently obliterated, without water for three days and nights—overtook the enemy and attacked and drove them from the position of their own selection, recovering all the captured animals."

That sounds something like pursuit—a pursuit in which fortitude, skill, and all the knowledge that could enter into such service, were exemplified in the highest degree, and that too by one of those very young men against whom so many of the Senator's remarks this morning were directed. Again:

"XIX. April 4th, 1857. First Lieutenant Walter H. Jenifer, second cavalry, with thirteen men of Company B, of that regiment, after a search of thirteen days, and a march of nearly three hundred miles, came upon a fresh trail of Indians, near the head of the north fork of the Nueces river, Texas; and as the trail led into a rocky country, almost impracticable for cavalry, he dismounted, left his horses with a guard, and continued the pursuit with only seven men. After a tedious march of four miles, he suddenly came upon a camp, occupied by from eighty to one hundred Indians. Approaching it, under cover, to within two hundred and fifty yards, and he and his little party being discovered, they were attacked by all the warriors in the camp, and threatened. At the same time, by a party returning to it with horses. He repulsed the Indians, with a loss to them of two killed and one wounded. It being then night, he withdrew his men, rejoined his horses, and returned to the attack the next day; but, in the mean while, the Indians dispersed. For the last three days this detachment had no rations; having been out seventeen days."

I could go on with these instances. I have other cases marked which I might cite. There are twenty-five recited in this single order—one of them a case where the Indians were drawn up in position, and waited to receive an attack of cavalry, when they were gallantly attacked by Sumner, leading his men and charging in the same manner in which he charged the Mexican forces at Molina del Rey. He drove them from the field, and their safety arose simply from their ability, with their light horses, to cross a stream, the bed of which was composed of sand.

The Senator, then, has done injustice; and if he will take this order, I will give it to him, that he may see how great is the injustice he has done to the Army in thus proclaiming to the country that they have rendered no part of that duty which devolves upon them for the protection of the frontier. If he will read the report of the Secretary of War, he will find that this is but one of the two orders that recite such deeds, illustrating the services which have been rendered by our gallant little band on the frontier, and answering the reflection which the Senator has, I am sure unconsciously, cast on those who are, mean time, encountering service more severe than it has often fallen to the lot of troops to bear.

Then the Senator, in the course of his remarks, (for I find that, as my opponents are pressed to a change, I must change also,) took the ground that, on one occasion, the Army had been effective; for, said he, they had killed one hundred and thirty women and children; and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] said dragoons had been raised, under the pretext of defending the frontier against the Indians, and all he heard of their doings was their having killed some squaws and children. I do not know what number he meant, whether the same one hundred and thirty or not; but he explained that he meant the same place. The report of General Harney, in reference to the action referred to, is to be found in the second volume of the President's message and accompanying documents for last year, at page 49. He sets forth the whole case; and, according to his report, and the accompanying reports of the officers who were serving under him, the number of killed was eighty-six, and wounded, five—not one hundred and thirty women and children, but eighty-six Indians were killed, and five wounded; about seventy women and children captured, and fifty mules and ponies taken, besides an indefinite number killed and disabled. In a report made by Colonel Cooke, which I shall not weary the Senate by reading, he explains that the women dressed and armed so much like the men, as sometimes to be almost undistinguishable from them. They fired upon his men; and, in one instance, wounded a sergeant who had passed a woman because he perceived she was one.

Then, again, the report of Lieutenant Warren, who was the topographical engineer accompanying the expedition, gives distinctly the whole circumstances and topography of the ground which caused the killing of, I think, seven women and three children. After the first attack, on the Blue Water, a part of the Indians escaped across the plains, and were pursued by the mounted troops. A part of them, being on a hill, had fled into a sort of a cave, where the rock hung down near to the ground, and furnished a loop-hole through which they fired upon the troops as they approached. This fire was returned by the troops. A cry was heard from the interior of this cave, and one of the interpreters said there were women in it, and the officer who commanded them (and who, by the way, the Senator from Maine would have found, if he had inquired, was a worthy representative of his own State) immediately halted, told the interpreter to advance, and called on the women to come out. They did come out, surrendered, and were not hurt; and all who were killed were those who had been shot in the cave, where they could not be seen, and only then after the troops had been fired at from the cave. That, according to the history of the case, is the foundation of this charge of killing one hundred and thirty women and children.

The commander of that expedition, General Harney, might compare his knowledge of Indians and of Indian character favorably with the Senator from Texas, or anybody else. That stroke, which he gave the Indians on the Blue Water, was the most successful blow that was ever struck on that frontier for the preservation of its future peace; and if peace shall be enjoyed by the people of Nebraska, it will be attributable more to that one great movement of Harney's than to anything else which has ever happened there. Then, moving on, with that knowledge of Indian character, and that intrepidity and devotion to his duty which characterize the man, he went forward, disregarding all difficulties, until he reached the Missouri river, and there held a council with the Indians, and formed with them an agreement, which stands in my judgment as a model for all treaties with Indian tribes. He there established among them an organization, which, if anything could be effective to preserve these restless people in order, would conduce to that result. It has had the good effect, so far as I can learn, thus far to keep the Indians who have hitherto been hostile, in a state of peace, and approximating to that end of which the Senator speaks.

But, sir, in answer to some remarks which have been made by myself and others, replies have been offered, which would indicate that there had been an intention to signify that volunteers were wantonly cruel. I have no disposition to shrink from the responsibility of what I said; or if I did not say it, what I thought. I thought, and I now say, that if you bring men out with border animosities, men who have had past injuries, who come with grievances to redress, they will exceed the limits of justice; they will exceed the limits of humanity and forbearance; they will kill without justifiable cause. I have no disposition to cite cases, though it would be easy for me to do so. Volunteers—the word is used because others use it; militia is the strict term—the militia are the people of the United States, and so are the soldiers of the regular Army. They are all volunteers. Thank fortune we live under a Government where all, who enter the military service, do it voluntarily. Militia may be coerced by draft; the regular soldier is always a volunteer; his is always a voluntary enlistment; he is emphatically, under all circumstances, the volunteer. But using the term in the sense in which it has been used, militia, if drawn from a distance, would be exactly like those enlisted in the regular service; the whole difference being the degree of discipline, and that disparity constantly vanishing in the progress of a long campaign, bringing them at last to precisely the same standard; being the same materiel at the start, and reaching the same result if they are carried through the same process.

The whole of the cases which were referred to, and which have been somewhat warped in the argument, were those which resulted from border animosity and from partisan feeling. I think I said—and if I did not, I intended to say—that if the militia of California were called out against the Mormons, coming there with the hostility resulting from their contact with them, justifiable, if you please, but coming with that preconceived hostility, they would exercise a severity in their treatment of them which would not belong to men brought from a distance. That is my opinion. It is very likely, that if the appeal was made to the men themselves, they would say: "Yes, that is true, we do feel it; and we are likely to exercise it." I am sure I have never seen a body of militia in the field, called from the neighborhood of a settlement on which Indian depredations had been committed, which did not come with the spirit of extermination, and justify themselves by arguments drawn from what they had suffered.

We have also had the argument presented to us, that the militia will always respond to the call of the country; that they always have been the effective force which has fought the battles of the country; and that they are the reliable strength of the country. Grant it. Who denies it? The militia have responded, and they always will respond, when there is occasion; but the militia never have been called out to hold frontier posts; and they will be found to be very restless troops if they should ever thus be employed. It would be at a great sacrifice of the other interests of the country, if the militia were so called out. Men useful in the ordinary avocations of life, detached from them and from their families, to perform the duty of private sentinels at a frontier post, would be such a waste of valuable material, that it would deserve to be called anything else than economy, even if it did not cost a dollar.

But, sir, as to the relative efficiency of the two species of troops, I have some brief points to which I will refer; and the first is the "Vital Statistics" of Dr. Coolidge, a review of which work will be found in the American Journal of Medical Science, for January last, and a table from the work alluded to, will be found at page 92 of the Journal. It is a table showing the proportion of the invalid and disabled troops in the different services. First, he takes the British army, giving a percentage of 0.65 per month; then the regular Army of the United States, giving a percentage of 0.53; and then the additional force raised in the war with Mexico, being regular troops, 0.52; then the volunteers, 1.25 per month. That is to say the men, who became diseased and disabled by the contingencies of the camp, were about double, in the volunteer forces, what they were in the regular army. Why was this? In the first place, the volunteers did not know how to take care of themselves; they did not know how to shelter themselves; they did not know how to cook their provisions; and in the next place, their habits were suddenly changed, and this waste of life was the result of the sudden change before the animal economy had been accommodated to it. If you were to take an Osage and put him on a simple rice diet, you would as surely kill him as if you were to take a Hindoo and put him on a meat diet alone. Either of the two extremes would bring about the same result, and be destructive to the efficiency of the Army.

Next I refer to the report of the Surgeon-General of the Army, of November 9, 1846, in which he says:

"From the best information which has been received at this office, it is believed that the extent of sickness among the volunteers on the Rio Grande has been fourfold to that among the soldiers of the regular Army, with a corresponding excess of mortality in the ranks of the former."

"But this is not all; the presence of a numerous body of invalids seriously embarrasses the service; for, besides consuming the subsistence and other stores required for the efficient men, they must have an additional number of surgeons and men to take care of them, and a guard to protect them, which necessarily lessens the disposable force, the available force, for active operations in the field."

These are the two statements on which I would rely as to the relative efficiency of the two species of troops; and these reasons apply with fourfold force to the circumstances of the expedition to Utah. They will be there further removed from civilization; they will be there more deprived of the comforts to which they have been before accustomed. The casualties resulting from the employment of militia in such a service as that, by their being disabled by disease, exposure, and the vicissitudes of the camp, will greatly exceed anything we have heretofore encountered in the cases from which these results have been drawn.

There might, however, be circumstances which would justify us in meeting all these objections. If I believed, with the Senator from Texas, that the cavalry of the United States Army was necessarily wholly inefficient, a mere tax which never did and never would do anything, certainly I would say we must look out for some other character of troops; but some of the hard rides read to him to-day, some of the successful pursuits, defying all privations of food, cold, and thirst, should somewhat convince him that the Army may be effective for the purpose for which he proposes to employ a volunteer force. He says he wants troops; but he wants a different kind of troops than the Army can furnish; he wants men who are able to take care of their horses; men who know something about frontier service. Where will he find them out of the Army, comparable to our dragoons? Where will he find men who have so often encamped under the blue vault of heaven, and relied on grass to support their marching column, as in the Army of the United States? Where will he find men who know so much of the topography of the country? If his objection be that the recruits are not sufficiently instructed, the remedy is to give us more force; not to require that every man, the instant he is enlisted, shall be thrown on to the frontier for immediate service; but give us enough troops to keep some in camps of instruction and in schools of practice, where they may be educated for those duties which the Senator desires to have them perform.

But he makes the argument of economy in that connection, and uses it in several other connections; and among others, the Senator from Georgia first asserts and the Senator from Texas indorses it, that Texas used to be better protected by four companies of rangers, than she is now by five regular regiments. To that there are two answers: First, there are not five regiments there; and second, if Texas ever was protected by four companies at the early period referred to, those four companies might have been quite adequate to protect the settlements which, at that time, were not equal to one twentieth, or perhaps one hundredth part of what they are now. Four companies were sufficient to protect a single ranch; they were more than sufficient to protect a single man; and they may have been sufficient to protect the whole amount of border settlements Texas then had.

It is further to be remembered that the Indians then lived upon fertile valleys with abundance of game, and that the prosperity and progress, which to me is most gratifying, of the people of Texas, has now driven the Indians from the fertile plains into the arid region where but little game is to be found; and now, by necessity, they commit forays for plunder in order that they may obtain food, which is not to be found in the haunts to which they have been driven.

Then, again, it is to be remembered that Texas did not occupy to the boundary of the Rio Grande. I contended in 1850 that that was her territory. I contended for it a great way up the stream; but nevertheless it is true that she did not maintain posts on the borders of that river overlooking the territories of Mexico. A portion of the force in Texas is to be accounted for by manning those posts which mark the boundary of the Rio Grande, and which Texas never occupied with a regular force.

Now, sir, the question of economy is to be answered in several forms. As I understand the argument, the basis of it, and it was so stated by the Senator from Georgia, is, that the cost, whilst in the service, of a militiaman and of a regular is the same. He made some slighting remarks about the skill of regulars in making out accounts, to which I have no reply to make, but he said the pay and allowances were the same; overlooking the fact, that the more frequently you change the force the greater its cost. He has neglected the law which gives to the militiaman fifty cents a day for his own subsistence, and twenty-five cents for that of his horse, whilst he is going to and getting back, and twenty-five cents for the use of his horse while he is in service. It is a fact that we have been able to get very few volunteers otherwise than mounted. It has become steadily more and more so with each year. The late Adjutant General Jones used to say, that he recollected the time when the song was, that a man was to shoulder his musket and march away, but now it was to get upon a horse and ride away. His complaint was then that he could not get militia to serve on foot. He could not get militia in Florida to serve on foot. It was not so much that they required to ride, as that they would not serve for the poor pay given to the private soldier of the United States; they required the pay of mounted men, pay and allowances for their horses; and the indemnity for their horses, which always follows, in a heavy train, behind the allowance for permission to use the horse at all.

All these matters have been reduced to calculation; we have had reports on them. It is hardly necessary to argue that the traveling allowances, the clothing which is on the ratio of the first year's services, and the pay for the use of the horses, constitute the items that make up the very great expense of the employment of volunteers. These have all been stated in tables, which have heretofore been prepared, presented, and published for the use of the Government. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] this morning referred to the letter of Mr. Poinsett. That letter communicated a report of the Paymaster General, who went beyond the limits of the then Secretary of War. He refers to the disparity between the cost of the two forces as nearly six to one, because, he says, the horses that are employed are merely to carry the men from place to place, and really impede the march of the column. Then he goes on to state that—

"This enormous disparity in the expenses of the two forces is not owing to the extravagant allowances made to volunteers; for, except in the article of clothing, they are not better paid than regular troops, and altogether insufficiently compensated to reimburse them for the pecuniary sacrifices they make in leaving home and employment, to say nothing of the danger and hardships they encounter. It is caused principally by expenses for traveling to and from the place where the services of the volunteers and militia are required; to the hire, maintenance, and indemnity for horses; and to furnishing them a full supply of clothing as a bounty, without regard to length of service. The statements also show the expense of volunteers serving on foot, and of militia. The term of service of the latter never exceeds three months, unless specially provided for."

"There is one comparison that would place the contrast between the expenses of regular and irregular troops in a much stronger light, if I had the data to enable me to state it in figures; and that is, the comparative loss and destruction of military stores and public property by the two forces."

He presents his tabular statement in which he shows, on the basis of the companies, that for six months the cost of a company of United States dragoons was $13,573, and for the mounted volunteers $22,575. That is the ratio to which the attention of the Senator from Georgia is called before he again assumes the position that the expense is the same.

The Senator announced, in the course of his argument, that the cost per man of the Army, was $1,000 per annum; but the Senator from Maine, I think, says it is $1,500. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] says it is $1,000; and thus it seems to be a question between the gentlemen whether it is $1,000 or $1,500. I am quite at a loss to know by what process of calculation they reach that result. Surely the Senator from Georgia, when he states the cost per man during the time Mr. Calhoun was Secretary of War, to be $273, has not based his calculation on any data which will lead him to decide that $1,000 is the cost of a man now. Whatever process of calculation is adopted, it must be different for the one case and the other to reach these results. It is utterly impossible to obtain them by any one process of calculation.

Mr. TOOMBS. I can refer the Senator to my authority. In 1842, the Secretary of War, Mr. Spencer, of New York, I think, was called upon to compare the estimate of expenditures. He puts it at that amount on the same basis by dividing the expense by the number of men and officers. The report I stated from recollection was that it was $273. That is where my information is derived from.

Mr. DAVIS. The report of 1820 is to be found in the American State Papers, volume 2, pages 46-7; and in it is stated the strength of the Army at different dates, and the annual expense per man, including officers; and this report states it to have been, in 1809, 1810, and 1811, $383 60; in 1820, $336 56, per man; and that the reduction of nearly fifty dollars has been ascribed, and I think with much justice, though I do not believe it is wholly due to that cause, to the increase of the Army which, in the mean time, had taken place. The Army had been increased on the peace establishment by six thousand men, and the expense per man had sunk nearly fifty dollars.

Now, sir, I have had a calculation made on the present basis to ascertain what a regiment of infantry will cost; and I have asked that it shall be a regiment of infantry to be raised, including the whole expense for recruiting, the first years' clothing, all the camp and garrison equipage, so as to bring it as nearly as possible into a fair comparison or parallelism with a volunteer force raised for the same time. It is the same table which was furnished to the Senator from Texas, but which could not have been in his possession when he made his remarks. The pay during twelve months of a maximum infantry regiment, eight hundred and seventy-eight strong, (that includes all the field and staff, and includes the additional men granted by the act of 1850,) including officers' subsistence, clothing for their servants, and forage for the horses of the field and staff, subsistence of the enlisted men at the price which has been estimated for the Utah expedition, clothing for the enlisted men, with camp and garrison equipage for the officers and men, make the total amount of maintaining for one year such a regiment, $293,784 39. If to this be added the maximum cost of raising such a regiment, $14,630, we shall have an aggregate of $308,414 39; and this divided by eight hundred and seventy-eight would give us the cost per man for the first year, $351 24. The cost of raising a regiment would of course be excluded from all subsequent calculations. The estimate for clothing would be greatly lessened the second year; and the estimate for camp and garrison equipage would disappear.

We have had an estimate lately sent in to us, of $385,000 required by the pay department alone for twenty companies of volunteers for six months. That would be equal to ten companies for twelve months; and taking it and comparing it with this estimate of a regiment for a year, adding the cost of rations, which is $77,015, it would give a total of $462,015, (including merely the cost of rations and the pay,) or $526 21 per man. It follows, then, that a regiment of volunteers would, for one year, cost $153,600 61 more than a regular regiment of the same strength; or an individual volunteer during the same period, $174 97 more than an individual regular soldier. It will be remembered, however, that these volunteers are mounted.*

Mr. BENJAMIN. In my statement as to the cost per man of the Army, I took from the estimates submitted by the War Department what the Secretary of War himself states as to the expenses of the Army proper. I find the estimates as follows: First, expenses of recruiting, transportation of recruits, &c., $110,000; next, pay, commutation of officers' subsistence, commutation of forage, payments to discharged soldiers for clothing not drawn, payments in lieu of clothing for officers' servants, subsistence in kind, clothing of the Army, supplies for the quartermaster's department, incidental expenses of that department, barracks, transportation of officers' baggage, transportation of troops and supplies, purchase of horses, contingencies of the Army, medical and hospital department, contingent expenses of the adjutant-general's department, expenses of the commanding general's office,—the whole making, together, as the expenses of the Army proper, $14,776,619 49.

Now, if we take, according to the statement of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, the cost of raising a regiment, and count that only as added to the pay and rations, undoubtedly he may bring the expenses per man to four or five hundred dollars; but have we any assurance that all the other expenses and all those other branches of the Army service are not to increase proportionately to the Army, and consequently that the sum total of the appropriations will still remain about a thousand dollars per man? I do not profess to be acquainted with these details, but I take the report of the Secretary of War, and he says he wants $15,000,000 for the Army proper, which now averages about fifteen thousand men, making $1,000 per man.

Mr. DAVIS. I am obliged to the Senator from Louisiana for his explanation, and think it is easily answered. It is a process of calculation which always leads to error. There are some methods of computation which will occasionally be right, and sometimes wrong; but that is a process which is always wrong, and cannot be right. I will put the two cases that result from that process. I will suppose that fortifications cease; that the manufacture of arms ceases; that your staff is disbanded; that you swell the companies to the maximum limit; that you have additional regiments; that you raise an army to that magnitude which might even frighten the Senators who have spoken of the dangers of a standing army; and yet, according to this process of calculation you would bring forward a beautiful sheet of economy. You would have lopped off the vast expenditures which do not depend on numbers; you would have multiplied the lower grades where the smallest pay is received, and, per capita, you would bring up a sheet demonstrating a most economical administration. Now, let us take the other case: suppose that, following in the footsteps of our fathers, and profiting by the experience of the time which has intervened from their day to this, we think proper to maintain, in time of peace, a large staff; we think proper to go on with fortifications for the contingencies of war; we think proper to go on with the manufacturing of arms, so that the whole militia may be supplied at any moment; we think proper to cut down the companies to the small number necessary for duty in time of peace; we think proper to maintain a large number of regiments in proportion to the whole number of the rank and file; and then, per capita, you have the greatest expenditure you could possibly show, yet you have the wisest economy, according to the theory of our military system, which could be adopted.

Mr. BENJAMIN. In the list of expenditures to which I have just referred, I carefully excluded everything having reference to the manufacture of arms, and to fortifications. That list has no reference to them at all. They are excluded. If we include these and other items, the expenses would reach twenty millions.

Mr. DAVIS. But you include all the vastly expensive portions of the Army in your estimate. You include the staff, which would not be increased by adding to the number of men, and which, on our theory, is maintained in time of peace because it is essential in time of war; because it is a part of that arrangement by which you render effective, with the small nucleus preserved in time of peace, a large army in the field.

Besides, it will be remembered that by special legislation you have sometimes increased the pay of particular officers, general and staff; you have raised it to a magnitude which bears no relation to that of the soldiers; and this is an argument adduced against the increase of companies, against the increase of privates in the Army; but it has resulted from the pay which you have bestowed with a liberal hand on some officers in the service. I say such a process of calculation leads to error, and cannot lead to any other result. It never can evolve the truth. It may vary the one side or the other, just in proportion as the Administration multiply the troops and diminish the size of the staff, or the reverse; but it is false, work it out as you may.

In the argument of Mr. Calhoun, in his report of 1820, in answering then the very same objections which are made now, as to the expensive character of our peace establishment, he pointed out the unfairness of including the staff in such an argument, and running a parallel between the staff of our Army and others. A nation of Europe keeping on her peace establishment an army equal to her war purposes, and having it concentrated, and with a staff exactly commensurate to the size of that army, forms no standard of measure for a country like ours and an army like ours, where we preserve, in time of peace, a staff suited to the vast augmentation of our force, by bringing the militia into the field in time of war. The same argument which he made then is applicable now; but I shall not detain the Senate longer on this point.

I am not arguing that the expense of our military establishment is not great, or more properly the expense of protecting our frontier; but arguing rather that the whole theory on which the opposition rests is wrong. They contend that, in proportion as you increase the number of men, you will increase the expenses of the Army. It is not so; because, if you use one regiment to perform the duty of five, you add to the expense of that regiment the transportation to the places where five would be stationed, and you increase the expenses of that regiment just in proportion as you move it over great distances. Then the expense comes in, as this year, in the form of transportation. It comes in exactly as that deficiency which was cited by the Senator from Maine, and which he argued should be included in the expense per capita. That is an expense which is proportionately great as you reduce the number of men. The transportation increases from the want of ability to station the men wherever they are; and that is compensated for by taking the same man and using him at a number of places. Never, in the history of any nation, were such extensive marches and movements made, and over plains so desert and so totally destitute of all supplies by the way, as those made by our Army in the last two or three years.

This brings me to the argument of the Senator from Georgia, that on account of the improvements which have been made, an army of twenty-five thousand men is equal to what one hundred thousand would have been twenty-five years ago. Sir, twenty-five years ago we had none of these long marches to make which are reported by the Secretary of War. Twenty-five years ago our Indian frontier was within reach of supplies which could be sent on navigable water. It has been since that time that our Indian frontier has been pressed outward, the settlements advancing from navigable waters, throwing our military operations into a country where everything has to be transported at a vast expense, and where nothing is to be obtained, either on the road or at the place of destination. These are the elements of increasing expense, and the expense is not to be diminished by making speeches about what has been done in former times, and what might be done now. It requires the coöperation of the legislative and executive branches, to reduce the expenses of the Army, or any other branch of the public service. Reforms have been asked, from year year, to improve the administration of the Army, but they have not been granted. The last two Administrations, as well as this, have recommended to Congress changes in the organization which would be conducive to economy and efficiency. Congress has not heretofore responded. Whilst it does not so respond, it seems as idle, as it is easy, to make declamation against the expenses of the military establishment.

We are told by the Senator from Georgia that he takes the standard of Mr. Calhoun, and he made the argument—which I am willing to pass over—that Mr. Calhoun left ten companies to the regiment, and therefore he was retaining the theory of Mr. Calhoun, against the invasion of that theory by the proposed bill. Sir, the theory of Mr. Calhoun was not any certain number of officers to the regiment; it was not any certain number of men to the company; it was not even any certain number of officers to the Army. He says, in his report, that those were things which varied with different countries, and must vary in the same country, at different times. He presented what he believed to be a good organization of the staff. What I claim respect for in relation to Mr. Calhoun's theory of organization, is the great principle on which it rested; not the details, which were to vary with circumstances, but the mighty truth, which his mind, contracting all light like a moral lens, brought on the subject. It was the truth of this theory of a skeleton army, in time of peace, for purposes of instruction and organization, with a staff adequate to the vast number of militia which would be called into the field whenever we should be engaged in a foreign war.

That theory he presented; that theory he defended; that theory has been justified by practice and experience from that day to this. That theory is not violated by changing the number of men in a company, or the number of men in a regiment, or the number of companies in a regiment. The number of companies in a regiment varies from twelve to eight. It is not violated by increasing or reducing the Army. It would only be violated by establishing, as a rule, that we would on our peace establishment keep a certain number of companies required for frontier service, and swell them up to the war or maximum standard, and then, when we get into war, be compelled to meet its contingencies by raising new troops, or, as Mr. Calhoun said, introducing a new element, instead of expanding the old one.

The Senator from Texas says there is a want of respectability in the rank and file of the Army, and he draws that want of respectability from

* Table furnished from the Adjutant General's Office.

Pay during twelve months, of a maximum infantry regiment (878 strong), including officers' subsistence, clothing for their servants, and forage for horses of the field and staff.....	$167,125 30
Subsistence of the enlisted men, at twenty-five cents per man, (estimated rate for the Army in Utah).....	77,015 00
Clothing for the enlisted men, with the camp and garrison equipage, for officers and men..	49,643 89
Leaving for the whole amount of maintaining, for one year, a stationary infantry regiment (878 strong).....	$293,784 39
Add to which the cost of raising the same.....	14,630 00

It is to be observed, that the above sum of $293,784 39 is a full and minutely exact estimate of the whole amount required for the pay, clothing, subsistence, and personal equipment (exclusive only of arms) of a maximum infantry regiment, supposed to be full, at the beginning of the year, and to be kept full throughout the whole succeeding twelve months.

It is moreover to be observed, that the estimates for clothing is for a first year's supply, which is considerably greater than that for either of the subsequent four years; the proportional cost of an infantry soldier's allowance for the five years, being, according to the last table published to the Army, in 1855, as follows: first year, $41 03; second year, $23 61; third year, $36 67; fourth year, $23 61; fifth year, $31 52.

The allowance of camp and garrison equipage, herein included, is expected, besides, under ordinary circumstances, to last throughout the whole five years.

The estimated cost of raising a regiment is not to be counted in the same year with that above furnished for maintaining it; not only, because, as already stated, the latter completely covers the year, but for the reason that many items of expense included in the former, and which cannot easily be separated from it, are also included in the latter.

their inability to obtain promotion. I answered him on that point this morning, and showed him that, at least, recent legislation had removed his argument, had opened the door wider than ever before, and the rank and file were in a better condition now than they were at the time to which he referred, so far as promotion was concerned. I endeavored—I will not say successfully—to controvert his idea that the present object was to diminish that opportunity, and sought to show, and I believe did show, that the first section of this bill was to increase the opportunities for the promotion of the rank and file, both to commissioned and non-commissioned officers.

But he repeated, this morning, something like the argument he made the other day, when he averred that there was an impassable barrier between the rank and file and the commissioned officers, and he ascribes it all to the Military Academy as the root of the evil. He says these are political appointments. He seems to have a very bad opinion of a man because he has been instructed in a particular branch. He seems to reach the conclusion that it follows, as a necessary consequence, that if a man has been educated for a particular profession, he is utterly unfit for it. Therefore, the lawyer, who gets a license, must be unfit to go into court; the surgeon, who has walked the hospitals, must be unable to perform an operation. It seems to me that the test to which they are applied ought to bring anybody's mind to a different conclusion.

I propose to notice that, in connection with his argument, that this is political favoritism. I claim that on the theory which at present exists, we have the most democratic basis which could be incorporated into the Army. How are your cadets appointed? It is true the law leaves to the Executive the power to appoint; but it is well known that the practice is, and for many years has been, for the member of the congressional district in which a vacancy occurs, to nominate whomsoever he pleases from that district, and the Secretary of War always appoints the person so nominated. Then these appointments are political only in the sense that they represent every shade of political opinion which is represented in the House of Representatives, and that every political party, which can have a voice in the House of Representatives, has a representative in the Military Academy. Is that objectionable? If so, how is it proposed to be cured?

Then, again, the large number appointed, say one hundred per annum, exceeds the number who are commissioned, say forty or fifty, more than two to one. Thus double, or more than double, the chances are given to the youth of the country to get into the Academy, that are offered to get places in the Army. I say you multiply the opportunities; and how is this brought to bear? From each congressional district a nomination may be made. The cadet so nominated enters the Academy, and there it depends on himself whether he shall go through and obtain a commission or not. When he attains that commission, he feels that he has something which he has won by his own effort; something he does not owe to the favor of any one, save so far as he may run back to the early favor he received from the member who nominated him to an office, which was so small that the member had probably forgotten it. If, then, I say, there is any mode by which you could leave the officer of the Army without any political bias of character; any mode by which you could leave him independently to feel that he might entertain whatever opinions he pleased, it is that which you have adopted, and which enables him to reach a commission by his own effort, in contact with the struggling many by whom he is to be surrounded.

If you were to increase that Academy twofold in number, you would but render its principles more democratic; you would but increase the chances to youth to get position; you would but increase the struggle which would be required to obtain a commission, and give him additionally to feel that whatever he attained he owed to his country, and not to man; to himself, and not to mere political favoritism.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and then adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 11.

Mr. President, having already consumed the time of the Senate to a greater extent than I had anticipated, I shall endeavor to close my remarks very soon. Yesterday, in the progress of a review of the various objections made to the bill, I noticed those points that relate to efficiency and economy. I undertook to show, at that time, that it was better all the duties of our peace establishment, as it is called, should be performed by regular troops, than by the frequent calling out of the militia. I endeavored, also, to indicate at that time the sources of the increase in the expenditure of the Army, and to show that this was the result of the remote points at which the Army was serving; it was the result of the vast expense of transportation to those remote points; it was the result of the increased cost of everything which entered into the consumption and the active employment of the Army.

I do not recollect whether or not I stated another very essential difference: being that, whilst at the time the comparison of which I spoke was instituted, we had no mounted force except a small amount of light artillery, we now have nearly one third of the amount of the Army mounted; and that portion of the Army almost constantly in active service. Horses which at that time were worth sixty or seventy dollars, cost last year $176; forage has risen in the same proportion; and, as the loss of horses in the service of the United States has been referred to, I invite attention to the cases which I cited yesterday, and others of a like kind, where Indians had been pursued by troops for hundreds of miles without cessation, passing over sixty, and sometimes even eighty miles, almost, scarcely without drawing the rein, in pursuit of an enemy as wily, as brave, and, mounted on horses, nearly as fleet as the Arabs of the desert, over a country quite as inhospitable, and in which it is equally difficult to obtain water or food necessary to sustain a horse. Undergoing this severe fatigue under excessive heat, is it matter of surprise that horses, drawn immediately from the farms where they have been purchased, and forced into such service as this, should sink under the trial—should require to be renewed, and that the expenditure should be great, as they must be supplied not only at the high rates of the market, but at the accumulated value they have when transported to these remote points?

The distribution, which is to be made of the gross amount of expenditure according to the statement read by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] is not a distribution upon the heads of the soldiers. For a fair comparison, reference must be had to the different character of troops; and it will be readily seen that the simple division of a gross sum to be applied to a variety of objects cannot give a result which will express the cost of the soldier truly. The sum he has stated is, I believe, perhaps about that which a mounted soldier costs in the Army. Taking the troops serving at these remote points, engaged in these expeditions, and taking the cost of forage, and the supplying of remount horses, I believe it will amount to what he stated, $1,000 per capita; but this surely is not to be taken as the average cost of the Army, it being not the man only, but the horse also, and the cost of both depending on the locality of service. Equally delusive is the comparison made between the cost of this date and that selected, there being no cavalry at the former period, and the posts being then convenient to the great markets of the country, and contiguous to productive settlements.

I have never, I believe, either in my former or present service in the Senate, referred to any criticism in a newspaper, or to a newspaper article, and I do not intend to do so now in that character; but the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] yesterday, introduced a newspaper article, which, at that time, I had not read. Since it has been introduced by a Senator to the Senate, I will notice it; but otherwise I would not have done so. It is a flippant article contained in the Union of yesterday, in which the writer undertakes to arraign the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and presumptuously, also, to arraign the Senate, and, committing the most egregious blunders, to state what, under certain contingencies, the Senate would have done. He announces, after speaking of the wants, and delay the Senate had made in attending to them:

"Strange as this delay is, its causes are yet stranger. The increase recommended was by regiments. That recommendation came first from the Lieutenant General commanding the Army, indorsed by the Secretary of War, and finally approved by the President. It can scarcely be doubted, had the Military Committee, without delay, reported a bill in conformity with these suggestions, it would at this moment have been the law of the land, the regiments in a forward state of recruiting, and arrangements in progress for their early march to their places of destination."

So far as that delay occurred in the committee, it occurred during the period the committee were collecting information and investigating the subject, to reach a result and bring that result to the Senate. Then, sir, as to what the Senate would have done, that is not a matter of speculation. The substitute presented by the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] the very proposition of the War Department, was voted upon, and it received but eight votes in the Senate; and of those eight votes, some Senators voted for it because they felt it was a proposition so easily killed that they had better substitute it for the bill of the committee, with no desire that it should pass, with no intent to sustain it, but simply adopting it as a means of readily disposing of the whole question.

This article proceeds to deal with military matters, and informs the Senate and the committee that all the knowledge on military affairs is at the other end of the avenue; and then the writer proceeds himself to launch out a little. Speaking of the Army organization, he says:

"Indeed, on inquiry, we learn that two of each of the twelve artillery companies are intended for light field artillery, and are not integrals of the garrison organization, which conforms to the other regiments, is of long standing, is the basis of our system, State and Federal, and of the systems of the European armies."

If he had happened to know a little about the organization of the European armies, of which he speaks so confidently, he would have understood that the artillery organization there is for a wholly different purpose—a purpose for which ours should be—and conforms to the idea which I once presented to the Senate, when in the War Department, to make our artillery organization for the use of large guns, and not as they are now—in infantry, merely wearing a different uniform. The article proceeds:

"In fact, but a hasty glance at the books shows but one established system of regimental organization in all these different arms, and we find the entire tactical system based on battalion, squadron, regimental drill, and army evolutions, contemplating ten companies to each regiment."

The "glance" must have been "hasty" indeed—hastier than a "plate of soup;" and it must have been oblique as well as hasty; otherwise it certainly must have occurred to the writer of this article, who, it is apparent, is not as ignorant as he is inclined willfully to misrepresent, that so far from this being a uniform organization, it is an exception in every army of Europe; that so far from ten companies being the universal organization, so far from the tactics depending on the number of companies, he will not find in any system of tactics the word "regiment" used. All our tactical organization is on the basis of the battalion; and a battalion in the European armies usually consists of some fraction of a regiment. A regiment may consist of one, two, three, four, or six battalions, and in some circumstances it does. There are, in some services, regiments running up from six to twenty-four companies. The idea of ten companies being the basis recognized all over the world as necessary for the tactics, is an absurdity which a man who shows as much knowledge of the affair of which he writes as the writer of this article, cannot have committed with an honest purpose. Then he says:

"The mischief would not end in deranging the fixed Army basis, but would result in fundamentally changing the militia organizations in all the States of the Union, as they have adopted the Army plan, and must always look to it for its system of drill and instruction. Here would be incalculable mischief and confusion."

Inc calculable mischief and confusion by changing the number of companies in a regiment!—a change that has been frequently made in our own history, and which, in its reference to the tactics, is not found to bear any relation at all, the whole being intended for a certain number of companies.

constituting a battalion; and it merely so happening that, when the tactics were prepared, ten companies did constitute a regiment; and, therefore, in assigning the captains to their posts in line, they are assigned numerically on the basis of ten companies to a regiment.

I wish it to be understood, sir, that it is because the Senator from New Hampshire has introduced this subject in the Senate, that I have departed from what is the course I have heretofore pursued, and stop to notice newspaper criticism on the action of the committee, or of the Senate, or of myself. In times past I have defied such criticism, and I expect to do it in the future. I rely upon the intelligence of the people to discriminate between the scribbler who arraigns a public man for the manner in which he performs his duty, and the justice that truth requires, as it is to be elaborated by their own intelligent minds.

I pointed out, in my remarks yesterday, the distinction between a State and a Territory in relation to the power of this Government to use its military force. This brings me to a brief notice of a remark in the President's message which refers to the withdrawal of the troops in Kansas in case Kansas should be admitted as a State. The President sees, no doubt, that troops are required elsewhere; and I agree with him, that if Kansas becomes a State, she ought then to provide for the execution of her own laws; and that if she requires extraneous aid, it ought to be sought only in the manner provided in the laws made in conformity with the Constitution. I agree with the President, that troops ought not to be quartered in the State of Kansas, or any other State, with a view to preserve civil order, and that the troops will be disposable when Kansas shall be admitted as a State. Whether peace will follow, I do not know. That depends on whether the people of Kansas are now fit to be a State. If they are fit to form and maintain a State and take their place as equals in this Union, then they do not require troops to be quartered in their midst in order to preserve civil order. That is a question which belongs to the future. In the mean time, I take it for granted that the President will withdraw the two thousand men heretofore kept, under the requisition of Governor Walker, to preserve peace in Kansas, and to suppress insurrection in the event of her admission into the Union.

That, then, renders two thousand men disposable for other service; but I submit to the Senate whether it will justify us in keeping our troops down to the present establishment. The long lines to be occupied, the numerous posts required, in addition to those we now have, demand an additional force. The committee have adopted a plan which gives us an increase of the integral parts of the Army. It was believed to be the most economical which could be adopted for that purpose, avoiding the very high expense that belongs to the higher grades of officers in the regimental organization; preserving the present efficiency, and opening in the future (when that future shall come and which I do not pretend to foresee) a convenient mode of reducing the Army by striking one battalion off each regiment; and if then, the President possess the power, on a declaration of a war, to restore this third battalion, it will render each regiment one third larger on the war than on the peace establishment, and they will go into the service with that efficiency and reliability which belong to discipline and instruction.

During the time I was particularly charged with the administration of the War Department, troops were kept in Kansas when I desired to get them out, not that I did not believe occasions were occurring where they might be useful—and they proved more useful than I believed they would be—but on account of the difficulties which then existed on our frontier. The campaign which had been projected against the Cheyennes was paralyzed by the keeping of troops in Kansas. Those troops were wanted on the frontier to preserve peace; they were wanted on the frontier to punish Indians who had committed acts of hostility; but they were detained in Kansas from day to day, from month to month, and year to year. We looked to the time when peace in Kansas would relieve the Government of the necessity of keeping them there. Time rolled on, and the necessity still continued. When those necessities are to cease, I am not able to foretell.

In the mean time you are aware that a small army has been thrown forward to preserve order and maintain the laws in the Territory of Utah. I shall not follow Senators in a discussion of the propriety of making that expedition against Utah. I believe, and I will say so much now, that the elements of disintegration were in the community of Mormons established in Utah; I believe that physical causes and moral causes were conjointly working together to break up that people. I believed, then, and I am rather inclined to the opinion now, that if we had stood still they would have separated; that it required the compressive force of active movements against them to bring them into submission to their great leaders, to bring in the colonies that had been thrown off from the mother settlement at Salt Lake, back to the grand church, and to unite them under a bond of fanaticism that now makes them effective against any military force that you can probably send there.

But these are questions which belong to the past, and speculation upon which cannot guide our conduct at the future. The Government of the United States has thrown forward its troops on the trail of the Salt Lake. They are in the mountains now, a small body of men; perhaps sufficient, if they had started in time to have gone through to Salt Lake, to discharge their duty; but, checked in the mountains, it is probable that before spring arrives, their animals will have been so reduced, so many will have been lost, that they will be without the ability to move. If the commander of that expedition, Colonel Johnston, has the transportation which will enable him to move, he will subdue resistance with the force he has. I speak it with a confidence which grows out of a long acquaintance, both in the garrison and in the field; but my apprehension is that he will not have the power to move, for the want of transportation; that he must stand where he is until he is reinforced.

Now let us see what is necessary to reinforce him. The column with which he moved, was no larger than was necessary for its own security and the security of its supplies. Then the column that goes to reinforce him, if it were only with provisions and animals of draught, must be as large as the original column, and it must be larger still, because the train will be increased; and thus you will go on from year to year with every additional train of supplies you send out; sending a detachment of troops at least equal to, I believe it must be larger than, the original column which went forth under the command of Colonel Johnston. Year by year, then, as you delay, you will continue to increase the expenditure and increase the column that you are annually to send out. A column may come back, but the expense will not be the less for that reason. Your expenditure is to grow annually until this matter is terminated in one way or the other. If it is to be terminated by bringing the Mormons to submission to the Government of the United States by force, clearly, then, wisdom, both in relation to treasure and the honor of the country, requires that an efficient force should be thrown forward at once, and that the act should be accomplished in the first months of the ensuing summer.

On the other hand, it may be that they will make no armed resistance; that they will fly to the mountains, hang in the gorges to harass trains and cut off emigrants. We then stand but in the same category. This army of occupation still is to be maintained; it is still to be supplied—supplied by a column capable of covering its lengthy train over the long march it must make through that arid, desert country, and thus annually you incur the same expense, if the object be merely to hold possession; whilst the rebels of the settlement at Salt Lake are scattered through the mountain passes, and lying in wait to capture the emigrant trains or the trains of Government supplies.

What other means may be in the power of the Administration to adopt to terminate this difficulty, is not within my knowledge. It may be that these people would be willing to withdraw from the controversy with the United States, and not being willing, on account of their religious oaths, to submit to the laws, and to surrender their hierarchical government, yet might be willing to leave the limits of the United States, and go to some remote region, if they had the means so to migrate; for I hold all speculation founded on the supposition that they are to go away in the spring to parts unknown, must prove entirely deceptive. No community ever had the transportation that would carry the whole body-politic to some remote country, and bear with them supplies to sustain them until other supplies could be grown in the country to which they had gone. They have no people waiting with open arms to receive them.

Wherever they go, they are probably to meet with the hostility of the Government into whose country they enter. Unless they seek some island in the Pacific, I know of no place they can go where the Government will open its gates to receive them. Then they go not to find shelter, not to receive supplies; but they go bearing with them the supplies that are to support them, not merely during the march, but for at least six months after they have arrived at the place of destination. Is it not, then, apparent that they cannot go without the aid of the United States? If they wish to go, I would not only acknowledge in them the right of expatriation, if, indeed, they be citizens of the United States, but I would willingly give as much money, and more, too, than the campaign would cost, thus to get rid of them. I would much rather pay money to let them go peaceably than pay money to drive them away by shedding the blood of American inhabitants on American soil by American arms. Deluded fanatics—criminals they may be—I want not their blood shed by the Government of the United States.

Passing to the next supposition, if they shall retire, a force will be required to keep in check the Indians who surround them, already stimulated to hostility, holding a mountain region which can never be possessed by an agricultural people; indeed it required such associated labor as fanaticism only could command ever to enable the Mormons to support themselves in the valley of Salt Lake. Through that country our emigrant routes require constant military protection; and if the Mormons were out of the United States, still a force must be kept along those routes, or moving at stated periods across the continent to give protection to our emigrants traveling from the valley of the Mississippi to the slopes of the Pacific.

I do not see how we are to look forward, from any possible conclusion of this Mormon difficulty, to a reduction of the Army; and it was because of these and other things, with which I will not weary the Senate, (for I have already occupied too much of their time,) that I stated, in a very early period of this debate, that I did not propose a temporary increase, and that I could not anticipate the day when the reduction would come. This was the honest avowal of opinions which resulted from a somewhat careful examination of the subject.

During the last year I was in the War Office, an examination of the condition of that country and of the emigrant routes, and of the probable future, induced me to project a campaign which was to have started last spring, and to have gone across by the Salt Lake and through the Klamath valley, which was known to be filled with hostile Indians, to the slopes of the Pacific in the Territory of Oregon. That campaign was broken up; and the only reason I have ever known was, that it was thought to be too late for it to start. Provisions had been thrown forward as far as Fort Laramie, and every disposition had been made to render the campaign certain of success. Whenever they start, they will have to start later than the period when the order for that campaign was countermanded.

Among the amendments to the bill which have been suggested, one is to reduce the establishment at the termination of this campaign. I will offer no objection to that, because that is merely referring the question to the wisdom of the future. I have not, in any remarks that I have made, intended to offer any objection to a proposed reduction further than this: I deemed it due to myself to declare that I could not say that I believed, at that time, we could agree to a reduction. If the Senate decide it now, I have no objection to the provision being made now; no more than postponing it to that time. Whenever the time comes that the Army can be reduced, I shall be as ready to vote for its reduction in any form which may be practicable, with our theory of a skeleton peace establishment, as any one. I have no particular objection to the amendment which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] has proposed; though I will say to him, in relation to the additional surgeons, that that does not depend on the size of the Army; it depends on the number of posts. The number of surgeons that may be required will depend on the manner in which the Army is distributed and administered.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

SENATE.

When the four regiments were asked by the last Administration, no increase of the medical staff was asked, because the policy of that Administration was to concentrate the troops into larger bodies, relying for the control of the Indians more on campaigns than posts, and thus to diminish the number of medical officers who would be required, which does not depend on the number of troops, but on the number of parts into which you divide your Army. We now have some forty-two private physicians employed. They are generally employed at remote points, without any possibility of knowing whether they are competent or not; and the soldier, prostrated by disease at a point where he cannot possibly get a physician on private account, is turned over to somebody whom the Department cannot know. That is the present condition. We ask or an increase of fifteen assistant-surgeons, which is only a part of the whole number of private physicians now employed; but by employing those private physicians at recruiting stations and at posts near to cities, it will be possible to avoid the evil which is felt when the necessity occurs of employing a private physician on the Army frontier. It will be economy. You get not only persons of whose competency you have the power to judge, but you get them at a much lower rate than it is possible to hire private physicians.

Looking hopefully forward to the end of all present difficulties, Senators have proposed to fix a time and manner of reducing our military establishment. There are many practicable methods of reduction. I have mentioned one this morning—cutting off a certain number of companies from each regiment, and leaving the regimental organization entire, so as to give the readiest increase in time of war. Reduce the number of companies to eight, which gives you the battalion; our present system being, in a regiment of ten, to call eight battalion companies, and two flank companies; sometimes the two are called light companies; sometimes the two are called one light company and one grenadier company; but the ninth and tenth companies are flank companies; they are not companies of the battalion at all. Our organization is the battalion.

But we have been told that there is not the power to reduce the Army; and why not? The Senator from Texas says it is on account of the graduates of the Military Academy, and that it is necessary even to increase the Army to make places for them. That is a question of figures. The number of graduates did not equal the number of casualties that occurred last year; a number of appointments were made from civil life and one from the ranks of the Army. There were vacancies which occurred in the Army after absorbing the brevets which had been attached to the Army during the previous year, showing that the class of the previous year did not equal the casualties of the year. But have we not power to reduce the Army, and have the young gentlemen educated in the Military Academy such political puissance that the Senate dare not brave them? The officers of the Army, the class in the community that have no vote, thrown out on the frontier so far that if they were to speak their voice would not be heard, how are they to control the action of the Senate? It is a reflection on the Senate, more degrading to it as a body than the depreciatory terms which the Senator applied to the Army. I believe we can, and I believe we will, when we find the interest of the country justifies it, cut down this or any other part of our governmental establishment; and I only wish that the same scrutiny could be applied to other portions of the expenditures of the Government of the United States.

In this connection I believe I did not allude to one point, which I will not at this time press, for I have already consumed too much time. The fact that no small part of the expenditures incurred in connection with our Indian troubles results from the administration of the Indians being under one Department, and the military affairs under another. The Interior Department and the Army are thus brought into conflict on the frontier. The Government pays both the contestants. The Government, through the Interior Department, sends arms and ammunition to the very Indian tribe whom the next month the War Department may send troops to subdue. Thus discontent and distrust arise between the two branches of the public service. The Interior Department sends presents to the Indians, and those Indians receive the presents after they have committed a foray on a settlement, and been chased for hundreds of miles by the troops; and thus they find their Great Father sending them these tokens of peace and good will, notwithstanding their misdeeds. It results from the organization, and it will continue until the control of the Indians is transferred back to the War Department. Then you bring the whole in connection; then a change from the peaceful to the hostile relation does not change the Department with which the Indians bear their connection. Then they will understand, after they have been subdued by force, that they are treating with the same power that subdued them, and their very narrow comprehension will then see that the Government of the United States is one, whereas now it presents itself to their view as divided.

A few remarks now upon the general subject will, I believe, enable me to relieve the Senate. In various phraseology, it has been charged that the Army everywhere is the enemy of liberty, the instrument of despotism. One Senator even arraigned the Executive as wishing to use the Army to subvert the liberty of the country. An old man, who has attained the highest station his country could confer, and that the highest station in the world, rising to it through the beneficial character of our institutions, which has enabled an obscure boy to become the Chief Magistrate of a great people, must now turn, according to this idea of the Senator from New Hampshire, and make war with the Army upon the liberty of the country to which he owes whatever he is—identified with which has been the whole course of his public life; associated with which is his every achievement; and the destruction of which would only save him from oblivion by preserving him for ignominy. What object could he have? His highest ambition, the highest ambition which earth offers, having been attained, he must now seek to crush the very steps by which he has ascended! Can it be so?

But, sir, suppose a Chief Magistrate to be so wicked and so silly as this, how could he use the Army for such purpose? Refugees, to some extent, from other countries, who have come here to enjoy liberty, weary of the despotism of the land in which they were born, and natives of the United States, cradled by mothers who would, themselves, have met a despot if he had come to the threshold of their houses, and with their own feminine arms have repulsed tyranny from the land of their birth—commanded by men who have been selected in their boyhood from the various conditions of the people and sections of our country, educated in the service of the Government, accustomed to look up to it as not only a temple beneath which they found shelter, but to uphold which, in all its beauty and its strength, was the great end and aim of all their earthly ambition—trained to love, to respect, and to follow a flag emblematic of that Union which makes us a confederation of sovereignties, following from year to year, upon a poor pittance which barely sustains life, a profession to which they have been educated and to which they are attached, looking through it only to promotion and that reputation which is to be gained by the peril of their life, if an opportunity should offer, in the cause of their country—educated gentlemen, drawn from every section of the Union, from every condition of life, are suddenly, because they bear commissions and have sworn to sustain the Constitution and to serve their country against all enemies whatsoever, to be converted into the mere instrument which a tyrant may use for the overthrow of the country's liberties. And yet further, sir, these men, such as they are, segregated into little bodies of forty or fifty, or two hundred at a place, thousands of miles apart—he who was born in the South stationed in the North, and he who was born in the North stationed in the South, or he who was born in the South stationed in the land of his birth, and enjoying communion with the people who gave to him his first impressions, and so of him of the North—how are these men, in these little detached handfuls, all over our wide-spread country, to combine against the liberties of the Union?

In this connection, sir, I wish to read a single remark of Mr. Calhoun, for this is not a new subject. I read from a letter of his, addressed to the House of Representatives, December 14, 1818, to be found at page 779 of the State Papers, Military Affairs, volume 1:

"I have not overlooked the maxim that a large standing army is dangerous to the liberty of the country, and that our ultimate reliance for defense ought to be in the militia. Its most zealous advocate must, however, acknowledge that a standing army, to a limited extent, is necessary; and no good reason can be assigned why any should exist but which will equally prove that 'he present is not too large.' To consider the present Army as dangerous to our liberty partakes, it is conceived, more of timidity than wisdom."

He then goes on to speak of the condition and character of the Army. We are told, however, and told truly, that republics have been overthrown by military organizations; but when did such a Republic as ours exist? Is Rome to be compared to this country? Rome is cited as an example to point the future destinies of the United States. Hers was an empire. When she had the name of a republic she was yet but a consolidated empire, with dependent provinces won by conquest, and governed by pro-consuls. Is this to be assimilated to our great family of States, each governing itself, each independent of all others, but all connected together for the common welfare, the common glory, and the general good?

Then we are cited to cases in Europe, where despotism is maintained by standing armies; but suppose the despot had an American army to rely upon, would they be faithless to their first impressions, faithless to the free blood which runs in their veins and which descends from the bold barons of Runnymede? or would he not find when he came to review the line of his army, on every brow set the seal of inborn equality and independence, and would not some private in those ranks thunder in the ear of the despot, like Patrick Henry, the warning of the fate of Caesar and of the fate of Charles?

Is it to be inferred that a man who is a freeman at his birth, who has all the spirit of republicanism in his heart; is to lose it by entering the military profession? Is it true, as the Senator from Texas has told us, that service in the Army stultifies young men? It cannot be. He is a bright example of the reverse himself. It was his proud fortune to rise from the ranks by his own merit to a commissioned officer, to serve in the Army, and there to acquire many of those qualities, endowments, and graces, which have adorned this Chamber. He stands in himself a brilliant example of how little the Army stultifies, and how much it may exalt the youth contained in its ranks.

We have other and great examples. Did Washington become the fit instrument of a despotism? was he stultified because he entered the service of the United States in his youth? That great mind which comprehended the whole condition of the colonies; that heart which beat sympathetically for every portion of his common country, feeling equally for Massachusetts and South Carolina, for New York and Virginia; that great arm which smoothed the thorny path of revolution, and led the colonies from rational liberty up to national independence, and laid the foundation of that prosperity and greatness which have made us a people, not only an example for the whole world, but a protection to liberal principles wherever liberty asserts a right—was he stultified by service in the Army? Jackson too, the indomitable Jackson, who when a boy and a captive spurned the insult of a despot, and for asserting his personal dignity received a wound, the scar of which he carried to his grave—was he by service in the Army when yet a minor, by brilliant exploits in middle age, rendered the fit instrument of despotism? If it be said these were men drawn from the pursuits of civil life and only occasionally employed in the military service, what, then, shall be said of the great, the good, the heroic Taylor? for a hero he was, not in the mere vulgar sense of animal courage, but by the higher and nobler attributes of generosity and clemency. His was an eye that looked unquailing when the messengers of death were flying around him; but in the ward-room, over his wounded comrade, was dimmed by the tear of a soldier's love and compassion. His was a self-reliant, resolute heart, which rose under accumulated difficulties, and hardened by contact with danger; but that heart melted to a woman's softness at the wail of the helpless or the appeal of the vanquished. He was a hero, a moral hero. His heart was his country's, and his life had been his country's own through all its stages. Was he the fit instrument of a despot to be used for the overthrow of the liberties of the United States?

Shall I prove my proposition by going on and multiplying examples; or is it not apparent that whatever may be true of the history of Rome, whatever may be true of the condition of Europe, the United States stands out its own founder and its own example? No other people like our own ever founded a State. No other people like our own have ever thus elevated a State to such greatness in so small a space of time. If there be evidence of decay, that decay is not to be found in the spirit of your little Army, but is to be hunted for in the impurities of your politicians. It therefore does not become the politician to point to our little and gallant and devoted Army, as the incipient danger which is to overthrow the liberties of this country.

If I have succeeded, Mr. President, in impressing upon Senators the principal truths I have endeavored to advance, I have succeeded in showing that the plan of increase which we propose is the most economical and efficient within our reach. If their judgment, however, shall decide otherwise, I then have performed my duty. I have argued this question earnestly because I am thoroughly convinced of the advantages of the bill which is before us. If I am in error it is fortunate for me that the majority of the Senate will correct it. If I am right, the future will sustain my opinion, even though it be now overruled. I am, therefore, content with whatever fortune may befall the bill.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

SPEECH OF HON. S. M. BURROUGHS,

OF NEW YORK.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 23, 1858.

[WRITTEN OUT BY HIMSELF.*]

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BURROUGHS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is with a good deal of diffidence and embarrassment that I rise now to address the committee, because I have seen a number of gentlemen on my side of the House attempting in vain, within the last twenty-five or thirty days, to obtain the floor—gentlemen who would have discussed the question which I propose to consider with much more ability than I can hope to bring to the subject. Still, I entertain the hope that some points pertinent to the question may be found in the suggestions which I have to make, and will proceed to the question.

Sir, I have felt myself exceedingly mortified, from time to time, in this House, at the remarks that have been made on the left side of the Hall, to the effect that the Republican party was a sectional party. We have not unfrequently been charged with the grossest selfishness. We have been repeatedly charged with having attempted to carry measures which were calculated to break the last ties which bind together the States of this Union.

The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] in his speech some days ago, gave utterance to this sentiment, and several other speeches from his side of the House have reiterated the sentiment. It would seem that their love of the Union is exhausted, and that their patriotic devotion has fled forever.

Sir, from my earliest days I have learned to love this Union. I have learned that it was my first duty as an American and as a citizen, if need be, to lay down my life for the Union and our liberties, purchased at the cost of so much blood and treasure; and I had hoped that the ties which bound us together, and which taught us the great doctrine of brotherly love and fraternity, would not so soon have been forgotten by Americans. I believe, sir, that the union of these States is demanded by every consideration of interest, patriotism, and historic renown; and if gentlemen, who seem just now discontented with their position in the Union, will consult our past history, they will find abundant examples of high patriotism and noble magnanimity in the conduct of the northern portion of the Confederacy.

It is part of my purpose this morning to introduce some few reasons here to satisfy those gentlemen that they ought to take back these unjust charges of "sectionalism and injustice." I shall endeavor to show that the country which we possess was purchased by the blood and treasure of the whole people, and should be distributed with reference to the wants, prosperity, and happiness of all. It is a cardinal doctrine of our Government, lying at its very foundation and constituting the soul of its vitality, that it shall be so administered as to "promote the greatest good of the greatest number." This, sir, is Democratic doctrine. Yes, sir, it is Democratic doctrine as our fathers taught it. It is the doctrine for which our fathers fought, and it is the doctrine by which, I hope, the Republic of America will ever stand.

Now, sir, let us look into this subject. We have at the North a population of something over thirteen million, most of them white men; you have at the South, gentlemen, but a little over six million white men. I do not take slaves into account, because they have been denominated property. You have, in the fifteen slave States, eight hundred and thirty-eight thousand square miles of land; we have, in fifteen free States, four hundred and forty-seven thousand nine hundred and ninety square miles of land. We have got more than double your population, but we have got less than half the amount of land that you possess. I tell gentlemen that this is not a sectional question. It is simply a question whether we shall have homes for our children; and I propose to address myself to that view of it. You have in the South, or had in 1850, a population of six million four hundred and twelve thousand six hundred and five; we have in the North, or had in 1850, a population of thirteen million three hundred and forty-two thousand and eighty-nine. I say nothing about the slaves. You, gentlemen, have your negroes who till and cultivate your soil; but we have our cattle upon a thousand hills, and an industrious yeomanry. I propose now to ask who paid for the land we have, and how we came by it, and what would be a fair, honest, and equitable division of it? Why, sir, I recollect that that little strip of land upon your southern coast, Florida, was bought at an expense of something over three million dollars, if not over five million. You recollect, also, that we purchased Louisiana at a cost of $15,000,000, besides what we have paid for the extinction of Indian titles. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER,] who spoke the other day, and who is one of those who made this charge of sectionalism and injustice, lives in a State upon which we have expended untold millions—yes, sir, and northern blood, too—in her Indian wars. I hope the gentleman will be magnanimous enough, when he looks into the facts, to take back the charge of sectionalism and bad faith. We profess to be friends of the Union, and friends of every human being in the Union, black as well as white; and we do not like to be charged with bad faith and illiberality and injustice.

But again: we got into a war about Texas. Do gentlemen know how we got into that difficulty? We admitted Texas into the Union, and took upon ourselves the war with Mexico; and in carrying on that war we expended nearly two hundred million dollars, to say nothing of the precious blood which men of the North and men of the South shed upon the battle-fields of Mexico. All the wars in which this country has been engaged for the last twenty-five years have been on our southern frontier and in Mexico; and I beg gentlemen to remember that it costs, in times of peace, about twenty-five million dollars to support our Army, which is almost wholly occupied in their defense and protection.

The Black Hawk war of 1832 was attended with but trifling cost. Since that period, the expense of sustaining our Army has been about six hundred million dollars; and this enormous sum has been expended almost exclusively for the protection of our southern frontier. If gentlemen will take the pains to examine into the subject, they will find that since the purchase of Florida we have expended on the purchase of lands from foreign Governments, from Indians by treaty, and in various other modes of expense, over eight hundred million dollars—a sum which would purchase some of the States of this Union, with all the property within them, real and personal.

Now, sir, I propose, in a spirit of kindness, to ask gentlemen who make this charge of sectionalism against us, to tell us where this money—this eight hundred millions—came from? Where did the money come from? I have facts and figures here to satisfy any gentleman where it came from. Look to the importing and tax-paying States of this Confederacy. In the State of New York we have a population of over three million, nearly half as much as the population of the whole southern States.

Sir, I have not time to-day to present the careful calculations by which I arrive at the fact that the northern fifteen States of this Confederacy have paid three fourths of the entire amount expended for the purchase of these lands, and in sustaining the Mexican, southern border, and Indian wars. Six hundred million dollars have been paid in the form of indirect taxes for these purposes. I make this now simply as a general statement; and tell gentlemen that if they doubt the correctness of the statement, I will, at a future time, present the facts and estimates in careful detail.

Well, sir, I now come here with the complaint that the northern States have not quite half the territory you of the southern States have; and I say further that our land is not as good as yours. I know it, for I have been upon your southern soil; I have been over most of the States of this Union, and gathered the means of forming a correct opinion, and believe that, with the exception of the mountain ranges of the South, you have much better lands than we possess. You have a genial climate—ten thousand fields of beauty, surpassing the valley of the Mediterranean in fruitfulness, richer than the fabled gardens of Hesperides or the Paradise of Sardis; and yet you would deny to us Kansas, and call us sectional and selfish and aggressive, if we do not yield to your demands. This we can never do. Our interest is against it. The voice of the rising generation against it demands our attention, and our honor forbids that we should suffer a country to be wrested from us, long since recognized as rightfully ours, and decreed as our inheritance forever by the most solemn compact which our fathers could make.

But I do not propose just to dwell upon Kansas, but will mention one other reason why we cannot surrender it to slavery, and drive away northern freemen from their own rightful country. We have paid for it, and we claim Kansas as our country upon high grounds of justice and equity—upon the ground that the North is entitled to a fair portion of the lands of the country, as the separate inheritance of freemen; and this because the white man must be paid for his labor, must be rewarded for his toil, and cannot live in the same community with the unpaid negro slave.

I need not make an argument to prove that slave labor, being cheaper, crowds out the laborer who has social and domestic wants to supply, which cannot be attained at the cost of negro slave labor.

It is the rightful ambition of northern men to have homes of their own—good homes—and to be surrounded by all the institutions of religion, learning, and moral elevation, which are possessed at the North. A gentleman from Mississippi, not now in his seat, [Mr. LAMAR,] a few days ago,

Kansas Affairs—Mr. Burroughs.

HO. OF REPS.

uttered a sentiment which I feel at liberty to notice. I read from his speech:

And the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GARTRELL,] following in the same track, attempted to bring to our notice all the patriarchal sanctions and glories of slavery; and not satisfied with resting the question upon its mere ground of civilization, went into the consideration of patriarchal usage. He said that the time had gone by for making apologies for slavery; that the time had come for defending it upon high grounds. I listened to his remarks with pleasure, and I have ever since felt to appreciate the ability, the skill, and the genius with which he managed the subject. I was pleased with his speech for its frank and manly tone: he went back to earlier times to find arguments and a foundation for the peculiar institution which exists in the South—he might have found examples, also, of another institution, which exists in Utah Territory. But we live in an age when we have in some portion of the country been led to cultivate a different degree of civilization. I do not propose, in running a parallel between northern and southern civilization, to offend the most sensitive feelings of any man. I introduce it simply for the purpose of illustration, and in order that gentlemen looking over the subject candidly may see whether our views deserve their consideration; whether we are right or wrong. Not intending to go over the whole field, (I find myself with a mass of figures, which I shall not be able to present to-day,) I shall bring only a few facts to the notice of the House. When the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GARTRELL] addressed the House about the patriarchal institution, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR,] in reference to those existing at the South, as presenting the highest form of civilization known to modern times, I felt called upon, as a student of civilization, to look into the facts and ascertain the basis upon which they rest that high claim.

I took the census report of 1850, and I beg the attention of gentlemen while I introduce a few facts, and ask gentlemen themselves to mark the contrast.

I desire to call the attention of the House first to public schools. The district represented by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GARTRELL] has one hundred and eighty-eight public schools, one hundred and eighty-nine teachers, and five thousand five hundred pupils. In the counties which compose my district we have three hundred and six public schools, three hundred and seventy-five teachers, and nineteen thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight pupils. This, in my poor judgment, is some evidence of the comparative civilization of our respective districts.

Now let us turn our attention to the district of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] in that district there are one hundred and forty-four public schools, one hundred and forty-seven teachers, and two thousand nine hundred and sixty-six pupils. I have already told you how many of each my district contained—I refer, of course, to the public schools as classified in the census report.

I next turned my attention to another item—school libraries, not libraries in academies and colleges, but school libraries; accessible to all the people. In my district there are two hundred and eighty-five school libraries, containing thirty-six thousand three hundred and twenty volumes. In the district of the gentleman from Georgia there is one school library only, containing five hundred volumes. In the Mississippi district referred to, not one library of this class.

Again: 1, in the next place, looked a little to the value of church property in the respective districts. The total value of church property in the district of the gentleman from Mississippi, is $118,285; in that of the gentleman from Georgia, $127,520; and in my own district, $276,850. In one county of Mississippi, constituting a part of the gentleman's district, I found but one single church, which church was worth one hundred dollars. This county, (Tunica,) has a population of three hundred and ninety-six whites, and nine hundred and seventeen slaves.

Running this parallel a little further, I propose to call the attention of gentlemen to some other facts.

Mr. QUITMAN. Will the gentleman from New York state what district in Mississippi he refers to?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I do not know the number of the district. It is that represented by the learned and eloquent gentleman on my left, [Mr. LAMAR,] who addressed the committee a few days ago.

Mr. QUITMAN. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, I will state, for the correction of the statistics, that in our section of the country we act individually; and I will venture to say, that if the gentleman and myself occupy seats on this floor at the next session of Congress, I can show him then that there are more books in the libraries of private individuals, in my district, than there are in those of private individuals in his district.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I cannot extend any more of my time to the gentleman, though no one respects him more than I do. I wish, sir, that the gentleman could point me to libraries for the use of the people.

I have already given the number of the white population of the fifteen southern States. The slave population is three million two hundred thousand. The number of public schools in the fifteen southern States I find to be nineteen thousand four hundred and eighty-eight. In my own State alone the number is ten thousand eight hundred and two. The number of persons—native white population—in the fifteen slave States who cannot read and write is five hundred and sixty-eight thousand two hundred and forty-eight. The number of native population in the fifteen free States who cannot read and write is two hundred and seventy-eight thousand three hundred and seventy-five.

Now, passing these figures, I desire to call the attention of the committee for a moment to some other facts; and in passing, I wish to make a reference to the State of Texas. I hold in my hand a paper characterized certainly by very great simplicity of language, and no doubt entitled to receive the consideration of every member of the House. Here is a State which came into the Union in 1844.

Mr. REAGAN. In 1846.

Mr. BURROUGHS. In 1846. I had 1844 in my mind, because I recollect very well that I labored on the stump for "Polk and Texas" that year. I expected, when Texas came into this Union, that she would have had the kindness to bear with our section of the Union a little. Twelve years ago, when Texas was young, and needed our help, we bought her lands and fought her battles; but now she has grown to be a Hercules, and says that, unless we admit slavery into Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, she will not live with us any longer. That would be a nice speculation for her, to get us to expend $200,000,000 on her account, and then to back out of the Union, and complain of our sectionalism and selfishness. Here, sir, is an example of gratitude! magnanimity! without a parallel in history—without a parallel among the nations of the world, Christian or savage.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I would be glad to oblige the gentleman, but I cannot yield. I have no time to spare. Texas, I was going on to say, has passed resolutions; I will not say they are defiant, I will not say they are threatening, I will not say that Texas will not come down on us with an avalanche of some sort, if we do not admit Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. Texas will do—I know not what. Certainly, she has adopted resolutions, and is going to be represented in the southern convention (if held.) What that southern convention is to do, I do not know.

I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to have made a long speech to-day; but at the hazard of wanting time for other points which I wish to present, I must refer to these Texas resolutions; and trust to the magnanimity of gentlemen to extend my time as I was happy to do in the case of the gentleman who preceded me, [Mr. CLEMENS.] I intended to present some few facts on which to base the justice of our cause. I intended to present these few facts, and to claim for them magnanimous consideration. We have got twice the amount of population that you have, and have got but half the quantity of land. This land was bought by the common treasure, North and South; and it should be fairly divided. I might rather say that the earth belongs to the people on it; and that no one section has a right to monopolize and keep it to the exclusion of every other class. You have in the single State of Texas territory equal to six times that of the State of New York. On that territory you can support no less than fifteen million human beings. You have got there territory large enough for four States, on which there are comparatively no white settlements; and yet you now stand in your place in the halls of your Legislature and say that you cannot live in the Union with the North unless we consent to let Kansas come in as a slave State.

I cannot make any comment on this. It does not tally with my notions of justice and propriety, and I believe that when you come back to the sober second thought you will agree with us in our opinion, and you will say that we are entitled to these lands in Kansas.

"Proceedings of the Democratic State Convention.

"Austin, Texas, January 8, 1858.

"On motion of Colonel L. T. Wigfall, the following platform was adopted:

"Resolved, That the Democratic party of the State of Texas heartily concur in, and unanimously reaffirm, the principles of the Democratic party of the Union and the Constitution, as embodied in the platform of the national Democratic convention, held in Cincinnati, in June, 1856, and the State convention of Texas, at Waco, on the 4th of May, 1857, as a true expression of their political faith and opinion, believing them to embrace the only doctrines which can preserve the integrity of the Union and the equal rights of the States.

"Resolved, That recent events in the United States Senate create in our minds a serious apprehension that the great doctrine of non-intervention, as set forth in that platform, is in danger of being repudiated by Congress through the instrumentality of members of the national Democratic party, distinguished alike for their political influence over the public sentiment of the North, and their past declarations in favor of said doctrine; and that we now consider it our duty to set forth to the country the course that we shall be compelled to take in that serious and deplorable emergency.

"Resolved, That we request the representatives of the people of Texas, in Legislature assembled, to provide, at the present session, for the Executive of the State appointing suitable delegates to a convention of the southern States, which may be hereafter assembled for the purpose of consultation and advice for the general welfare of the institutions of the South.

"Mr. Brown offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the chairman appoint one member from each judicial district as members of the State Democratic committee.

"Pending which, the convention, on motion of Mr. Britton, adjourned to Monday, three o'clock, p. m."

"MONDAY, three o'clock, p. m.

"Convention met—roll called—quorum present.

"The Chair announced that the question before the convention was the motion of Mr. Brown appointing the State Democratic committee.

"Mr. Rainey moved to amend by adding, 'the chairman of which shall reside in the city of Austin.' Adopted.

"Mr. ——— moved that each judicial district meet and designate the name of the party they wish to act for their respective districts; which motion, it was moved, should lie on the table; but the president informing the convention that he wished that course pursued, it was adopted.

"General T. J. Chambers offered the following resolution:

"Be it resolved by the Democratic Convention of Texas, now assembled in the Capitol of the State, That whereas, the integral parts of the Federal Government of the United States of America, are free, independent, and sovereign States, which, for special purposes, have delegated to that Government a portion of their sovereignty, reserving to themselves, or to the people, all rights and powers not specially delegated; and whereas, one of the reserved rights is that of resuming the power delegated to that Government whenever they may be perverted to the injury or oppression of any of the States, or whenever any of the States may consider that their happiness, their prosperity, or their safety may require it; and whereas, that Government, in the admission of new States, has no power to interfere in any manner with the domestic institutions or internal organization of such States, except to guaranty to them a republican form of Government; and whereas, the people of Kansas have formed and adopted a State constitution, securing to themselves and to their posterity the blessings of a republican form of government, with the domestic institution of slavery; therefore this convention solemnly declares that any action upon the part of the Congress of the United States tending to embarrass, delay, and defeat the admission of that new State as a member of the American Union, under any pretext whatever, referable to the question of slavery, would be a usurpation of power, and a violation of the compact of the Union; and in such event, our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, are requested to give notice of our intention to take the necessary step to prepare the free, independent, and sovereign State of Texas to resume the powers delegated by it to the General Government, and to withdraw from the Union, as being no longer productive of the great objects for which it was established; and we invite our sister States, attached to the benign domestic institution of slavery, to join with us in this important measure, so that we may present to the enemies of our institutions an unbroken and defiant front, and thus secure our safety, our liberties, and our independence, by prompt and united action.

"Be it further resolved, That the president and secretary of this convention be instructed to communicate these resolutions to the legislative and executive departments of each of the States of the American Union, and to the President and Congress of the United States.

"On motion, the convention adjourned until eight o'clock, p. m."

I have not time to read these Texas resolutions; but I will have them printed in connection with my speech. If I had time, I would say something about Kansas, as a justification for myself and for every northern man who votes against and opposes the admission of Kansas into the Union as a slave State.

A gentleman now in my eye has several times asked members on my side of the House whether they would vote to admit Kansas as a slave State, if it was well ascertained that a majority of her people were in favor of slave institutions. I can answer that question without any difficulty. I would not vote to admit Kansas as a slave State under any possible circumstances; and I place my justification on the ground that that country belongs to the North. Slavery has got all the genial climate of the United States, and by what right? There is hardly a non-slaveholding State where we can settle and find a genial climate. Will you allow us no spot for our invalids, for our consumptives? Perhaps you will point us to Cuba for relief; but if it were ours you would insist upon establishing your "institution" there also.

Now, I want to say here to gentlemen from Missouri—and I want them to recollect it, and carry the fact home to their constituents—that, if the people of that State would give away every negro they have got to-day, and adopt a free constitution, they would enhance the value of their lands thirty per cent. within two years. If you are successful in making Kansas a slave State, we shall look upon it as depriving us of the only country which has a genial climate suitable for northern labor.

Now, I need not tell you that northern men do not like your sensitive property. They are seriously prejudiced against it, and cannot help it. We cannot settle in a country where this "sensitive property" is allowed to exist. And here let me, in this rambling way, ask the gentleman from South Carolina to remember that some of our people would like to settle in his State; but not in that part where you may travel five, ten, and fifteen miles, among the sand-hills, and not find a man or a woman who can read and write. Northern men do not like institutions productive of such civilization.

Mr. McQUEEN. If the gentleman will allow me I will say to him, that I would rather have the lowest of them than the Mormons and many others educated, probably, in the public schools of which he boasts so much in his own State.

Mr. BURROUGHS. The gentleman must excuse me; but I cannot give him any portion of my time. I have no doubt the gentleman has his preference, but he must pay some respect to his twin sister—that "twin relic."

But, sir, besides these grounds of justice and equity upon which I put this question, the manner in which this Kansas affair has been managed from the start must be taken into consideration. I think I might well claim and insist that, from the beginning to the end of this whole Kansas matter, there has been committed a series of frauds and violence such as have never been seen in any civilized country upon the globe. This is a broad assertion, sir; but I make the charge. I charge it, because I believe it. I charge that Franklin Pierce, from the commencement of his administration, in connection with this Kansas matter, acted upon a system of fraud and villainy, and I believe that James Buchanan is following up the same track, and has "out-Heroded Herod."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. I consider such language unworthy the place that the gentleman occupies. To denounce a coördinate branch of this Government I hold to be out of order. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" and laughter.]

Mr. BURROUGHS. I hope I shall not be interrupted in this way. The gentleman and I differ in opinion, no doubt, upon some subjects. Sir, it would be a source of the highest pride and greatest gratification to me if I could stand here in my place to-day and say that I honored the President as the President of the Union. I should be glad if I could stand here to-day and say that I approved his acts. I should be glad if I could say, as I could at the close of the eight years of General Jackson's administration, that I honored and approved everything that he had done. I feel humiliated before God and my country that I am obliged on the floor of Congress to denounce the President.

If my time would permit, I should introduce facts known to all men, upon which to rest this charge against the Government—facts which go to prove the statement which I have made. They will be presented in a few days, I doubt not, by the committee appointed to investigate the subject; and I shall for a moment call the attention of northern Democrats to the fate of some northern men who occupied seats here in 1820—who voted to admit Missouri as a slave State; though its way into the Union was not strewn with murdered victims and attended by civil war. She came not by blood and carnage, as crimsoned Kansas, but was led in her bridal-robe, in times of peace, to the altar of the Union, by recreant men. To them her touch was that of the leper; they fell; died—politically died—and sank to a depth beyond the power of a second resurrection. This was a deserved fate, because they had disregarded the interests and will of those they represented.

Let me call the attention of northern gentlemen for a moment to their position as Representatives, and to the true representative principle? Suppose that a gentleman from the North is elected by a constituency that is nearly equally divided, and takes his seat here by virtue of the Governor's certificate: what is his position here? Is he at liberty to disregard the will of his constituents, and vote against their interests, because he has been sent here by some accidental majority? No, sir; I deny it. I maintain—and I put it to the consciences of gentlemen representing northern constituencies—I maintain and insist that it is their duty, when they record their votes here, to consult the interests, the rights, and the future well-being of every man, woman, and child in their districts; and the man who falls short of this fails to discharge his duty to the country.

I know some of you gentlemen as lovers of justice, lovers of your country, lovers of your neighbors. The gentleman who occupies a seat across the aisle, [Mr. WARD]—how will he justify himself to his neighbors, his friends, and his own posterity, for a vote admitting Kansas into the Union as a slave State? I counsel him that the day is not far off when his own children will turn away their faces from the record, and would blot it out with their tears.

I see upon the other side of the House a neighbor of mine, [Mr. HATCH], whose vote, I know, was counted upon in favor of freedom; and permit me to address to him a few observations. A few days ago, in this Hall, the gentleman boasted that he had a larger foreign constituency than perhaps any man in Congress. What are your constituents doing? You will tell me, perhaps, that they are digging your wells and cellars, carrying your hods, and building your stores. What will their children do, twenty-five or fifty years from now? That is a pertinent question. There will not be room and employment for them and their children in your city? Where will they go to find homes? If the gentleman permits slavery to spread itself over the whole of the northern Territories, they will find no homes there. I can point the gentleman to hundreds in his district to-day, who, perhaps, thirty years hence, will be walking over the fields of Kansas, to see there probably the richest soil in the world, but to find, perhaps, that country occupied by an institution which crowds out northern free labor. I can point the gentleman to hundreds in his district who, fifty years hence, in walking over those beautiful fields, will say, "if my father had not voted for a Democratic Representative from Buffalo, and given him a seat in Congress, these fields would have been mine; but here is no home for freemen; no home for my countrymen."

Now, I ask of no man here anything which is not entirely in keeping with justice, and in accordance with high equity. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER], the other day, said that we placed upon them, in 1820, the burning mark of inferiority. That is not so. The position of the South is every way equal in advantages with us. Our northern men will not settle in a country where slavery exists. I need not make an argument to prove this. On the other hand, gentlemen cannot prove to us that southern men will not go into free territory. I remember facts which I may safely address to you. Go to the State of Illinois, and you will find not less than thirty-five thousand of her inhabitants were originally from either Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, South Carolina, or far off Georgia. They will go to free territory and settle there, if you will permit them. As representatives of the South, if you would consult the interests of a large portion of your people, you will help to make Kansas a free State, and thereby promote the greatest possible good of the citizens of the South who would gladly find homes there.

I regret to have said anything in the course of my remarks which should wound the sensibilities of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH]; but I could not refrain from expressing the true sentiments I entertained in regard to the course of the President of the United States. I know there was a time when it was unlawful to say anything against the King; I know there was a time in England when penalties and chains were visited upon the man who dared to speak against the King—the Tower of London has contained many such. I know there was a time in America when a law was proposed, making it an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment to speak disrespectfully of the President. Now, sir, if such a law was in force at the present day, half our freemen would be in prison or exile. I should be obliged to find refuge, some secure spot in Canada, or in the southern islands, because of the language I have used in regard to the President, or become the tenant of a Democratic jail. I would accord to every man due respect. I yield to no man in the observance of the amenities of social intercourse. But, sir, some things are beyond the range of politeness—beyond the reach of charity—standing out in such huge, monstrous, and damning deformity, that it would be a crime to palliate. When I am asked to call the President of the United States an honest man, I must falter. When I am asked to say that he has conducted himself before the people, with respect to this Kansas matter, as a prudent and candid man, I must decline.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What I said when I rose to a question of order was, I trust, founded in proper sentiment of feeling. It is the policy of the Government for all of its branches to indulge in language of courtesy and respect towards each other, and the rules of this House prescribe it in reference to one branch. When I heard the gentleman from New York—a traveled gentleman, as he tells us—get up and denounce a coördinate branch of the Government, I did feel a degree of indignation for the moment which I could not repress. I may regret that I expressed myself so strongly, but I more regret that the gentleman should have used such bitter language towards the President of the United States.

Mr. BURROUGHS. No doubt, sir, I might learn much of the gentleman, who is my senior; I shall give good attention to his suggestions upon all questions of courtesy and politeness; but, sir, I had asserted a fact, and now under leave of the House, I will proceed to suggest the proofs upon which that assertion rests.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether he does not demand a corresponding respect from other branches of the Government towards this body, which they demand from us?

[Here several voices were heard—"His time is up!" "His time is up!" and from all parts of the House numerous cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I insist upon the rule—

[And the hammer fell.]

35TH CONG....1ST SESS. Conflict between Religious Truth and American Infidelity—Mr. Giddings. Ho. of Reps.THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RELIGIOUS TRUTH AND AMERICAN INFIDELITY.

SPEECH OF HON. J. R. GIDDINGS, OF OHIO,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 26, 1858,

Upon the great issue of freedom or slavery pending before the American people.

[WRITTEN OUT BY HIMSELF.*]

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. GIDDINGS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Questions of mere economy, those which relate to banks, to internal improvements, or protective tariffs, no longer occupy the public mind. These subjects have given place to questions of more transcendent importance, to those which relate to the rights of mankind, to the religious, moral, and political elevation of our race. The discussion of these subjects has in all past time been attended with agitation and excitement. It brings the rights of the people into conflict with despotism, whatever may be the form of government under which the discussion takes place. Such is now the condition of this mighty nation; our Union is shaken to its very center by the agitation of great and undying truths. Our Government is vibrating between freedom and tyranny, and it becomes us thoroughly to examine the religious basis on which we found our political action.

The late message of the President in relation to Kansas is without precedent in the history of executive communications to this body. Its tone of contempt for the people of that Territory finds no precedent in our Government; while the language of the people of Kansas, expressed by her Legislature, is most extraordinary for sovereigns to use towards a servant already arraigned before the tribunal of the popular mind for high crimes and misdemeanors.

Under these circumstances, I have thought that the best service I can render the people on the present occasion would be to analyze the subject which now absorbs the popular mind; and, so far as able, to define the issue now pending before the nation.

That issue is founded upon fundamental religious truths, which are maintained by one political party and denied by the other.

Immediately after the last Congress adjourned, the men who wield the judicial and executive powers of Government publicly denied the great primal doctrine of our Government, "that all men are endowed by their Creator with inherent, equal, and inalienable rights." They essayed to obliterate the line of demarkation drawn by our patriot fathers between the despotisms of a darker age, and the rights of mankind as understood in this nineteenth century.

The annual message of the President, in its leading positions and in its details, wholly disregards those rights of human nature, and speaks of men created in the image of God, with undying spirits, with eternal destinies, as transformed into property, in direct contradiction of those truths which the American people have long regarded as "self-evident."

It will be my object to render this issue more distinctly obvious. Its importance is transcendent; and, however fully other gentlemen may have appreciated it, I feel constrained to admit that I have failed to comprehend its vastness, or set bounds to the consequences naturally resulting from its decision; yet every member of society is bound to examine and to act upon his own responsibility.

Our fathers, recognizing God as the author of human life, proclaimed it a "self-evident" truth that every human being holds from the Creator an inalienable right to live, to sustain and protect life, attain knowledge, elevate his moral nature, and enjoy happiness.

These prerogatives were recognized as "gifts of God," lying behind and above human legislation; and the founders of our institutions proceeded to declare that governments are instituted among men to secure their enjoyment. Thus our Republic was founded on religious truth, and it was thus far emphatically a religious Government. It has ever been sustained by the religious sentiment of the nation; and it will only fail when this element shall be discarded by the people. The attempt now made to overthrow these religious truths demands the severest condemnation.

There are but few men who openly deny the existence of a Supreme Being, or that He is clothed with the attributes of infinite wisdom, truth, and justice; or that men are religious in degree as they bring themselves into harmony with those divine qualities, make them their own, and assimilate their characters to that of Deity. This is the sense in which I use the term "religion." I do not speak as a sectarian. Indeed, sectarians do not regard membership as religion, but merely as the evidence of religious feeling on the part of the individual. All admit that those who are wise, truthful, just, and pure, of all denominations, and men who, possessing these attributes, belong to no particular sect, are the truly religious men of earth.

I will here remark that I am conscious this examination of the religious character of our Government will subject me to the criticisms of all who deny the existence of man's inalienable rights: they will insist that an examination of the religious character of our institutions is unsuited to this forum; that laymen should not tread on this holy ground; but I assert, if there be a place on earth where religion, where wisdom and truth and justice and purity of purpose, should be observed and practiced, this Hall constitutes that place. If there be a class of men on earth who ought to be religious, who ought to be wise and truthful and just and pure of purpose, the members of this body ought to sustain that character.

I repeat, we all acknowledge the existence of a Supreme Being; that he is the Creator; that we are brought into life by His will. At this point, the American people separate into two great parties—one holding that sovereignty dwells alone with the Creator, and not with men; that kings, potentates, and all human governments, are subjected to the "higher law" of the Creator, and authorized to legislate only for the protection of the rights which God has conferred on mankind. Another portion deny the existence of this "higher law," and insist upon the perfect and unlimited sovereignty of human Governments over the lives and liberties of the people. To be more explicit on this point, I will remark that the religious portion hold, that, as God gave life to the human race, He conferred on each a right to that liberty which is necessary to become wise, truthful, just, and pure; to bring himself into harmony with the law of God, and enjoy the happiness resulting therefrom; that these rights are equally self-evident as the existence of our race; that they are inherent, inalienable, and common to all men; that they constitute the great moral ligament which binds man to his Creator, connects earth with heaven, and unites the human race in one common brotherhood, bound by the most sacred obligations to love, revere, and obey our Universal Father. Of the possession of these rights every sentient being is conscious. When God created man, and breathed into him the breath of life, when man became a living soul, this consciousness formed a part of his moral nature; and never, in any age or in any climate, has man, even in his rudest, his most barbarous state, been unconscious of his right to live, to nourish, and protect life, and seek his own happiness.

These rights constitute an element of the human soul; they cannot be alienated by the individual; nor can any association of men, or any earthly power, separate the humblest of the human race from them. Men may rob their fellow-man of the food which he gathers for his own support; they may deprive him of the power of self-defense; they may bind his limbs and scourge his body; they may prevent him from attaining knowledge; but his right to the food which he gathers, to defend his person, to attain knowledge, will remain unchanged. Their crimes will in no degree affect his right.

This relation of man to the Creator is repudiated by a portion of the American people. They deny that we hold any inalienable rights from God. They deny that the right to live, to protect life, and to attain moral elevation and happiness, is derived from Heaven, or is superior to human enactments. The denial of these fundamental religious truths I can characterize by no other term than "American infidelity." This issue literally separates the religious from the infidel portion of our people. In using this language, I do not seek to cast opprobrium upon those who honestly disbelieve the religious truths which Jefferson and Adams and Franklin and their associates termed "self-evident." I have no unkind feeling towards them. I regard them as brethren, entitled to my best wishes, my earnest prayers; and I apply the term "infidel" to them as the only expression by which I can characterize them as a class.

The outworking of this great primal issue is witnessed in almost every important question that comes before Congress. One portion of the members adhere to the central proposition, that man holds natural and inalienable rights from the Creator, which are not to be invaded by human enactments; that they cannot be violated except by incurring the penalties of that law which was ordained by Him who bestowed them upon our race; that every individual who invades these rights of his fellow-man is guilty of crime, and should be punished accordingly; that all human enactments professing to authorize the invasion of these rights are outside the just powers of human governments, are impious invasions of God's prerogatives, are despotic in their character, impose no moral obligation upon any individual, but involve those who enact and those who support them in the same degree of guilt with those who perpetrate the crimes; that such statutes can in no degree modify the moral guilt of those who trample upon the rights which God has bestowed upon their fellow-men. The other portion of the American people, maintaining a corresponding infidelity, deny the existence of these rights, deny that God has bestowed them upon mankind; they claim unlimited sovereignty for human governments over human rights.

But I desire to call attention to some of those specific rights which are included in the general proposition. Christians and patriots hold life to be the gift of God. They regard it sacred; they look upon its invasion as a crime; that, as the Creator bestows existence upon those who bear His image, it becomes the duty of individuals, of associations, and of governments, to protect each and every human being in the enjoyment of life; that at this point human legislation commences, limited in its appropriate powers to the protection of life, and not to its destruction; that human governments hold no other rightful powers in regard to life than to protect its enjoyment; that the execution of pirates and murderers, and those who invade our country, is allowed only for the purpose of protecting society; that these powers are ordained of God, sanctioned by religion, by philosophy, by the common sense of mankind. They believe that that command which was proclaimed from Sinai in tones of thunder, saying to every human being, "Thou shalt not kill," was truly the voice of God; that it is repeated in all His works and in every revelation of Himself, and is binding on all our race. This commandment of God, this entire doctrine, is denied by the President and by all American infidels: And this constitutes the first collateral issue.

In our slaveholding communities enactments have been passed, and are now supported, professing to authorize masters to murder their slaves. For instance, in those States the slave is denied the right of self-defense; the right to protect his life or his person. If he attempt to defend himself against the master, the master is authorized to slay him in any manner he may be able; if he run from the master, after being ordered to stop, the master is authorized to shoot him; if he die under the scourge, the master is not held responsible. American infidels believe that no moral turpitude attaches to these statutory murders; while Christians hold that God's moral law remains unchanged by such enactments; that the guilt of the murderer is in no degree modified by such statutes; that the perpetrator stands unveiled before God and all good men, guilty as he would be if no such laws existed; that all who enact, and all who support such enactments, make themselves accessory to the crimes committed under them, are guilty as such, and ought to be subjected to the same punishment with those who murder their slaves.

But this power of the master over the life of the slave constitutes the vital element of the institution, without which slavery could not exist. It is exercised wherever slavery is maintained. Every master exercises the privilege of driving his slave, in sickness or in health, just so severely as he thinks will best subserve his own interests. It is on this principle that slaveholders openly declare it profitable to work their slaves so hard as to produce the death of the whole gang on an average of five years upon sugar plantations, and of seven upon cotton plantations; and to supply their places by other victims imported from the slave-breeding States. From official documents, it is estimated that thirty thousand human victims are thus sacrificed annually within the United States and Territories.

In the slave States it is not uncommon to see advertisements in the public papers offering a bounty for the head of a particular slave, who has absconded from his master. Even in Ohio, during the past year, a Government official deliberately murdered an absconding slave, and is yet protected from the gallows by those who administer the State laws in the county where the murder was perpetrated. Our Federal troops are often employed in the work of murdering those who are supposed to be fugitive slaves. A signal instance of this character occurred many years since. In a time of profound peace, General Jackson directed our Army to invade Florida, at that time a province of Spain, for the purpose of murdering a people who were born free, but whose ancestors had been slaves; and in one day nearly three hundred men, women, and children, were barbarously and wantonly murdered by American troops.

This system of murder is encouraged and maintained by the present Executive, and by all who support his Administration. They insist that the people of a State or Territory may rightfully enact laws giving to one man power over the life of his fellow-men who have committed no offense; that popular sovereignty is not limited by God's higher law; that it extends with propriety over the life, the liberty, and the happiness of a portion of the human family; that the whites may, with moral impunity, subject the colored people of a State or Territory to degrading servitude, close up the windows of their souls, shut out knowledge from their understanding, hold them in ignorance, and murder them if they assert the rights which God has given them.

This infidelity, within the last half century, has consigned more than a million of innocent and unoffending victims to untimely graves. The number is far greater than has perished under the infidelity of France in all past time. But this comparison of American with French infidelity does great injustice to the latter. In France, the victims were sent to the guillotine under pretense that it was necessary for the public safety. They suffered but little: there was no flogging, no torture. But American infidelity consigns its victims to years of torture and suffering, and finally to death, for no higher purpose than to gratify the sordid passions of their individual oppressors.

These wholesale murders are but the outworkings of that infidelity which denies that God has endowed all men with the inalienable right to live. The enactments referred to, and their results, clearly demonstrate the views of those who sustain them, and are laboring in this Hall, and elsewhere, to extend them over our Territories, and wherever Congress holds exclusive jurisdiction. It is most obvious, that while the present Administration openly lends its influence to such crimes, every intelligent man who sustains and upholds its policy, or fails to oppose it so far as able, becomes involved in the guilt of the murders which it sanctions.

But I shall be told that these enactments are confined to the slave States, and that Congress holds no power to repeal or modify them. I reply that the people and statesmen of our southern States insist that slaveholders may carry their slaves, and all privileges which they hold of flogging and murdering them under State laws, into our Territories; and the President, and those who sustain him, declare that the Constitution extends and protects these crimes wherever Federal authority exists. They declare that this system of murder is established by the Federal Constitution; that neither Congress nor the people of the Territories have the right to punish those who perpetrate such crimes. Not content with this avowal of doctrine, however, we are at this time sustaining a code of laws for the government of this District which holds to the blasphemy that men may become the property of their fellow-men—may be bought and sold like swine. In these, and in other modes, is the transcendent question of Christianity, or slaveholding heathenism, made the absorbing political issue in the nation.

But I shall be told that the Supreme Court of the United States have decided that our fathers did not intend to avow those self-evident truths which they solemnly proclaimed; that they really held to the doctrines of slavery which they did not avow. Our fathers could no more change the law of eternal right and wrong than we can. The ordained will of Heaven has existed through the eternity of the past, and will continue through all the future. Men may conform to this law, but they can never modify it or make it conform to the human will. Our fathers sought to make no such modification of the Creator's law.

Had such infidelity characterized their action, it would have imposed no obligation upon the present generation to sustain this system of murder. They have passed to that tribunal which will do them justice. They must answer for their conduct; we must account to God and posterity for our own stewardship, and not for theirs. God, through all his works, in all his laws, by every revelation to man, has prohibited us from murdering our fellow-beings; and woe to the nation, to the statesman, the legislator, the despot, the oligarch, the murderer, who disregards this law of the Most High! I feel humbled and mortified when I see statesmen, ministers, teachers of religion, in this land of bibles and Sabbaths and churches, maintain the doctrine that human authority can repeal this law of Heaven. To me, it is downright blasphemy; derogatory to the character of the Creator and offensive to the religious sense of mankind. Yet, this absurdity is the legitimate outworking of that infidelity which denies "that God has endowed all men with inalienable rights." If He has endowed our race with any right whatever, it surely is the right to live. If this right be denied, no other can be acknowledged. If there be exceptions to this central, this universal proposition, that all men, without respect to complexion or condition, hold from the Creator the right to live, who shall determine what portion of the community shall be slain? And who may perpetrate the murders? The Executive and his supporters say that white men may murder black men. The blacks deny this; God and Christianity and nature, and all religions, all just, all moral men, deny it.

Yet this denial of the right of men to live, constitutes the mildest and least offensive phase of American infidelity. No intelligent person would desire to have the life of his body prolonged for the purpose of being subjected to physical torture, while his intellect shall be paralyzed, his soul enshrouded in ignorance, and his moral nature brutalized. Therefore the right to enjoy liberty, physical, moral, civil, and religious, is regarded even more important than life. Indeed, it is obvious that life itself cannot be protected unless the individual be permitted to support and defend the physical existence with which God has endowed him.

Religious and reflecting men regard the body as merely the temporary habitation of the spirit, the soul which constitutes the man; to be occupied during its infant state of existence, and used for the purpose of developing the mental faculties extending the sphere of thought and elevating his moral nature, thereby preparing him for a higher and holier state of existence. And when the body shall have performed this service, it is laid aside to mold and return to its mother earth, while the spirit shall live on and on while God himself exists. No injury to the body can, therefore, bear any comparison to the enslavement of the intellect, the degradation of the moral nature of man.

By the established laws of our existence, the body requires food, raiment, and habitation. To each individual are given limbs to bear him forth from place to place; hands to cultivate and gather the fruits of the earth, to feed the body, provide raiment and habitation for its protection; eyes to guide him, and ears to detect danger. These are all held in subjection to the mind, and are put in operation only by the will of the individual. The mind itself is constrained to action by an inflexible law which God has ordained for its early unfolding. Its first care is to nourish, and feed, and clothe the body, to render it a comfortable and pleasant habitation during occupancy. The spirit is constrained, in seeking food, to put the limbs, and hands, and all the physical faculties into operation to satisfy the hunger and thirst of the body, to provide raiment and habitation for its protection. That God has endowed each member of the human family with the inherent and inalienable right to use his own limbs and hands and bodily faculties for these purposes is, literally, a "self-evident truth." It is a truth that cannot be rendered more clear by argument; its force cannot be increased by logic, or made more beautiful by eloquence. But this care of the body constitutes the first lesson, the lowest exercise of the intellect, and is introductory to that eternal unfoldment which was designed by the Creator as the means of elevating man to higher and still higher happiness; for I lay it down as a religious axiom that in degree as man becomes wise, just, pure, and truthful, he approximates that happiness which constitutes the final design of his existence.

That God has endowed every human being with the right thus to enlarge this sphere of thought, and elevate his moral nature, is so obviously, so self-evidently true, that he must indeed be a most arrant infidel who denies it. It constitutes a part of the fundamental proposition that "all men are endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights." Its existence is, however, denied by "American infidels;" and this constitutes the second collateral issue between the religious and irreligious portions of our people. This enslavement of the soul presents infidelity in its most revolting features. It paralyzes the moral nature of man; renders the soul sterile and unprepared for heaven. We must wait the day of final retribution to disclose the extent of its enormities.

Yet the body can only be held in bondage by enslaving the spirit, by surrounding it with mental darkness. Permit a man to understand the duties which he owes to himself, to mankind, and to God, and he cannot be a slave. Hence, the whole policy of slaveholding governments is arranged and adapted to the purpose of first enslaving the minds of their bondmen. In most slaveholding communities it is a statutory offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment, to teach slaves to read the gospel. They are not permitted to read the words of "Him who spake as never man spake;" who declared His mission on earth "to proclaim liberty to the captive;" to raise up the bowed down; enlighten the ignorant; who taught His disciples and followers "to do unto others as they would have others do unto them." A distinguished jurist of North Carolina, while discharging official duties, declared, "a slave is one doomed in his own person and posterity to live without knowledge." He is not permitted to understand the object of human existence. He can have no conception of justice, or wisdom, or purity, or truth. Slaves can have no correct idea of the duties which children owe to their parents; nor of those which are due from parents to children. The parent is not permitted to teach or govern his child; nor is the child permitted to honor or obey his parent.

It follows that the freedom of speech must be restricted among the free people of slaveholding communities. The public mind must be there enslaved in order to maintain the institution, and no man be permitted to assert the doctrines I have referred to. They are not permitted publicly to utter the truths which lie at the basis of our Government. The policy of those communities is to circumscribe human thought, prevent a knowledge of the duties which men owe to themselves and to their fellow-men. This policy was for many years enforced in this body. Members were prohibited from speaking of the crimes and iniquities of slavery, lest the people should understand the subject, and refuse to sustain such infidelity.

The right of legal marriage is unknown among the slaves. They are not permitted to understand the relation nor the duties of husband and wife. The master sells him who is called husband, or her who calls herself wife, while he retains the other. He sells the parent, and retains the child; or he sells the child, and retains the parent. These separations are but the practical workings of that infidelity which denies to parents and children those inalienable rights which God and nature have bestowed upon them.

Slaves can have no proper conception of the rights of property. Robbed of their own earnings, told they have no claims to the food which they gather, it were impossible for them to conceive of any such right in others. Nor is it possible that such a state of society could exist among our southern population without greatly affecting the morals of the free people. Indeed, the existence of three millions of slaves among six millions of free people must, of necessity, characterize the morality of the entire population. One of the prominent vices of slaveholding communities is the rapid amalgamation of races. The evidence of this vice meets the eye of the traveler at every step in his progress through our southern States.

The legitimate heir of a plantation, on coming into possession of his estate, often sells the children of his father—his brothers and sisters of the half blood—denying that they "have any rights which white men are bound to respect." This infidelity denies the right of six hundred thousand females of our land to protect their own virtue and consigns them to practical prostitution. This state of society is but the outworking of that infidelity which denies the existence of man's inalienable right to liberty and to moral elevation.

It would be in vain for us to say to the Christians of Europe, or even the Mohammedans of Turkey, that religious men of our country support such a system of pollution. Yet thousands of church members, in the slave States, impiously charge Deity with authorizing these crimes, and sacrilegiously endeavor to pervert the holy Scriptures to the support of this infidelity. Newspapers professedly religious lend a silent, and some an active, support to these crimes; while others, even in our free States, openly oppose and denounce all who resist the extension, or expose the enormities, of slavery.

The number of heart-broken mothers, and the torture which they suffer on being separated from their children, the physical suffering from floggings, thumb-screws, and all the various means of torture practiced in slaveholding communities, are matters of which we can speak, but of which we can form no estimate. This degradation and suffering constitute the legitimate sequence of American infidelity. If these God-given prerogatives of our race be abandoned, the mother can have no right to the child of her body; no right to the food which she gathers by her toil; no right to the intellect which God has given her; no right to be virtuous, pure, wise, and good; no right to live. I repeat that the religious men of our nation insist that these rights of human nature shall be held sacred, and their enjoyment secured to every individual; while the supporters of American infidelity deny their existence, and proclaim the duty of human governments to disregard them; and each party will, of course, carry their views into their moral, social, and political conduct. Mr. Jefferson well exclaimed: "Can the liberties of a nation be thought secure when we have destroyed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that they are the gifts of God?—THAT THEY ARE NOT TO BE VIOLATED BUT WITH HIS WRATH?"

I now pass to the third collateral issue—the right of all men to enjoy happiness. I need not repeat that the ultimate beatitude of the race constituted the evident design of Deity in creating mankind. Such I understand to be the instinctive conviction of all men. This purpose, this hope, this intuition, is found in every human heart. Men in all ages, in all countries, of all languages, have regarded this as the ultimate object of their toils and labors, the great design of their existence. This beatitude can only be attained by moral culture; by extending the sphere of thought; by understanding the laws of nature, and of nature's God; by attaining a knowledge of His attributes, and conforming to them. To be wise, truthful, pure, and just, is to insure happiness in this life, and in the life to come; and it is a most beautiful feature in the law of our being, that to attain this happiness ourselves, we must respect the right of others to enjoy it; that, as we elevate our own moral natures we necessarily influence others; and as we labor for the welfare and the happiness of others, we most rapidly promote our own. The religious man delights in doing good; he seeks to instruct the ignorant, to elevate the degraded, to relieve the oppressed, to enlighten those who sit in moral darkness, to give to all that elevation of soul which alone can qualify them for happiness. For this purpose schools and academies are established, colleges are founded, tract and Bible and missionary societies are organized, teachers and ministers are employed; indeed, this work of elevating our race constitutes the highest and holiest employment of mankind. For success in this work, prayer is daily made at every family altar; and on the Sabbath our pulpits resound with the solemn, fervent supplication, that God will aid this work; that He will, by the irresistible power of His grace, convert the irreligious, enlighten those whose minds are enshrouded in the darkness of infidelity; that He will relieve the oppressed, comfort the afflicted, and hasten the day when all shall know His will, obey His law, and enjoy His favor.

The infidelity which denies the right of men to attain happiness, that dooms a portion of our race to degradation and torture, to vice and crime and misery, which shuts out hope from the human soul, shocks the conscience and awakens the sensibilities of all religious men.

While Government legislates for the protection of these natural, these God-given rights, they will receive the approval, the support, of all good men, and their laws will be respected and obeyed; but when they legislate for the invasion of these rights, they call up the hostility, the resistance of those whom they seek to oppress. The just and wise and pure of all parties, sects, and denominations, feel the outrage and sympathize with the down-trodden. The great heart of Christendom now beats in sympathy with the enslaved of our land. We feel that sympathy in this Hall; and when we speak for justice and for freedom, we utter the voice of nature; we proclaim the law of Heaven, written in letters of living light upon the tablet of the moral universe.

The difficulties respecting Kansas, which now shake our Union to its very center, constitute the legitimate outworkings of this infidelity. The right of all men in Kansas to live, to nourish and protect life, attain moral elevation and happiness, had been asserted by congressional law; and under this enactment peace blessed our nation. Infidels, however, said this was wrong; that such rights did not pertain to man; that one portion of the people there hold the power, and may if they choose rightfully enslave another, rob them of their toil, their intelligence, their hopes, their manhood, and murder them if they refuse to obey their masters. And this law of liberty was repealed, and men were enslaved, brutalized, sold like swine. The public conscience was outraged, and all good men sympathized with the oppressed. Usurpation and brute force were resorted to for the purpose of extending and supporting slavery; civil war, devastation and bloodshed followed, and will continue until justice be done, and the rights of human nature enjoyed in that unfortunate Territory.

This line of demarkation, which separates the natural rights of all men from human legislation, was clearly drawn by the founders of our Republic. They established the point at which the appropriate, the just powers of all human governments commence, whatever may be their form. They defined the boundaries of human authority; they acknowledged God as the author of life, the donor of liberty, the fountain from which human happiness is derived. On the denial of these religious, these self-evident truths, American slavery is founded. The slaveholder denies the right of his slave to cherish and protect his own life, to gain intelligence, to unfold his moral nature, to understand God's attributes, and enjoy that happiness for which he was created. To those primal truths he is infidel. To the rights of his fellow-mortal he is infidel. To God's higher law he is infidel. Against these he wages unceasing war. He seeks to rob Deity of His attributes, and man of his God-given prerogatives. He claims for human legislation that supreme sovereignty over the life, the liberty, and the happiness of mankind, which belongs only to the Creator. He thus places himself in hostility to Christianity, to civilization.

This contest is not confined to the United States. These truths are operating upon the hearts of the Russian people. Their Government is in advance of ours. Measures have already been taken for the emancipation of the serfs of that vast Empire, although their condition is far better than that of American slaves. Holland is also moved by these doctrines, and is giving freedom to her oppressed people in her West India islands. England and France have abolished slavery, regarding it as an institution unsuited to the age in which we live. We assert the rights of man wherever he exists. Ours is the cause of Christian civilization throughout the world. Our doctrines apply with equal force to other Governments, to other nations and people. The most illustrious monarch who sways the scepter of human power is really as much bound to respect the inalienable rights of every individual as is the President of the United States. Kings, potentates, and emperors, become despots whenever they invade the rights of the most humble to life, liberty, property, or happiness.

The mere name of "republicanism" gives us no claim to respect, so long as one sixth part of our population is held in degrading bondage. I assert, without fear of contradiction, that if the liberty enjoyed by one portion of our people, and the slavery suffered by the other, could be brought into common stock, and each individual constrained to take his aliquot proportion of each, ours would be regarded as the most perfect despotism among civilized nations. The only advantage which we possess over other nations consists in that feature of our Government which vests all political power in the people. They may, by use of the ballot-box, so modify and shape the administration of Government as best to secure the inalienable rights of each and of every individual.

It is with emotions of gratitude to God, and profound respect for the memory of those who established our Republic, that we refer to the period when, at the very font of our national baptism, our fathers vindicated their claims to national independence, solely upon the religious truths which constitute the central proposition referred to at the commencement of my remarks. They claimed for themselves no special privileges. They spoke, they fought, they bled to establish this universal, this eternal principle of man's right to live, to nourish his body, protect his life, to elevate his moral nature, and attain happiness. This they proclaimed the basis, the corner stone, not merely of our Republic, but of human Governments generally. The Constitution was framed and adopted upon this then universally admitted principle; but such was the anxious solicitude of our early patriots that, in two years after its adoption, it was amended, by declaring in explicit language: "That no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law;" that is, except on trial and conviction before some judicial tribunal. In accordance with these truths one half of the States of our Union proceeded to give liberty to all their people, to protect the inalienable rights of all; but the other States embraced and cherished this infidelity which has at length infused itself into our Federal Government. Our teachers, our politicians, our statesmen, became unwilling to offend those who had embraced this infidelity. They were received into churches, elected to civil office, and finally obtained control of the Government. All classes of men became affected by this disbelief in God's law and in human rights. It was regarded as disreputable to examine the crimes which this system of oppression upheld; social and political ostracism awaited the man who dared speak disrespectfully of its iniquities.

Eventually individuals appeared who were willing to encounter odium in order to arouse the religious and moral sensibilities of the nation, and in 1856, a national convention met at Philadelphia to devise means for overcoming this moral and political scourge. The members pledged themselves to each other and to the world, to maintain the truths to which I have alluded, and they now constitute the platform of a large and increasing political party.

That day witnessed the dawning of a reformation more deep, more radical, more important in its religious, its moral, its social and political effects upon mankind, than has occurred since the sixteenth century. It is more deep and radical than that commenced by Calvin and his collaborators. It asserts the right of man to religious and moral elevation as superior to the power of kings or human Governments. The great reformers of that age dared put forth no such doctrine. Their lives would have constituted the price of such an avowal. They were constrained to admit the divine right of kings over the liberties of their people, and many of the usurped powers of the church.

The Philadelphia convention will be remembered in coming time as first in the history of the political parties of our nation to make religious truths the basis of its political action, and first to proclaim these rights of mankind as universal, to be enjoyed equally, by princes and people, by rulers and the most humble. It was the first to proclaim the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. The result of the presidential election of 1856 showed the advocates of oppression that there was but one alternative for them to pursue. They were constrained to take distinct issue with the advocates of liberty by denying these religious truths, or to disband their party in every free State.

The Supreme Court was selected as the instrument for officially avowing this undisguised infidelity. That tribunal was favorably constituted for such a purpose; a majority of its members were slaveholders. Other members had been appointed to office apparently on account of their uniform servility to the slave power; and every circumstance combined to render it the appropriate instrument for performing this work. The time, too, was a matter of importance. No sooner had the Thirty-Fourth Congress adjourned, than a majority of that tribunal, in violation of its own declared rules, digressed from the question before them, to utter its denial of those doctrines of the republican fathers.

But this decision, opposed as it is to the self-evident truths of our Declaration of Independence, to the letter and spirit of the Constitution, to the intelligence and conscience of the American people, is emphatically repudiated by them. The vanity and arrogance exhibited by a majority of the court in charging Hancock and Adams and Jefferson and Franklin, and their illustrious contemporaries, with proclaiming doctrines which they did not intend to express, and of failing to utter principles which they intended to avow, has called forth from the popular mind indignant pity for the court, rather than doubts as to the intelligence and Christianity of those savans who founded our institutions.

I shall not argue the absurdity of this decision. Its falsehood is as self-evident as the truths which it denies. Arriving at the conclusion that the sages who signed our Declaration of Independence meant precisely the opposite of that which they solemnly proclaimed, the court proceeded to declare—in contradiction to its letter and spirit, to the history of the age, to the conscience and judgment of all Christian people—that black men were regarded as having no rights which white men were bound to respect; and on this basis founded their conclusion that Congress has no constitutional authority to protect the lives, liberties, and property of the people in our Territories where it holds exclusive jurisdiction. This atrocious decision attempts to outlaw one eighth part of the human race; to place them without the pale of legal protection; it affects to authorize any and every crime to be perpetrated against them. Under this decision they may be robbed and murdered; in short, this decision would extend American infidelity, with all its attendant crimes, wherever Federal jurisdiction exists. Thus has the issue been made between the religious portion of the community and those who maintain this heathenism. This issue involves the entire American people. All denominations of men are now constrained to cast their influence on one side or the other. To sit silent, would merely aid the cause of infidelity and despotism. He who refuses to act, by such refusal, casts half his influence in favor of the crimes which I have enumerated. The functions of our Government for the time being, are prostituted to sustain and extend this infidelity. The Prophet of Mecca, nor his followers, ever sanctioned doctrines so barbarous as those which now rule in the Administration of our Government. The Turk will be constrained to unite with the Christian in the maintenance of those rights which are sanctioned by the religion of Mohammed, as well as of Christ. Civilized and semi-civilized nations must feel a common interest in the overthrow of this infidelity, which aims a fatal blow at human rights, wherever the image of God is found.

I greatly rejoice that Christians in Europe are sensible of the existence of this war upon human nature. American Christians, patriots, and philanthropists feel the warmest gratitude toward the religious men of Scotland, of England, of France, and Germany for the kind sympathy which they express in this cause, for the very catholic remonstrances which they have addressed to our American Christians against this infidelity. Every lover of truth, every religious heart in our land, must have glowed with gratitude to God and love to man, as he read the eloquent and truthful address of the Christians of Geneva, once the home of Europe's great Reformer, to the Christians of the United States on this subject. And whose heart was not moved when noticing the action of the Protestants of France in relation to it? Nor is this Christian feeling confined to Protestants. The African Institute of Paris, formed for the purpose of maintaining the rights of the African race, embraces among its members distinguished laymen, ministers, bishops, and archbishops, belonging to the Papal Church. My own humble efforts in behalf of our common brotherhood, caused my name to become known to its directors, who placed it on the roll of its honorary members. I take this occasion to thank them for this honor. A Protestant by education, by feeling, I greet those Catholic Christians most cordially as good and worthy laborers in this holy work. Heartily do I thank them for all that they have done, and are doing, for the down-trodden of our race.

Could I hope that my remarks would meet the eye of British ministers, I would in an especial manner invoke their official influence against this infidelity. I would beseech them no more to sanction, by their action, that blasphemy which seeks to transform the image of God into property.

I acknowledge that our Government was dishonored in the eyes of all Christians, when its Executive became the agent and solicitor of those pirates who claimed to own the fathers, the mothers, and children on board certain slave ships wrecked on British islands, where, thanks to Christian civilization, no slavery exists. The President, espousing the cause of men who deserved the halter and the gallows, demanded compensation from the British Government for their loss of human flesh. Our representative at the court of St. James appears to have misled and deceived the British ministry. In one of his official communications he declared that, "our Government had determined more than once, in the most solemn manner, that slaves killed in the public service of the United States, even in a state of war, were to be regarded as property, and not as persons, and the Government held responsible for their value."

When referring to this assertion of our minister fifteen years since, I pronounced it unfounded and untrue. I said this in the presence of the delegation from Virginia, the State of which our minister, Mr. Stevenson, was a citizen, and I called on them, as his friends, to sustain his assertion by showing some one instance in which this Government had paid for slaves killed in the public service. I declared the whole history of Congress showed that we had in every instance refused such payment, and I defied them to show an exception to such practice. No man met the challenge. I now repeat the assertion. I pronounce the statement of Mr. Stevenson untrue, a libel upon our Government, and a slander upon the American people. I not only declare his assertion untrue, but I declare the opposite to be true. The British ministry, by complying with this demand, tacitly admitted that phase of American infidelity which seeks to degrade the human soul to the level of swine. More recently they paid the slave-dealers the estimated value of the fathers, mothers, and children, on board the Creole, who obtained their own liberty by gallantly taking possession of the vessel and landing on British soil.

The money—the dollars and cents—are of no importance; but concessions to this infidelity, at the present time, are important. It was an object with the slave power to obtain from the British ministry the admission that men are property. I would entreat the British Government, and all other Governments, to maintain the dignity of our common nature. In the language of one of the most eloquent of England's orators, I would say, "He who gave us the form commands us to maintain the rights of men." The Christians of the United States and of other nations would rejoice to learn that the British ministry now, as in 1820, refuse even to correspond with our Executive on the subject of property in human flesh.

I would also warn the Spanish Crown and other continental Powers, that our present Executive is seeking, by all the various means and arts of diplomacy, to detach Cuba from its allegiance, to annex it to the United States in order to increase the influence of the slave power, and add strength to this American infidelity.

I hope and trust that this conspiracy may be defeated; that all Christian Governments may exert their power against the further extension of this scourge of our race. I would most earnestly invoke the Christians, philanthropists, and patriots of this and of every nation and kindred and language, to exert their moral influence, their legitimate powers, for the overthrow, the final eradication of this infidelity from the earth, for upholding the natural, Heaven-endowed rights of man, for the progress, the moral elevation of our race, until all shall understand the will and obey the laws of our common Father, and attain that happiness which constitutes the ultimate object of human existence.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

SPEECH OF HON. J. H. HAMMOND, OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
IN THE SENATE, March 4, 1858.

[REVISED BY HIMSELF.]

The Senate having under consideration the bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State—

Mr. HAMMOND said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: In the debate which occurred in the early part of the last month, I understood the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to say that the question of the reception of the Lecompton constitution was narrowed down to a single point. That point was, whether that constitution embodied the will of the people of Kansas. Am I correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct, with this qualification: I could waive the irregularity and agree to the reception of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, provided I was satisfied that it was the act and deed of that people, and embodied their will. There are other objections; but the others I could overcome, if this point were disposed of.

Mr. HAMMOND. I so understood the Senator. I understood that if he could be satisfied that this constitution embodied the will of the people of Kansas, all other defects and irregularities could be cured by the act of Congress, and that he himself would be willing to permit such an act to be passed.

Now, sir, the only question is, how is that will to be ascertained? And upon that point, and that only, we shall differ. In my opinion, the will of the people of Kansas is to be sought in the act of her lawful convention elected to form a constitution, and nowhere else; and that it is unconstitutional and dangerous to seek it elsewhere. I think that the Senator fell into a fundamental error in his report dissenting from the report of the majority of the Territorial Committee, when he said that the convention which framed this constitution was "the creature of the Territorial Legislature;" and from that error has probably arisen all his subsequent errors on this subject. How can it be possible that a convention should be the creature of a Territorial Legislature? The convention was an assembly of the people in their highest sovereign capacity, about to perform their highest possible act of sovereignty. The Territorial Legislature is a mere provisional government; a petty corporation, appointed and paid by the Congress of the United States, without a particle of sovereign power. Shall that interfere with a sovereignty—inchoate, but still a sovereignty? Why, Congress cannot interfere; Congress cannot confer on the Territorial Legislature the power to interfere. Congress is not sovereign. Congress has sovereign powers, but no sovereignty. Congress has no power to act outside of the limitations of the Constitution; no right to carry into effect the supreme will of any people; and, therefore, Congress is not sovereign. Nor does Congress hold the sovereignty of Kansas. The sovereignty of Kansas resides, if it resides anywhere, with the sovereign States of this Union. They have conferred upon Congress, among other powers, the authority of administering such sovereignty to their satisfaction. They have given Congress the power to make needful rules and regulations regarding the Territories, and they have given Congress power to admit a State—"admit," not create. Under these two powers, Congress may first establish a provisional territorial government merely for municipal purposes; and when a State has grown into rightful sovereignty, when that sovereignty which has been kept in abeyance demands recognition, when a community is formed there, a social compact created, a sovereignty born, as it were, upon the soil, then Congress is gifted with the power to acknowledge it, and the Legislature, only by mere usage, sometimes neglected, assists at the birth of it by passing a precedent resolution assembling a convention.

But when that convention assembles to form a constitution, it assembles in the highest known capacity of a people, and has no superior in this Government but a State sovereignty; or rather the State sovereignties of all the States alone can do anything with the act of that convention. Then if that convention was lawful, if there is no objection to the convention itself, there can be no objection to the action of the convention; and there is no power on earth that has a right to inquire, outside of its acts, whether the convention represented the will of the people of Kansas or not, for a convention of the people is, according to the theory of our Government, for all the purposes for which the people elected it, THE PEOPLE, bona fide, being the only way in which all the people can assemble and act together. I do not doubt that there might be some cases of such gross and palpable frauds committed in the formation of a convention, as might authorize Congress to investigate them, but I can scarcely conceive of any. And when a State knocks at the door for admission, Congress can with propriety do little more than inquire if her constitution is republican. That it embodies the will of her people must necessarily be taken for granted, if it is their lawful act. I am assuming, of course, that her boundaries are settled, and her population sufficient.

If what I have said be correct, then the will of the people of Kansas is to be found in the action of her constitutional convention. It is immaterial whether it is the will of a majority of the people of Kansas now, or not. The convention was, or might have been, elected by a majority of the people of Kansas. A convention elected in April may well frame a constitution that would not be agreeable to a majority of the people of a new State, rapidly filling up, in the succeeding January, and if Legislatures are to be allowed to put to vote the acts of a convention, and have them annulled by a subsequent influx of immigrants, there is no finality. If you were to send back the Lecompton constitution, and another was to be framed, in the slow way in which we do public business in this country, before it would reach Congress and be passed, perhaps the majority would be turned the other way. Whenever you go outside of the regular forms of law and constitutions, to seek for the will of the people, you are wandering in a wilderness—a wilderness of thorns.

If this was a minority constitution I do not know that that would be an objection to it. Constitutions are made for minorities. Perhaps minorities ought to have the right to make constitutions, for they are administered by majorities. The Constitution of this Government was made by a minority, and as late as 1840 a minority had it in their hands, and could have altered or abolished it; for, in 1840, six out of the twenty-six States of the Union held the numerical majority.

The Senator from Illinois has, upon his view of the Lecompton constitution and the present situation of affairs in Kansas, raised a cry of "popular sovereignty." The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] yesterday made himself facetious about it, and called it "squatter sovereignty." There is a popular sovereignty which is the basis of our Government, and I am unwilling that the Senator should have the advantage of confounding it with "squatter sovereignty." In all countries and in all time, it is well understood that the numerical majority of the people could, if they chose, exercise the sovereignty of the country; but for want of intelligence, and for want of leaders, they have never yet been able successfully to combine and form a stable, popular government. They have often attempted it, but it has always turned out, instead of a popular sovereignty, a populace sovereignty; and demagogues, placing themselves upon the movement, have invariably led them into military despotism.

I think that the popular sovereignty which the Senator from Illinois would derive from the acts of his Territorial Legislature, and from the information received from partisans and partisan presses, would lead us directly into populace, and not popular, sovereignty. Genuine popular sovereignty never existed on a firm basis except in this country. The first gun of the Revolution announced a new organization of it, which was embodied in the Declaration of Independence, developed, elaborated, and inaugurated forever in the Constitution of the United States. The two pillars of it were representation and the ballot-box. In distributing their sovereign powers among the various departments of the Government, the people retained for themselves the single power of the ballot-box; and a great power it was. Through that they were able to control all the departments of the Government. It was not for the people to exercise political power in detail; it was not for them to be annoyed with the cares of Government; but, from time to time, through the ballot-box, to exert their sovereign power and control the whole organization. This is popular sovereignty, the popular sovereignty of a legal constitutional ballot-box; and when spoken through that box, the "voice of the people," for all political purposes, "is the voice of God;" but when it is heard outside of that, it is the voice heard of a demon, the locsin of the reign of terror.

In passing I omitted to answer a question that the Senator from Illinois has, I believe, repeatedly asked; and that is, what were the legal powers of the Territorial Legislature after the formation and adoption of the Lecompton constitution? That had nothing to do with the Territorial Legislature, which was a provisional government almost without power, appointed and paid by this Government. The Lecompton constitution was the act of a people, and the sovereign act of a people. They moved in different spheres and on different planes, and could not come in contact at all without usurpation on the one part or the other. It was not competent for the Lecompton constitution to overturn the territorial government and set up a government in place of it, because that constitution, until acknowledged by Congress, was nothing; it was not in force anywhere. It could well require the people of Kansas to pass upon it or any portion of it; it could do whatever was necessary to perfect that constitution, but nothing beyond that, until Congress had agreed to accept it. In the mean time the territorial government, always a government ad interim, was entitled to exercise all the sway over the Territory that it ever had been entitled to. The error of assuming, as the Senator did, that the convention was the creature of the territorial government, has led him into the difficulty and confusion of connecting these two governments together. There is no power to govern in the convention until after the adoption, by Congress, of its constitution.

If the Senator from Illinois, whom I regard as the Ajax Telamon of this debate, does not press the question of frauds, I shall have little or nothing to say about that. The whole history of Kansas is a disgusting one, from the beginning to the end. I have avoided reading it as much as I could. Had I been a Senator before, I should have felt it my duty, perhaps, to have done so; but not expecting to be one, I am ignorant, fortunately, in a great measure, of details; and I was glad to hear the acknowledgment of the Senator from Illinois, since it excuses me from the duty of examining them.

I hear, on the other side of the Chamber, a great deal said about "gigantic and stupendous frauds;" and the Senator from New York, yesterday, in portraying the character of his party and the opposite one, laid the whole of those frauds upon the pro-slavery party. To listen to him, you would have supposed that the regiments of immigrants recruited in the purlieus of the great cities of the North, and sent out, armed and equipped with Sharpe's rifles and bowie knives and revolvers, to conquer freedom for Kansas, stood by, meek saints, innocent as doves, and harmless as lambs brought up to the sacrifice. General Lane's lambs! They remind one of the famous "lambs" of Colonel Kirke, to whom they have a strong family resemblance. I presume that there were frauds; and that if there were frauds, they were equally great on all sides; and that any investigation into them on this floor, or by a commission, would end in nothing but disgrace to the United States.

But, sir, the true object of the discussion on the other side of the Chamber is to agitate the question of slavery. I have very great doubts whether the leaders on the other side of the House really wish to defeat this bill. I think they would consider it a vastly greater victory to crush out the Democratic party in the North, and destroy the authors of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and I am not sure that they have not brought about this imbroglio for the very purpose. They tell us that year after year the majority in Kansas was beaten at the polls! They have always had a majority, but they always get beaten! How could that be? It does seem, from the most reliable sources of information, that they have a majority, and have had a majority for some time. Why has not this majority come forward and taken possession of the government, and made a free-State constitution, and brought it here? We should all have voted for its admission cheerfully. There can be but one reason: if they had brought, as was generally supposed at the time the Kansas-Nebraska act was passed would be the case, a free constitution here, there would have been no difficulty among the northern Democrats; they would have been sustained by their people. The statement made by some of them, as I understood, that that act was a good free-State act, would have been verified, and the northern Democratic party would have been sustained. But Kansas coming here a slave State, it is hoped, will kill that party, and that is the reason they have refrained from going to the polls; that is the reason they have refrained from making it a free State when they had the power. They intend to make it a free State as soon as they have effected their purpose of destroying the Democratic party at the North, and now their chief object here is to agitate slavery. For once, I am not disposed to discuss that question here in any abstract form. I think the time has gone by for that. Our minds are all made up. I may be willing to discuss it—and that is the way it should be, and must be, discussed—as a practical thing, as a thing that is, and is to be; and to discuss its effect upon our political institutions, and ascertain how long those institutions will hold together with slavery ineradicable.

The Senator from New York entered very fairly into this field yesterday. I was surprised, the other day, when he so openly said "the battle had been fought and won." Although I knew, and had long known it to be true, I was surprised to hear him say so. I thought that he had been entrapped into a hasty expression by the sharp rebukes of the Senator from New Hampshire; and I was glad to learn yesterday his words had been well considered—that they meant all that I thought they meant; that they meant that the South is a conquered province, and that the North intends to rule it. He said that it was their intention "to take this Government from unjust and unfaithful hands, and place it in just and faithful hands;" that it was their intention to consecrate all the Territories of the Union to free labor; and that, to effect their purposes, they intended to reconstruct the Supreme Court.

Yesterday the Senator said, suppose we admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, what guarantees are there that Congress will not again interfere with the affairs of Kansas? meaning, I suppose, that if she abolished slavery, what guarantee there was that Congress would not force it upon her again. So far as we of the South are concerned, you have, at least, the guarantee of good faith that never has been violated. But what guarantee have we, when you have this Government in your possession, in all its departments, even if we submit quietly to what the Senator exhorts us to submit to—the limitation of slavery to its present territory, and even to the reconstruction of the Supreme Court—that you will not plunder us with tariffs; that you will not bankrupt us with internal improvements and bounties on your exports; that you will not cramp us with navigation laws, and other laws impeding the facilities of transportation to southern produce? What guarantee have we that you will not create a new bank, and concentrate all the finances of this country at the North, where already, for the want of direct trade and a proper system of banking in the South, they are ruinously concentrated? Nay, what guarantee have we that you will not emancipate our slaves, or, at least, make the attempt? We cannot rely on your faith when you have the power. It has been always broken whenever pledged.

As I am disposed to see this question settled as soon as possible, and am perfectly willing to have a final and conclusive settlement now, after what the Senator from New York has said, I think it not improper that I should attempt to bring the North and South face to face, and see what resources each of us might have in the contingency of separate organizations.

If we never acquire another foot of territory for the South, look at her. Eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles. As large as Great Britain, France, Austria, Prussia, and Spain. Is not that territory enough to make an empire that shall rule the world? With the finest soil, the most delightful climate, whose staple productions none of those great countries can grow, we have three thousand miles of continental shore line, so indented with bays and crowded with islands, that, when their shore lines are added, we have twelve thousand miles. Through the heart of our country runs the great Mississippi, the father of waters, into whose bosom are poured thirty-six thousand miles of tributary streams; and beyond we have the desert prairie wastes, to protect us in our rear. Can you hem in such a territory as that? You talk of putting up a wall of fire around eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles so situated! How absurd.

But in this Territory lies the great valley of the Mississippi, now the real, and soon to be the acknowledged seat of the empire of the world. The sway of that valley will be as great as ever the Nile knew in the earlier ages of mankind. We own the most of it. The most valuable part of it belongs to us now; and although those who have settled above us are now opposed to us, another generation will tell a different tale. They are ours by all the laws of nature; slave labor will go over every foot of this great valley where it will be found profitable to use it, and some of those who may not use it are soon to be united with us by such ties as will make us one and inseparable. The iron horse will soon be clattering over the sunny plains of the South to bear the products of its upper tributaries to our Atlantic ports, as it now does through the ice-bound North. There is the great Mississippi, a bond of union made by Nature herself. She will maintain it forever.

On this fine territory we have a population four times as large as that with which these colonies separated from the mother country, and a hundred, I might say a thousand fold, stronger. Our population is now sixty per cent. greater than that of the whole United States when we entered into the second war of independence. It is as large as the whole population of the United States was ten years after the conclusion of that war, and our exports are three times as great as those of the whole United States then. Upon our muster-rolls we have a million of militia. In a defensive war, upon an emergency, every one of them would be available. At any time, the South can raise, equip, and maintain in the field, a larger army than any Power of the earth can send against her, and an army of soldiers—men brought up on horseback, with guns in their hands.

If we take the North, even when the two large States of Kansas and Minnesota shall be admitted, her territory will be one hundred thousand square miles less than ours. I do not speak of California and Oregon; there is no antagonism between the South and those countries, and never will be. The population of the North is fifty per cent. greater than ours. I have nothing to say in disparagement either of the soil of the North, or the people of the North, who are a brave and an energetic race, full of intellect, but they produce no great staple that the South does not produce; while we produce two or three, and those the very greatest, that she can never produce. As to her men, I may be allowed to say they have never proved themselves to be superior to those of the South, either in the field or in the Senate.

But the strength of a nation depends in a great measure upon its wealth; and the wealth of a nation, like that of a man, is to be estimated by its surplus production. You may go to your trashy census books, full of falsehood and nonsense. They will tell you, for example, that in the State of Tennessee, the whole number of house-servants is not equal to that of those in my own house, and such things as that. You may estimate what is made throughout the country from these census books, but it is no matter how much is made if it is all consumed. If a man possess millions of dollars and consume his income, is he rich? Is he competent to embark in any new enterprise? Can he build ships or railroads? And could a people in that condition build ships and roads, or go to war? All the enterprises of peace and war depend upon the surplus productions of a people. They may be happy, they may be comfortable, they may enjoy themselves in consuming what they make; but they are not rich, they are not strong. It appears, by going to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, which are authentic, that last year the United States exported in round numbers $279,000,000 worth of domestic produce, excluding gold and foreign merchandise re-exported. Of this amount $153,000,000 worth is the clear produce of the South; articles that are not and cannot be made at the North. There are then $80,000,000 worth of exports of products of the forest, provisions, and breadstuffs. If we assume that the South made but one third of these, and I think that is a low calculation, our exports were $185,000,000, leaving to the North less than $95,000,000.

In addition to this, we sent to the North $30,000,000 worth of cotton, which is not counted in the exports. We sent to her seven or eight million dollars' worth of tobacco, which is not counted in the exports. We sent naval stores, lumber, rice, and many other minor articles. There is no doubt that we sent to the North $40,000,000 in addition; but suppose the amount to be $35,000,000; it will give us a surplus production of $220,000,000. The recorded exports of the South now are greater than the whole exports of the United States in any year before 1856. They are greater than the whole average exports of the United States for the last twelve years, including the two extraordinary years of 1856 and 1857. They are nearly double the amount of the average exports of the twelve preceding years. If I am right in my calculations as to $220,000,000 of surplus produce, there is not a nation on the face of the earth, with any numerous population, that can compete with us in produce per capita. It amounts to $16 66 per head, supposing that we have twelve million people. England, with all her accumulated wealth, with her concentrated and educated energy, makes under $16 50 of surplus production per head.

I have not made a calculation as to the North, with her $95,000,000 surplus. Admitting that she exports as much as we do, with her eighteen millions of population it would be but little over twelve dollars a head. But she cannot export to us and abroad exceeding ten dollars a head against our sixteen dollars. I know well enough that the North sends to the South a vast amount of the productions of her industry. I take it for granted that she, at least, pays us in that way for the thirty or forty million dollars' worth of cotton and other articles we send her. I am willing to admit that she pays us considerably more; but to bring her up to our amount of surplus production, to bring her up to $220,000,000 a year, the South must take from her $125,000,000; and this, in addition to our share of the consumption of the $333,000,000 worth introduced into the country from abroad, and paid for chiefly by our own exports. The thing is absurd; it is impossible; it can never appear anywhere but in a book of statistics.

With an export of $220,000,000 under the present tariff, the South organized separately would have $40,000,000 of revenue. With one fourth the present tariff she would have a revenue adequate to all her wants, for the South would never go to war; she would never need an army or a navy, beyond a few garrisons on the frontiers and a few revenue cutters. It is commerce that breeds war. It is manufactures that require to be hawked about the world, and give rise to navies and commerce. But we have nothing to do but to take off restrictions on foreign merchandise and open our ports, and the whole world will come to us to trade. They will be too glad to bring and carry for us, and we never shall dream of a war. Why the South has never yet had a just cause of war. Every time she has drawn her sword it has been on the point of honor, and that point of honor has been mainly loyalty to her sister colonies and sister States, who have ever since plundered and calumniated her.

But if there were no other reason why we should never have war, would any sane nation make war on cotton? Without firing a gun, without drawing a sword, should they make war on us we can bring the whole world to our feet. The South is perfectly competent to go on, one, two, or three years without planting a seed of cotton. I believe that if she was to plant but half her cotton for three years to come, it would be an immense advantage to her. I am not so sure but that after three total years' abstinence she would come out stronger than ever she was before and better prepared to enter afresh upon her great career of enterprise. What would happen if no cotton was furnished for three years? I will not stop to depict what every one can imagine, but this is certain: England would topple headlong and carry the whole civilized world with her, save the South. No, you dare not make war on cotton. No power on earth dares to make war upon it. Cotton is king. Until lately the Bank of England was king, but she tried to put her screws as usual, the fall before last, upon the cotton crop, and was utterly vanquished. The last power has been conquered. Who can doubt, that has looked at recent events, that cotton is supreme? When the abuse of credit had destroyed credit and annihilated confidence, when thousands of the strongest commercial houses in the world were coming down, and hundreds of millions of dollars of supposed property evaporating in thin air, when you came to a dead lock, and revolutions were threatened, what brought you up? Fortunately for you it was the commencement of the cotton season, and we have poured in upon you one million six hundred thousand bales of cotton just at the crisis to save you from destruction. That cotton, but for the bursting of your speculative bubbles in the North, which produced the whole of this convulsion, would have brought us $100,000,000. We have sold it for $65,000,000, and saved you. Thirty-five million dollars we, the slaveholders of the South, have put into the charity-box for your magnificent financiers, your cotton lords, your merchant princes.

But, sir, the greatest strength of the South arises from the harmony of her political and social institutions. This harmony gives her a frame of society, the best in the world, and an extent of political freedom, combined with entire security, such as no other people ever enjoyed upon the face of the earth. Society precedes government; creates it, and ought to control it; but as far as we can look back in historic times we find the case different; for government is no sooner created than it becomes too strong for society, and shapes and molds, as well as controls it. In later centuries the progress of civilization and of intelligence has made the divergence so great as to produce civil wars and revolutions; and it is nothing now but the want of harmony between governments and societies which occasions all the uneasiness and trouble and terror that we see abroad. It was this that brought on the American Revolution. We threw off a Government not adapted to our social system, and made one for ourselves. The question is, how far have we succeeded? The South, so far as that is concerned, is satisfied, harmonious, and prosperous.

In all social systems there must be a class to do the menial duties, to perform the drudgery of life. That is, a class requiring but a low order of intellect and but little skill. Its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement. It constitutes the very mud-sill of society and of political government; and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air, as to build either the one or the other, except on this mud-sill. Fortunately for the South, she found a race adapted to that purpose to her hand—a race inferior to her own, but eminently qualified in temper, in vigor, in docility, in capacity to stand the climate, to answer all her purposes. We use them for our purpose, and call them slaves. We found them slaves by the "common consent of mankind," which, according to Cicero, "lex natura est;" the highest proof of what is Nature's law. We are old-fashioned at the South yet; it is a word discarded now by "ears polite." I will not characterize that class at the North by that term; but you have it; it is there; it is everywhere; it is eternal.

The Senator from New York said yesterday that the whole world had abolished slavery. Ay, the name, but not the thing; all the powers of the earth cannot abolish it. God only can do it when he repeals the fiat, "the poor ye always have with you;" for the man who lives by daily labor, and scarcely lives at that, and who has to put out his labor in the market and take the best he can get for it; in short, your whole hireling class of manual laborers and "operatives," as you call them, are essentially slaves. The difference between us is, that our slaves are hired for life and well compensated; there is no starvation, no begging, no want of employment among our people, and not too much employment either. Yours are hired by the day, not cared for, and scantily compensated, which may be proved in the most painful manner, at any hour, in any street in any of your large towns. Why, you meet more beggars in one day, in any single street of the city of New York, than you would meet in a lifetime in the whole South. We do not think that whites should be slaves, either by law or necessity. Our slaves are black, of another and inferior race. The status in which we have placed them is an elevation. They are elevated from the condition in which God first created them, by being made our slaves. None of that race on the whole face of the globe can be compared with the slaves of the South. They are happy, content, unaspiring, and utterly incapable, from intellectual weakness, ever to give us any trouble by their aspirations. Yours are white, of your own race; you are brothers of one blood. They are your equals in natural endowment of intellect, and they feel galled by their degradation. Our slaves do not vote. We give them no political power. Yours do vote; and being the majority, they are the depositaries of all your political power. If they knew the tremendous secret, that the ballot-box is stronger than "an army with banners," and could combine, where would you be? Your society would be reconstructed, your government overthrown, your property divided, not as they have mistakenly attempted to initiate such proceedings by meeting in parks, with arms in their hands, but by the quiet process of the ballot-box. You have been making war upon us to our very hearth-stones. How would you like for us to send lecturers and agitators North, to teach these people this, to aid in combining, and to lead them?

Mr. WILSON and others. Send them along. Mr. HAMMOND. You say, send them along. There is no need of that. Your people are awakening. They are coming here. They are thundering at our doors for homesteads, one hundred and sixty acres of land for nothing, and southern Senators are supporting them. Nay, they are assembling, as I have said, with arms in their hands, and demanding work at $1,000 a year for six hours a day. Have you heard that the ghosts of Mendoza and Torquemada are stalking in the streets of your great cities; that the inquisition is at hand? There is afloat a fearful rumor that there have been consultations for vigilance committees. You know what that means.

Transient and temporary causes have thus far been your preservation. The great West has been open to your surplus population, and your hordes of semi-barbarian immigrants, who are crowding in year by year. They make a great movement, and you call it progress. Whither? It is progress; but it is progress towards vigilance committees. The South have sustained you in a great measure. You are our factors. You bring and carry for us. One hundred and fifty million dollars of our money passes annually through your hands. Much of it sticks; all of it assists to keep your machinery together and in motion. Suppose we were to discharge you; suppose we were to take our business out of your hands: we should consign you to anarchy and poverty.

You complain of the rule of the South: that has been another cause that has preserved you. We have kept the Government conservative to the great purposes of government. We have placed her, and kept her, upon the Constitution; and that has been the cause of your peace and prosperity. The Senator from New York says that that is about to be at an end; that you intend to take the Government from us; that it will pass from our hands. Perhaps what he says is true; it may be; but do not forget—it can never be forgotten; it is written on the brightest page of human history—that we, the slaveholders of the South, took our country in her infancy; and, after ruling her for sixty out of the seventy years of her existence, we shall surrender her to you without a stain upon her honor, boundless in prosperity, incalculable in her strength, the wonder and the admiration of the world. Time will show what you will make of her; but no time can ever diminish our glory or your responsibility.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. H. M. PHILLIPS, OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 9, 1858.

[REVISED BY HIMSELF.*]

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. PHILLIPS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It was my intention, as it yet would be my preference, to have forborne the expression of my views on this subject until the question of the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State was regularly brought to the notice of this House. But, limited as has been my experience in this House, it has sufficed to show me that opportunities of obtaining the floor are neither frequent nor certain, and that, if I relinquish it now, I may not again have the opportunity of proclaiming the sentiments which I enertain, the knowledge of which there are many who are entitled to have.

I look upon this question as one in which the peace of the Union is involved. I do not speak of its permanence, nor do I suppose that there is any real danger of its early dissolution. But when its peace is disturbed; when, from one extreme to the other, there is strife, there is contention, there is violence and tumult, where there should be quiet; it becomes, Mr. Chairman, an unwilling Union, the value of which all begin to calculate, and what may follow some day is much more easy to be anticipated than pleasant to be considered.

This subject of territorial legislation has been at all times prolific of discord. It was at the time of the attempt, and the successful attempt, at the introduction of Louisiana into the Union as a State, that an eminent gentleman from Massachusetts uttered in the Hall of the House of Representatives what I have no doubt those who hear me have read with deep regret that it was ever uttered there:

"If this bill passes, it is my deliberate opinion that it is virtually a dissolution of this Union; that it will free the States from their moral obligation, and as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, definitely to prepare for a separation; amicably, if they can; violently, if they must."

There are some here, too, Mr. Chairman, who can well recollect the excitement and the painful anxiety occasioned, in 1819 and 1820, by the admission of Missouri into the Union. And now, when a similar boon is asked for her neighbor that was then extended to Missouri herself, no man of truth will deny that there exists, throughout the length and breadth of this land, a feeling of solicitude and excitement; and that there is amongst the extremists an almost sacrilegious joy at the recurrence of events calculated to jar and disturb the harmony of the Union, which a bold attack can never produce.

Since her organization as a Territory, Kansas has known no peace. Since the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, Kansas has been the theater of strife and tumult. With everything to make her people happy and comfortable, with a richness of soil and purity of climate almost unequalled, it has been the scene of discord, of riot, of violence, and of bloodshed, and it is time now that these things should be stopped; Kansas calls upon us to stop them; the people of every State in the Union expect as much from us; and, Mr. Chairman, we must consider what is the effectual way of stopping them, and when we find that, we must apply the effective means, if we can do so, constitutionally, and in obedience to the recognized law of the land. Shall peace be restored by the Federal authorities, by the bayonets of the United States troops, by the more constant vigilance and attention of the soldiers or Federal officers, or shall it be restored by the people of Kansas herself? Shall she not be thrown at once upon her own resources, and shall not her citizens be told: "You shall be the conservators of your own peace, and if you are a law-abiding people—if you have a population, such as it has been boasted here over and over again that you have, we appeal to you to obey the law, to support the law, and to restore peace to your people in the State of Kansas?" Believing, as I do, that peace can be reestablished there permanently only by her admission as a State into this Union, and that the progress and prosperity of Kansas must begin to date from that act, I sincerely hope she will be admitted so soon as it is ascertained that she is in a condition entitling her to that privilege, and justifying us in according it.

I shall proceed, Mr. Chairman, to show that the admission of Kansas into this Union under her present application, and with the Lecompton constitution, is regular, is according to established principle, according to recognized precedent, and according to what some gentlemen on this floor dare not deny is good authority. If this be so, and she has a republican constitution, I say we have no right, regarding the peace and interests of our citizens, to hesitate for one moment to admit her. I shall do little more, in the limited time allowed me, than assert the principles that I maintain, using but little argument, but referring, perhaps, to a good deal of authority that ought to be recognized here, in support of them.

Was this territorial convention regular, is obviously the first question? Who disputes it? Does it require an enabling act? If it does, it has it. No man can read the Kansas-Nebraska act without seeing that there is an enabling act there. But does it require an enabling act? I tell the gentlemen upon this floor, who oppose the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, that I will appeal to those who have on former occasions spoken for them, and by whom I will judge whether it was regular or not. I will show the gentlemen who compose the majority of the Opposition that their views have been expressed in such a manner that they cannot now contradict them; while to those who compose its minority, I will cite the highest authorities recognized by any one of them.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Phillips.

Ho. OF REPS.

Mr. Chairman, why must an enabling act be passed? Have the people the right to form a constitution or not? And if they have not the right, has Congress the right to bestow it upon them? I shall quote, upon this subject, my colleague from the fourteenth district, [Mr. Grow,] and I cite him because, as the Republican candidate for Speaker, receiving more than eighty votes at the commencement of this session, he may be fairly considered the representative of the views and principles of that party, as he was formerly the exponent of them. I cite him as good authority—as authority from which those who indorsed him at the commencement of the session cannot now dissent. What said he when the application was made to admit Kansas into the Union with a constitution framed without an enabling act—framed, permit me to say, by men in rebellion to the laws and with arms in their hands, to be used against the Federal authorities? When Kansas came here, with the constitution thus made at Topeka, he eloquently pleaded for her admission as a State, as a measure of peace; and in support of the regularity of her action, he said:

"The mode and manner of accomplishing it in organized States properly belongs to the forms of law, to be prescribed by the State government; but in the Territories, Congress is the only power that can prescribe the forms; for a territorial government emanating from Congress can be changed, modified, or abrogated, only by its consent. That consent, however, can be expressed as well after as before the action of the people. If Congress, then, has prescribed no form, whatever action the people think proper to adopt, in order to secure a change of government, provided it be conducted in a peaceable manner, is lawful and constitutional; lawful, because it violates no valid law—constitutional, because article first of the amendments to the Constitution secures to the people everywhere under its jurisdiction the right, paramount to all law, peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

I want no better authority than my friend and colleague; and those who voted for him for Speaker of this House voted for him because they saw in him a proper representative of popular sovereignty, according to the doctrine he had expressed and they then maintained. But I have other authority; and I shall do little else than cite authorities, to which I wish the attention of those Democrats who, like the gentleman who has just spoken, [Mr. English,] have departed from us on this question. I have for those who, I am afraid, will not have the same confidence in my colleague that I have avowed, high authorities. I have the authority of Governor Robert J. Walker and of Mr. Secretary Stanton. They have said, in words and language not to be misunderstood, that the Lecompton convention was lawful. They have said that the act of the Territorial Legislature authorizing the convention was right; and they have warned the people over and over again, that, if they did not vote for delegates when they had the opportunity afforded them, on their own heads must be the consequences.

Mr. Stanton, on arriving in the Territory, addressed the people, saying, among other things:

"The Government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution with a view to making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention, and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention."

Again, in the message of the acting Governor in December last, and after what is now called the mischief had been done, he says:

"It thus appears that in the election of the 15th June last, for delegates to the convention, the great mass of the people purposely refrained from voting, and left the whole proceeding, with all its important consequences, to the active minority, under whose auspices the law had been enacted, and also executed, so far as that could be done by the executive officers, without the concurrence of the majority of the people.

"That the refusal of the majority to go into the election for delegates was unfortunate, is now too apparent to be denied. It has produced all the evils and dangers of the present critical hour. It has enabled a body of men, not actually representing the opinions of the people, though regularly and legitimately clothed with their authority, to prepare for them a form of government, and to withhold the greater part of its most important provisions from the test of popular judgment and sanction."

Governor Walker says very much the same:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage; but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency; and the absentees are as much bound under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative."

In many places he uses similar language. He says:

"If laws have been enacted by the Territorial Legislature which are disapproved of by a majority of the people of the Territory, the mode in which they could elect a new Territorial Legislature and repeal those laws, was also designated. If there are any grievances of which you have any just right to complain, the lawful, peaceful manner in which you could remove them, in subordination to the Government of your country, was also pointed out."

Again:

"In the case of Michigan, the Territorial Legislature were clothed by Congress with no authority to assemble a constitutional convention and adopt a State constitution; but that, under the comprehensive language of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, the Territorial Legislature was clothed with such authority by the laws of Congress, and that the authority of such a convention to submit the constitution to the vote of the people, was as clear and certain as that of Congress itself, and that opposition to such a proceeding was equivalent to opposing the laws of Congress."

Thus cursorily, Mr. Chairman, because it is not very important, I have referred to the authority of the leading men in the Opposition, to show that the territorial convention was properly created, and was a regular and lawful body. Now, what was it to do? It did not submit its proceedings to the people. It would have been better, perhaps, that it had. It is right on all such occasions to do so. But is there any law requiring it? And if there is no law requiring it, what guarantee have we that future legislation in that Territory will be better than the past? Shall we be told that there is any obligation of law requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people? If so, I will again refer to the authority of Governor Walker, to show that he distinctly told them, in advance of the election, that there was no such obligation.

Governor Walker says:

"You should not console yourselves, my fellow-citizens, with the reflection that you may, by a subsequent vote, defeat the ratification of the constitution. Although most anxious to secure to you the exercise of that great constitutional right, and believing that the convention is the servant, and not the master of the people, yet I have no power to dictate the proceedings of that body."

"The only remedy rests with the convention itself, by submitting, if they deem best, the constitution for ratification or rejection, to the vote of the people, under such just and reasonable qualifications as they may prescribe."

We find, then, that there was no recognized law requiring a submission of the constitution to the vote of the people; and the question now is, Mr. Chairman, what was done, and how far did that meet the public expectation? Mr. Walker, as I have said, told them in advance that there was no power to compel the convention to submit their work to the vote of the people. And yet, with all that before them, those who are now called the majority in that Territory, absented themselves from the polls and refused to participate in the proceedings. What was the convention to do? I agree that it did not submit the constitution to the vote of the people. They were authorized to form a constitution, and they had the right to do so. The gentleman who has preceded me, [Mr. English,] has said that some of the delegates to the convention broke their party pledges; that they pledged themselves to a certain course of conduct and did not fulfill their promises. Agreed for the purpose of argument, but does that violate the law? Does that prevent the organic law going into effect in the manner prescribed in the instrument? He will hardly assert that the dishonesty or treachery of a member of a legislative body can affect its decrees, so that if the fact even be as he states it, it cannot operate upon the validity of a law. If it would, where would safety be found? The same thing might occur again, and another election present a new set of men violating party and other promises. But what did they do? They submitted to the people, not the constitution, but the question whether they should have slavery among them; and I believe that if the people had voted, under the circumstances to which I shall by and by allude, the constitution would not now contain that clause which to many on the floor of the House is so obnoxious.

Now I propose to show, by the same authorities, that the slavery question was the only question that was dividing the people of Kansas. I cite again my colleague, [Mr. Grow,] to show that the slavery question was then, as it always has been, the only subject of division in that Territory. He said "the existence of slavery was the only question on which the people were divided; and the vote for delegates to the convention settled that by a majority of legal votes."

Mr. GROW. Will my colleague give the date, if he pleases?

Mr. PHILLIPS. The 30th of June, 1856, when the Topeka constitution was submitted; which constitution, by the way, received, I believe, only some seventeen hundred votes.

Mr. GROW. Twenty-three hundred.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I am reminded that my colleague was then chairman of the Committee on Territories; and that gives additional weight and emphasis to his statement. He spoke by authority. He stated this opinion on that occasion, and I do not believe he will deny it now. He has changed once, but I do not believe he will change in reference to this subject.

Mr. GROW. Whether I have changed or not is a question of fact.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will raise no question of fact between my colleague and myself. My colleague, on that occasion, further said, in reply to the inquiry of an honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TRIPPE:]

"I gave to the gentleman from New York the vote polled at the election immediately preceding the formation of the constitution. He knows, as well as any man, that the only question in Kansas on which the people are divided is, whether slavery shall exist there or not? That question was involved in the election of Delegates. He knows, too, that that is the only question to be settled."

It has not changed since then. If any other question has been raised since that time, I challenge any gentleman upon this floor to tell me what it is. If there is any other question on which the people of Kansas are divided, I ask any gentleman on this floor to rise in his place and tell me what it is. As it stood then, so it stands now.

Mr. GROW. If my colleague desires an answer, I will give it to him; though I do not like to interrupt him.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield the floor to my colleague for that purpose.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman inquires if there is any other question than that of slavery, of difference between the people of Kansas? That was at the first the great question of division between them, as he has stated; but, sir, since the invasion on the 30th of March, another question has arisen. They believed that at that time a government was forced upon them, which was illegal, by force; and since that time this question has, to a great extent, taken the place of the slavery question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The 30th of March of what year?

Mr. GROW. It was in 1855. It was then that this invasion occurred, which forced upon the Territory of Kansas a government which the people held that they were under no moral obligation to respect. This question has developed itself more and more, as the question of slavery has subsided. I believe gentlemen will agree with me on all sides that, after a certain time, it was generally conceded that Kansas could not be made permanently a slave State.

35TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Phillips.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Well, sir, my colleague's speech was made fifteen months after the invasion; and the question of slavery he then said was the only question in issue. [Laughter.] He is good authority in this particular, and I like to quote him. But, sir, I have other authority, for I see that he is not satisfied with himself as authority on this question. I will back my colleague up with so much that he will not be ashamed of the position he then took. Governor Walker said:

"The President asked me to undertake the settlement of that momentous question [that means slavery] which has introduced discord and civil war throughout your borders, and threatens to involve you and our country in the same common ruin."

He tells them:

"I cannot too earnestly impress upon you the necessity of removing the slavery agitation from the Halls of Congress and presidential conflicts."

And again:

"That in no contingency will Congress admit Kansas as a slave or free State, unless a majority of the people of Kansas shall first have fairly and freely decided this question for themselves."

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I would like to ask my colleague whether the question of slavery was ever submitted?

Mr. PHILLIPS. If the gentleman wants to know, I can tell him that it was submitted, and surely he will not deny it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I do deny it most emphatically. The question of the importation of slaves from other States was submitted, and was the only one submitted. The question of the existence of slavery there was never submitted. Slavery now exists in Kansas, and by that constitution is fastened upon the people of Kansas now and forever.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I am glad my colleague has defined his position on that subject. We will know where to find him hereafter.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. There is no trouble in finding me at any time.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will show my colleague that the question of slavery was submitted to the people of Kansas. The constitution had been made, and the slavery question was the only one submitted. They were told that it would be submitted; but they were told, they were warned, that if they did not vote, they delegated their rights to those who did vote. They were told by Governor Walker, they were told by Secretary Stanton, that such would be the effect of absents themselves and withholding their votes. They were never told that the constitution itself would be submitted to the people; for the Legislature had not undertaken to direct the convention to do it, but left it to the convention itself.

Why, sir, some years ago, in Pennsylvania, when it was undertaken to change the constitution of that State, when the law was passed by the Legislature for calling a convention, one of the most distinguished lawyers living, one of those who gave the fame and name of "a Philadelphia lawyer," which I am afraid those who came after do not so well deserve, objected to the law on the ground—and I trust I may be considered as reading it now, (Appendix A,)—because it undertook to tell the convention in what form the constitution would be submitted and adopted. The law provided that, after the convention had finished their labors, they should adjourn for four months, not to submit the question to the people, but so that the members could learn the will of their constituents, by familiar intercourse between the representatives and constituents, and then act in accordance. William Lewis put upon record his dissent to this feature of the law, on the ground that the Legislature, an inferior body, had no right to undertake to control the convention, a superior body, composed of delegates just fresh from the people—a direct emanation of the people. Will my colleague tell me why an inferior body should prescribe rules for the government of a superior body? Will he, with all his ideas of popular sovereignty, tell me what body he recognizes higher than a convention of delegates selected by the people to frame a constitution for them?

I agree that the convention of Kansas ought to have submitted the constitution which they had framed to a vote of the people; it would have been better to do so, though I do not believe that it would have removed the difficulty, because, from the earliest moment, it seems to have been determined by the professing majority that they would have rule or ruin. Their absents themselves from the polls was not accidental. It was the result of deliberation and combination; and now, forsooth, when things have been regularly done, and the convention has given to the people the decision of the only question which those high in authority have pronounced as the only one upon which the people differed, they turn round and say that a majority did not vote, and ask you if you will take that as an expression of the will of the majority, when only a minority voted.

I have some instances, with which my colleagues are familiar, in which a minority have made a constitution, and have amended it; and I say to them that, on almost every occasion on which the question of amending the constitution has been before the people of Pennsylvania, a majority of the people have not voted for it; but still it has been carried by the votes of a minority of the voters. When there is a contest about men, there is an anxiety of feeling; but when the contest is one of principle, of establishing organic law—men may talk as much as they please, but I put facts against arguments—the minority seem to control, for the majority do not vote. It may be that they did not feel an interest in the question; that they had no time, and perhaps no desire, to look into the question involved; or they have had confidence in those who prepared the constitution or amendments; but certain it is, for some reason, be it what it may, they failed to vote.

In 1835, the people of Pennsylvania were called upon to vote either for or against a constitutional convention, as they pleased. The same year, upon the same day, and at the same election, there was a contest for Governor. The number of people who voted for Governor was one hundred and ninety-nine thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven—within two hundred and seventy-three of two hundred thousand. The votes in favor of calling a convention to revise the constitution were eighty-six thousand five hundred and seventy. What will gentlemen say to this. The convention was legally called. Nobody doubted the truth of the doctrine proclaimed by Governor Walker, that those who did vote controlled those who did not. Eighty-six thousand votes only, out of two hundred thousand voters, called that convention. We have another remarkable instance. When the new constitution was submitted and adopted by the people of Pennsylvania, in 1838, two hundred and fifty thousand one hundred and forty-six people voted for Governor, and yet the new constitution was adopted with only one hundred and thirteen thousand nine hundred and seventy-one voting for it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Had all the people the right to vote in the case of Kansas?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I know of none who were excluded from voting.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. There were nineteen counties in Kansas that had not the right to vote.

Mr. PHILLIPS. That is begging the question. My colleague knows that those who do not choose to exercise their rights have no rights.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. They had no right.

Mr. PHILLIPS. It is very well to find a pretext when one wants to find fault.

Another instance has occurred in Pennsylvania, since my colleague has been a member of this Congress. While there were three hundred and sixty thousand votes polled at the election in 1857, for Governor, the highest vote polled both for and against the proposed amendments to the constitution was less than forty per cent. of that number. For one of the amendments the highest vote cast was one hundred and seventeen thousand one hundred and forty-three, and twenty-one thousand four hundred and twelve against it. One hundred and thirty-eight thousand five hundred and fifty-three out of three hundred and sixty-three thousand and eighty-one voters in Pennsylvania adopted those amendments; and under those circumstances I have no doubt my colleague will acknowledge that the amendments have been adopted and are a part of the organic law of Pennsylvania.

Now, in the case of Kansas, if the election was a legal and a lawful election, those who stayed at home, as Governor Walker says, authorized those who did go to the polls to act for them. The convention having submitted to the people the only question in issue, and the people having voted upon it, it remains a part of the constitution.

I have thus shown, I trust, that there is no law requiring the constitution to be submitted to a vote of the people. If there is any such, I have not been able to find it. All principle, precedent, and, I was going to say, very much of practice is against it.

Now, let us consider what the constitution is. In the first place, is there a doubt that the people may wipe away every provision of it as with a breath? What is a constitution? A State constitution differs very materially from the national constitution. Gentlemen who cite the Federal Constitution, though upon the side I am endeavoring to sustain, are in error. The Congress of the United States can do nothing which the Constitution does not authorize. Our powers are limited; our hands are tied; and for what we do we must find our authority in the Constitution. In regard to a State constitution, exactly the reverse is the case. The members of a State Legislature may do every act of legislation which the constitution does not restrain nor prohibit. There can be no doubt about that; and I need cite no precedent for such a plain and recognized principle. When we came to form a Federal Constitution, it was accomplished by the surrender of certain powers by the States themselves. Distributed as the powers of government usually are, the legislative body of a State has the sovereign legislative power of the State, controlled and limited only by the constitution. The national Constitution is an enlarging, a granting, instrument: not so, however, with a State constitution; it is a restraining instrument; and, if the constitution of Kansas has restrained either the people at any time, or the Legislature until after 1864, I have been unable to discover it. I say, too, if the restraint does apply, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KERR] undertook to assert, the constitution would not be republican, according to my notions.

Mr. Chairman, this clause of the Constitution, so much talked about, it seems to me has not been rightly applied. There are two or three clauses in the constitution of Kansas which we must look at in this connection. The clause which prohibits an alteration of the constitution until after the year 1864, operates only upon the Legislature; and it interferes in no manner with that other clause by which the right of the people is expressly reserved and recognized. I should contend for the right of the people at all events; but when gentlemen stand here and say that they are opposed to the admission of Kansas because the constitution is not a good one; when they are willing that this strife should continue in Kansas; I want to say to them—not that I expect to convince anybody, for I fear that we rush too blindly to conclusions on political matters for that—that there is in this constitution of Kansas an express recognition of the people's right to change their constitution when they please. Those gentlemen who undertake to say that they are restrained from doing so until 1864, fall into an error in confounding the application of that section with the section which applies solely and exclusively to the people. This right of the people is recognized everywhere. It is recognized in the Declaration of Independence, which declares the self-evident truth:

"That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

The constitution of Kansas recognizes it in the fullest possible manner, and that clause which relates to 1864 is operative only upon the Legislature, and in language so plain that no man can doubt, except those who choose willfully to do so.

Now, sir, those two clauses are not inconsistent. The one applies to the people and the other to the Legislature. This enumeration of rights says the constitution shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask my colleague a question, for I really feel some interest in his opinion upon this point. I understand him to say that the clause of the constitution forbidding a change before 1864 applies to the Legislature. I understand him to say that another provision of the constitution provides for a change by the people before 1864, or after, as the case may be.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes, sir, at any time.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Now, sir, what I propose to ask my colleague is in the way of a practical question: I find that the resolution of the Democratic convention of our own State, which has just adjourned, contends for this same power, and says the people have it by "regular process." Now, I want to know from him how he would propose that the people should exercise the power?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will tell the gentleman. They shall petition the Legislature, who shall authorize them to have a convention.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. But the Legislature have no power before 1864.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The gentleman is wrong. The Legislature have power to propose legislative amendments at any time, and the restraint upon them is only after that time. I have a number of precedents upon that point. The constitution of Pennsylvania imposes a similar restraint upon the Legislature; and yet my colleague will not rise here and tell us that the people of Pennsylvania are so restrained, and cannot have a convention.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I contend that they are not restrained. They have a high revolutionary right to change their government, just as the people of Kansas have; but it is not a right by "regular process."

Mr. PHILLIPS. Well, I contend for the right by regular process. I want to put down the exercise of these revolutionary rights in Kansas. I want to substitute regular process for the strong arm of violence, with which the Territory has been too long governed.

The people of Pennsylvania may have a convention when they please, but the Legislature cannot propose amendments oftener than once in five years. There are two sections in the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania similar to the two in Kansas; one acknowledging and declaring the right of the people at all times, and the other preventing and restraining hasty and too frequent legislative action. I will refer my colleague to a precedent. In 1776, Pennsylvania had a convention, over which Benjamin Franklin presided, and they framed a constitution which contained a clause in reference to the right of the people, in similar phraseology to the clause in the constitution of Kansas. And it contained another clause ten times as strong as the one in the Kansas constitution, which provided that there should be a council of censors, two thirds of whom should propose amendments to the people. (Appendix B.) The censors met and would not propose amendments to the people. A majority were in favor of it; but not the requisite two thirds. They adjourned over till another year. The people then tried again to have their constitution amended by what they supposed was the only "regular process," but the council of censors again refused. The constitution was defective in many things. It had some good things in it, but it was imperfect, and its radical defect was that it provided for but one branch of the Legislature. When the council of censors refused to call a convention to propose amendments, or to propose amendments themselves, the majority of that council addressed the people, and, speaking of those who opposed the measure, said, "Their sullen no in this council cannot rob you of your birthright."

They did not consider it a gift, an acquired right; they claimed it as a born-right, a birth-right, of which they could not be deprived, especially by a clause operative only upon that council, and ineffectual upon the people whose rights and powers had been preserved by the other clause.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. That was revolution.

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, sir; it was not revolution; it was regular process. It was put upon the ground that there was a reservation in that constitution similar to the one here, and that that reservation was to be construed as I am contending that this ought to be construed now. The Legislature took the same ground. It was opposed then as it is opposed now. It was insisted that the "regular process" was the process of the council of censors. But the Legislature overruled that, and said, "You gentlemen who compose the council of censors may propose amendments, and if you do, it must be in the form prescribed; but the people have, at the same time, the right to amend or reform the constitution at their pleasure;" and the Legislature declared, and the people exercised this right. This was not done without a struggle of mind and argument; the minority insisting that the only regular process was through the council of censors, and that any other attempted mode was in itself a violation of the constitution, presented plausible, yet unsound, reasons for their opposition to the call of a convention. A constitution was framed in 1790; it had in it no clause providing for its change or amendment. Yet who dared to dispute the right of the people to have a change when they desired it? They have the undoubted and hitherto undenied right either to make an entire constitution or to amend the existing instrument.

Mr. Chairman, what is this clause in the constitution of Kansas?

"SEC. 14. After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention; and if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall at its next regular session call a convention." &c.

Now, will any gentleman upon this floor contend that that section interferes with the other clause, giving to the people the right to amend their constitution?

Mr. STANTON. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he holds that, where a power is granted, and the mode of executing it is prescribed, it can be exercised in any other mode except that prescribed?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Of course not; but I tell the gentleman from Ohio that there is express power granted to the people, and that there is no restriction upon the Legislature until after 1864. This is not a grant of power, but a restraint upon it. When you undertake to restrain a legislative body, and to deprive them of rights, you say it in words that cannot be misunderstood. I have the authority here, which the gentleman will recognize, of the Topeka constitution. [Laughter.] The Topekaites knew how to restrict the Legislature, when they wanted to do it.

I have said that this clause is operative only upon the Legislature; but I mean to show that it is not operative until after 1864. Will the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] a good and eminent lawyer as he is, undertake to say that he is not familiar with law after law beginning, that after such a day such and such shall be the law? And will he rise here and assert that it will be the law until the day specified arrives? I will show the gentleman the language which is used when the object is to prohibit anything being done before or up to a given day. I read from the Topeka constitution, this Republican instrument which it is insisted shall be the basis of the admission of Kansas:

"SEC. 4. No convention for the formation of a new constitution shall be called, and no amendment to the constitution shall be, by the General Assembly, made before the year 1865, nor more than once in five years thereafter."

They recognized the difference between the two—the people and the Legislature. When conventions want to prohibit the exercise of that power they use language that cannot be misunderstood. If any one takes up the statute-books of the United States he will find hundreds of laws beginning, that from and after a particular day there shall be such law, and surely no member will argue before this body that before the time specified the law is operative or in force. I say that this clause in the constitution of Kansas is not of any effect whatever till 1864. It then takes its place there, if not previously altered or expunged. It may not have been so intended. The Topeka constitution is very different. It prohibits the amendment of the constitution effectually before the year 1865. If this clause was intended to have a different effect, its framers have overreached themselves. If it was intended for good, I can very well understand the argument that, having made a new constitution, and infallibility not being allotted to man, legislative amendments should be encouraged up to 1864; so that, by that time, experience might show its merits or defects. But at that time, the constitution having been six years in existence, it was thought should not be changed by hasty legislative action, nor except by two thirds, and in a more deliberate manner than previously. If the motive was bad, then these men have signally overshot their mark. I say you cannot take up the statutes of State Legislatures, or the acts of Congress, without finding laws enacting that after a day such shall be the law; and if that has been construed to mean that the law should not go into effect till that time, I want to see the judge who would construe differently a restriction contained in this clause upon the legislative power.

I hold the doctrine that the Legislature of a State has all the sovereign legislative power, except such as is for necessary purposes reserved, either expressly or by implication, to the people. It is not new doctrine that I am enunciating here; but I have been astonished at the ground taken by some members in this matter. I do not know that they want, willfully, to pervert the condition of things; but the idea is absurd that, because a certain clause in a constitution declares that the Legislature shall be restricted, after a certain time arrives, from amending it, except in a particular way, that it is to be construed so as to restrain their action before that time arrives. Until after 1864 it is inoperative, as though it had been said that the clause should not be inserted in the constitution till that time arrives.

I quarrel with no man because he differs in opinion with me. I agree with the gentleman who last spoke in not deeming it essential whether this is made a party test or not. I believe that this constitution has been framed with all the requirements of recognized law; and I, for one, will never sanction the rebellion that created resistance to it from the moment of its inception. I have given the highest authority, among the opponents of the admission of Kansas, to show that it was regular in everything, down to its submission to a vote of the people. I have pointed gentlemen to the case of the constitution of my own State made in 1790, which was not submitted to the people, and it remained unaltered for forty-eight years. I can refer them to State after State, whose constitutions were not so submitted. The State of Indiana had a provision in her constitution that it should only be amended every twelfth year; but a new constitution was made in another year, and was accepted without a murmur of illegality. The man who would attempt to restrain the exercise of sovereign power by the people, would meet that doom which every public man would want to avoid.

Now, what do we gain by admitting Kansas with this Lecompton constitution? In the first place, do we violate any principle? If we do, I will not vote for it. Popular sovereignty! A great respect the professed majority in Kansas can have for popular sovereignty when they come here with their Topeka constitution, and say that the people of Kansas cannot and shall not amend their constitution for eight or nine years! Suppose this is a bad constitution! Suppose that it admits slavery, and that the people do not want it there! I do not believe that slavery can exist there; I have not an idea that it can; and as it cannot exist there as an institution, I would rather see it out of the constitution. I do not object to the existence of slavery in a State where the people desire it. I do not want it in my State; but I do not object to the fullest enjoyment of it in a State where the people desire its existence. But whether it is the slavery or any other clause that is obnoxious to the people, I put my finger on the clause that the people may alter their constitution when they think proper; and I challenge gentlemen to point to any clause which says that it prohibits the amendment of the constitution at any time—immediately, if the people choose it.

These are the views that I entertain. Unlike the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] who preceded me, I have no apology to offer for avowing the principles I hold, and which have been adopted by the party to which I am proud to belong—that party through which alone the harmony of the country can be preserved. To me, it is immaterial whether this act shall, or shall not, be accompanied by a declaration or condition by Congress that the people shall have, at all times, the right of altering their constitution. You might as well insert a declaration that the sun shines; the two propositions are equally plain, without the declaration of them. I will vote for such a declaration, for it asserts expressly only what is there by necessary implication; and because, if there be any room for doubt, it will remove that doubt. I will vote for it in any way; either as a declaration, a proviso, or a condition; although I believe it is there already. Recognizing the right of the people of Kansas to alter their constitution when they please; and recognizing the right of the Legislature, at any time before the year 1864, by the vote of a bare majority, to propose amendments, if the people do not wish to go through the form of having the entire constitution changed, and if they are only dissatisfied on one clause; and entertaining the belief that the admission of Kansas into the Union is a measure of national peace, and that the strife which would follow its rejection would envelop and affect every man in the country, I most earnestly trust that calm counsels will prevail, and that the matter may be put in such a shape as the gentleman from Indiana has just hoped it might be, to command the votes of himself and others. I hope there may be no dissensions in a party on which depend the success and quiet of the country; and I promise gentlemen that, if that is done, there will be no more disaffection nor disorder; because I do not believe that the people of Kansas are so suicidal or so fratricidal as to continue dissensions and discords when the Federal Government shall have removed its forces from the Territory, and relieved it from territorial dependence. If that be the result, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all will be satisfied who have contributed to bring it about.

Resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this House, it is expedient and proper for the good people of this Commonwealth to choose a convention for the purpose of reviewing and, if they see occasion, altering and amending, the constitution of this State.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this House, a convention being chosen and met, it would be expedient, just, and reasonable, that the convention should publish their amendments and alterations, for the consideration of the people, and adjourn at least four months previous to confirmation."

Protest of William Lewis.

"I dissent, because, although I admit, in the fullest extent, that it will be proper for the convention to submit to the consideration of the people the plan of government which may be formed, and, although I fervently wish that sufficient time will be afforded them to deliberate thereon, I am so far from being satisfied of the right of this House to enter into any resolutions respecting it, that I cannot but consider them as unwarrantable assumptions of power. The resolution agreed to must be intended to have some weight and influence with the convention, or it would not have been proposed; and as that weight and influence, so far as they operate, must tend to prevent the unbiased exercise of their own minds, in a matter submitted to them by the people, and not by this House, they must be highly improper. An adjournment by the convention is a thing in itself so desirable, that were its members to be appointed by this House, and to derive their authority from it, I should not only be for recommending, but directing the measure. But the convention must be chosen by the people, in whom alone the authority is lodged, and will derive all their powers from them. They will sit, and they ought to act, both as to adjournments, and in all other respects, independent of this House, and should not, in the one case, any more than in others, be influenced by it. Being to be chosen by the same people with ourselves, it is rather assuming in us to suppose that their wisdom, virtue, or discretion will be less than our own, and unless we distrust their prudent exercise thereof, it does not become us, to whom the business does not appertain, to dictate to those to whom it belongs. They will doubtless receive from their constituents as they may think proper to give, but ought not to receive any from us, who, as a body, have no right to interfere, and who, as individuals, will have a voice with other members of the community.

"The people may think that an adjournment of four months is too long or too short, and may recommend as they may think proper; but we have no right to think or to act for them. If we have a right to resolve that an adjournment is proper, we must have an equal right to resolve that it is improper; or that any matter in the formation of the government is right or wrong, according to the prevailing ideas in this House. In our resolution respecting the election and the meeting of the convention, we are authorized by the wishes of the people, manifested to us; but we have no authority of our own, and are not warranted by them to proceed further. When the convention meet, they will look to the source of their authority for instructions and recommendations, both as to adjourning, and as to other matters, and act with a prudent discretion therein; and as that discretion ought not to be biased by any supposed influence of this House, I dissent from the resolution, as being calculated to intrench on the rights of the people and on the free deliberations of their representatives in convention, and have recorded my reasons in justification of my conduct."

From the Constitution of Pennsylvania, of 1776.

"In order that the freedom of this Commonwealth may be preserved inviolate forever, there shall be chosen by ballot, by the freemen in each city and county respectively on the second Tuesday of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, and on the second Tuesday in October, in every seventh year thereafter, two persons in each city and county of this State, to be called the Council of Censors, who shall meet together on the second Monday of November next ensuing their election; the majority of whom shall be a quorum in every case, except as to calling a convention, in which two thirds of the whole number elected shall agree, and whose duty it shall be to inquire whether the constitution has been preserved inviolate in every part; and whether the legislative and executive branches of government have performed their duty, as guardians of the people, or assumed to themselves, or exercised, other or greater powers than they are entitled to by the constitution; they are also to inquire whether the public taxes have been justly laid and collected in all parts of this Commonwealth, in what manner the public moneys have been disposed of, and whether the laws have been duly executed. For these purposes they shall have power to send for persons, papers, and records; they shall have authority to pass public censures, to order impeachments, and to recommend to the Legislature the repealing of such laws as appear to them to have been enacted contrary to the principles of the constitution.

"These powers they shall continue to have for and during the space of one year from the day of their election, and no longer. The said council of censors shall also have power to call a convention, to meet within two years after their sitting, if there appears to them an absolute necessity of amending any article of the constitution which may be defective, explaining such as may be thought not clearly expressed, and of adding such as are necessary for the preservation of the rights and happiness of the people; but the articles to be amended, and the amendments proposed, and such articles as are proposed to be added or abolished, shall be promulgated at least six months before the day appointed for the election of such convention, for the previous consideration of the people, that they may have an opportunity of instructing their delegates on the subject."

Reasons for dissenting from the call of a Convention.

"Because we are of opinion that this House is not competent to the subject. We are delegated for the special purposes of legislation, agreeably to the constitution. Our authority is derived from it and limited by it. We are bound by the sanction of our solemn oaths to do nothing injurious to it, and the good people of Pennsylvania have, in the constitution, declared the only mode in which they will exercise 'the right of a community to reform, alter, or abolish government,' as being the manner most conducive to the public weal.

"Because this measure at once infringes the solemn compact entered into by the people of this State with each other, to be ruled by fixed principles; will render every form of government precarious and unstable; encourage factions, in their beginning contemptible for numbers, by a persevering opposition to any administration, to hope for success; and subject the lives and liberties of the good people of this Commonwealth, and all law and government, to uncertainty; render everything that is dear subject to the caprice of a factious and corrupt majority in the legislature; destroy all confidence in our government; and prevent foreigners from giving that preference to Pennsylvania as an asylum from oppression which we have hitherto experienced."

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, March 15, 1858.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, and Mr. WADE having concluded his speech in opposition to the bill, the debate was continued as follows:

MR. MASON. In the remarks which I am to submit on the subject before the Senate, I desire to review as briefly as I may the history of the events and causes which have brought the question of African bondage into discussion before the American Congress, in connection with the expansion of the country in the addition of new States.

The question of slavery, as it has existed upon this continent now for more than two hundred years, was, before our colonial independence, a subject of no contention whatever between the colonies—none that I have been able to trace. It was found, after the Declaration of Independence, when the colonies, before that time perfectly independent of each other, came together to form a common Government, in a spirit of fraternity that I wish could actuate States and statesmen now, that the existence of African bondage was, to a large extent, confined to the southern States; but still it existed in all the States. The subject of this form of servitude became a question of discussion in the Federal convention, upon the inquiry whether those subject to it should be treated, in the formation of the Government, as an element of political power. It constituted a part of their population; it was their property, conceded on all hands; and it became immediately a sine qua non to the formation of any common Government, on the part of the southern colonies, that their African slaves should constitute an element of political power in the colonies where they were found. It was a subject of great debate, as all Senators know who have looked back into the history of the country.

Many most disturbing questions arose in that convention—questions naturally springing out of the dissimilarity of interests and the dissimilarity of their pursuits or labor—questions between the planting States and the commercial and navigating States, and other questions that arose upon the demand of the smaller States to stand as equals in the Confederacy, by an equality of representation in one branch of the national Councils; but there lay at the bottom of all, as was conceded by the patriots and statesmen of that day, this question of domestic servitude in the population of the southern States, as the most difficult to adjust. Senators will find, in looking back to the proceedings of that convention, that one of its greatest minds, and most illustrious members—I mean the late James Madison—when there seemed to be almost an irreconcilable rupture between the large and the small States, on the question of equal representation, told them, all that could be overcome; should they go back and settle the political relations of African bondsmen in the Confederacy, they would find the rest of more easy adjustment. It was done, and resulted in the stipulations of the second section and first article of the Constitution, by which three fifths of the slaves were to be computed in fixing decennially the ratio of representation, thus constituting the slave population an element of political power.

Now, sir, statesmen may look at this subject as they please, but they will be brought, of necessity, back to this very question of representation of the slaves as the true point of division between the different sections of the country. Sir, if it was fixed by the Constitution as an element of political power in the South, the sickly sentiment of the North, now so sedulously nursed by their politicians, against African bondage, would find little sympathy at their hands. Let us meet the question, then, as men and as statesmen, and, I trust, also as patriots.

When did it first arise since the Confederation—I mean the question of political power in the Confederacy resulting from this slave representation? It was first agitated in the attempt made in the year 1820, upon a question exactly such as agitates our councils now—the admission of a new State into the Confederacy. What was attempted then? To make it a condition of admission that the State should abolish slavery within her limits; and, if I recollect aright the history of that day, a distinguished Senator on this floor, then representing the State of New York, (Rufus King,) frankly avowed that the purpose of the condition was to impair the political power of the southern States. He honestly avowed it. Without subterfuge or evasion, it was then frankly avowed, that the condition sought to be imposed on Missouri, was to prevent the expansion of political power in the South, by the constitutional right of slave representation.

What was the result? The State of Missouri, then constituting a part of that large country derived by us from France as the Territory of Louisiana, was admitted upon condition—a condition unknown to the Constitution. The State of Missouri was admitted upon condition that a parallel of latitude should be drawn across the whole Territory of Louisiana; and whilst slavery should be excluded north of it, there was no guarantee that it should be admitted south of it. The prohibition was that north of the parallel of 36° 30', this involuntary servitude, as it was termed, should be forever excluded. And this unconstitutional restriction became handed down, in the traditional history of the times, as the "Missouri compromise."

Mr. President, I have yet to see the southern statesman, looking back to the history of that day, and to the consequences which followed, who does not deplore in his heart that a final stand on the part of the southern States, based on the securities of the Constitution, was not made there and then, and no step taken backwards. But the law passed, Missouri was admitted upon condition that involuntary servitude, except for crime, should be forever prohibited north of the line prescribed; and that passed, as I have said, in the traditional history of the day, as a compromise.

Well, we have believed, on our side, ever since that, compromise or no compromise, it had no warrant in constitutional law. Time ran by, and it was acquiesced in. There was no express agreement, but a sort of tacit understanding, for the peace and repose of the country, that if, on one side they would fairly commit themselves to that line, we would assent that slavery should not extend north of it if they would assent that it should be extended south of it. How were we met? This line honorable Senators from the North, and those whom they represent, now speak of as a line founded in sacred compact, that was intended to give repose and peace to the country, and did give it; and yet when in after years further territory was acquired west of the territory of Louisiana, and the proposition was made to carry out the "compromise" by extending the line, it was met by a decided refusal. Here, in 1848, when we were organizing the Territory of Oregon, it was insisted that this interdict should be placed on that Territory, far north as it was, and the proposition was made—not from me; I had the honor then of a seat upon this floor, but no such proposition ever came from me—but a proposition was made from southern men, again, if they could, to secure the repose and peace of the country by extending that line to the Pacific; and according to my recollection, almost every vote from the northern States was against it.

So far to the contrary were they, indeed, from adhering to any compromise, that on the very first proposition to organize a territorial government in one of the new Territories, public men, representing the interests of the non-slaveholding States, exhumed from the dust of a half century the ordinance of 1787, and presented it to the country as a chart of republican freedom from our fathers, containing within it, as they alleged, a repudiation of the condition of slavery, and recommended it for a like interdict in all the new Territories, giving birth to what was called, from the gentleman who first presented it, the "Wilmot proviso." The ordinance of 1787, or this clause in the ordinance, has been resorted to from that day to this, as evidence that, even before the foundation of the present Government, our fathers looked to a power in the United States to affect, by emancipation or otherwise, the condition of African bondage on the continent.

Now, Mr. President, the people of that day have all passed from among us, but they have left some memorials behind; and I have one here from the same venerated man to whom I have before alluded, showing in what policy that clause in the ordinance of 1787 was founded. It was not intended in any manner to affect the condition of African bondage, as it then existed upon the continent. It was aimed as a blow against the foreign African slave trade, and nothing more. I will read it. In a letter addressed by Mr. Madison, in 1819, to Robert Walsh, then, I think the editor of an abolition newspaper in Philadelphia—

Mr. SEWARD. He edited a newspaper. You said an abolition newspaper.

Mr. MASON. I did.

Mr. SEWARD. I never knew that.

Mr. MASON. That is my recollection. I will say a newspaper.*

* Mr. MASON is not certain that Mr. Walsh's newspaper was established in Philadelphia so early as 1819. But his recollection is distinct, that, after the slave question arose in 1820, he did conduct an abolition press in that city.

Mr. SEWARD. I am glad to know that he was.

Mr. MASON. Unlike the honorable Senator, I was a boy in those days, and take it from history and tradition. In a letter to Robert Walsh dated November 27, 1819, Mr. Madison said:

"With respect to what has taken place in the Northwest-ern Territory, it may be observed, that the ordinance giving its distinctive character on the subject of slaveholding, proceeded from the old Congress, acting with the best intentions, but under a charter which contains no shadow of authority exercised. And it remains to be decided how far the States formed within that Territory, and admitted into the Union, are on a different footing from its other members as to their legislative sovereignty.

"Whether the convention could have looked to the existence of slavery at all in the new States, is a point on which I can add little to what has been already stated. The great object of the convention seemed to be to prohibit the increase by the importation of slaves. A power to emancipate slaves was disclaimed; nor is anything recollected that denoted a view to control the distribution of those within the country. The case of the Northwestern Territory was probably superseded by the provision against the importation of slaves by South Carolina and Georgia, which had not then passed laws prohibiting it. When the existence of slavery in that Territory was precluded, the importation of slaves was rapidly going on, and the only mode of checking it was by narrowing the space open to them. It is not an unfair inference, that the expedient would not have been undertaken if the power afterward given to terminate the importation everywhere had existed, or even been anticipated. It has appeared that the present Congress never followed the example during the twenty years preceding the prohibitory epoch."

I would say, then, to honorable Senators and to the country, if any argument is to be derived from this source, in favor of the doctrines of restraining the distribution of slaves upon the continent, that they would derive the true argument from the policy known to belong to our fathers of that day, and carried out as soon as they were permitted to do it by the Federal Government, in the abolition of the slave trade altogether. This was an attempt, by limiting the area in which slavery could be used in thus excluding it from the Northwest Territory, so far to discourage or diminish importation of slaves. And it clearly follows, if any argument is to be derived from this manifestation of a policy by the Continental Congress in regard to slavery, its truth and its strength lies in the subsequent prohibition of the foreign slave trade, as soon as such power could be exercised by Congress.

It is a little curious, however, that, in all the commendations which we have heard from certain quarters upon this ever-memorable, able, and truly republican paper, the ordinance of 1787, honorable Senators have not connected with it what is found in that same clause prohibiting involuntary servitude, and afterwards incorporated into the Constitution of the United States—a clause providing for the rendition of fugitive slaves. In the same sixth article of the ordinance the proviso is:

"That any person escaping into the same from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in one of the original States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service, as aforesaid."

If the public mind of America, which has been thus violently drawn to this truly great republican paper of 1787, would look at it in all its provisions, and all its tendencies, it would show to them what really constituted at that day what I have always claimed constitute now the true political relations subsisting between a Territory of this Government and the Government itself, and that would put an extinguisher forever upon the misuse or perverse use of the idea of popular sovereignty in Territories; not by dogma, but by the proofs to be drawn from that paper. What were the relations between the Government of the United States under the Continental Congress, and this immense domain generously surrendered by my own State for the purpose of cementing a Federal Union, and inviting the fraternity of the people? What were its provisions? Was there anything like sovereignty recognized in the people who went there—anything like a right to govern themselves independent of the Federal Government? No; the very opposite. The ordinance itself declares that the lawgivers of the people who went there should be officers appointed by Federal authority. The Governor and judges constituted the legislative tribunal for that Territory. The legislative power in the Territory is thus disposed of by the ordinance of 1787:

"The Governor and judges, (appointed by Congress,) or a majority of them, shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary and best suited to the circumstances of the district, and report them to Congress from time to time, which laws shall be in force in the district until the organization of the General Assembly there, unless disapproved of by Congress; but afterwards, the Legislature shall have authority to alter them as they shall think fit."

With a further provision, that when the population should amount to five thousand they should have power to elect representatives, &c., to a Territorial Legislature.

Such were the relations subsisting between a Territory and the United States in the very first Territory that was organized under the old Congress.

I would remark here, incidentally, that I do not recollect, and have not made the research to ascertain, whether Mr. Madison was a member of the Continental Congress at the time this ordinance passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. He was, sir.

Mr. MASON. So I presumed; and he was a member of the Federal Convention sitting in Philadelphia at the same time and engaged in framing the Constitution.

We all know how large a share Mr. Madison had in perfecting and maturing the leading political measures of that day; and there can, then, be little doubt that he has given the true history and object of this prohibitory clause in the ordinance of 1787.

Mr. President, years after the pseudo-compromise, made on the occasion of admitting the State of Missouri, this sixth article of the ordinance of 1787 was exhumed, perverted, and successfully applied, without warrant of constitutional law, by the Congress of the United States, under the name of the "Wilmot proviso," to the Territory of Oregon; thus showing a determination on the part of Congress, whatever result might follow, to carry out that policy, in prohibiting the expansion of slavery on the continent. We all know the deep sensation produced at the South by the adoption of this proviso: the interdict was denounced as unconstitutional; and although applied to a Territory far north of the Missouri line, it was looked upon at the South as the manifestation of a fixed policy to prevent the further extension of a slave population, which if persevered in could only end in dissolution.

In 1848, after the peace with Mexico, we acquired a large territory from her, embracing California. It became necessary to provide governments for the population actually there, not in California alone, but in New Mexico; and instantly upon the proposition to organize territorial governments for these people, then living without a government, this demand of interdiction was at once set up in both Houses of Congress. It was successfully resisted so far as to prevent its being done, but at the cost of leaving these people whom we had acquired under the faith of treaty, without a government for a period of some two years.

I want to trace the history frankly, and I hope truthfully, that we may the better understand the exact position of the question now presented on the admission of Kansas. Under the auspices of a very able and successful statesman of that day from Kentucky, the late Mr. Clay, a new scheme of adjustment was suggested to the American people, by a series of what were called compromise measures. I will not go over them here further than to show the result to have been the violent admission of an additional non-slaveholding State, with an equivocal postponement of the question of future prohibition of slavery in the new Territories.

I was one of those who were opposed to this new (so styled) compromise. I never knew a compromise made between a majority and a minority, unless on a basis by which the majority succeeds in establishing a position for further aggression at a future day; and I think the history of all the compromises on the institution of slavery, so far as they have progressed, warrants that conclusion. It was done. California was admitted into the Union as a free State, not objected to by southern men because it was a free State, but objected to because of the machinery that was put in practice to produce that very effect.

Governments were organized for the Territories of New Mexico and Utah as a part of this system of compromise, and there, as I have said,

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Mason.

SENATE.

without meeting the issue directly, southern men were again called upon to surrender thus much of their position. They insisted that the principle of interdiction on the part of Congress should be repudiated in those Territories. This was not done, although a new principle was adopted in the organization of these territorial governments, so far as the question of slavery was concerned. Our position always had been that the Constitution, proprio vigore, recognizing the condition of African bondage on the continent, protected it in the Territories everywhere; and therefore it was not competent to Congress to legislate against it any more than it was competent to Congress to legislate against every other of the provisions of the Constitution. But that direct issue was evaded, and the Territories were then organized on this basis: that they should at once have legislative councils by representatives of their own; that to these legislative councils should be committed all subjects of rightful legislation under the Constitution; and that as to the question of slavery it should be decided by the people of the Territory themselves, but not until they were ripened into a State government and applied for admission as such.

This was a step gained on our part, and a very important one. We denied the power of Congress to interdict slavery in a Territory, but Congress exercised it notwithstanding the denial. We denied the right of the occupants of the Territory, while in the territorial form, equally to prohibit slavery in the Territory. And this was substantially conceded, because the laws organizing those governments left the question of slavery an open question, and not to be decided by the people of the Territory until they had matured a State government. It took away any power of interdiction from the occupants of the Territory while in a territorial form. So the law was passed. It was objected to in some quarters, even in the South, as leading to the doctrine of squatter sovereignty; but that imputation, I think, was very successfully met by showing that the people of the Territory, to whom the whole subject of legislation was given, were remitted directly to the Constitution of the United States as the limitation of their power; and further, that the condition of slavery was not to be legislated upon for its exclusion or its establishment while it remained in the territorial form.

Such were the provisions of the laws organizing territorial governments in Utah and in New Mexico. It was known very well, as resulted, that no practical effect could ever be derived from leaving the question of slavery in that condition with respect to those Territories, because, the laws of climate being far more inexorable than the laws of man, slaves never would go there, because they would be of no value. We had the paper guarantee, though no practical consequences arose; and therefore the question never was agitated afterwards in reference to those Territories.

We came, in 1854, again to the organization of territorial governments, in consequence of the great expansion of our country continually taking place. Nebraska, then an Indian country, lying contiguous to one of the slaveholding States, and adjacent to another, offered her tempting soil to emigration and settlement. It was determined that that Territory should be divided into two parts—the northern to be called the Territory of Nebraska, and the southern the Territory of Kansas. It was generally believed—I certainly was one of those who believed—that, although African slavery would hardly penetrate into the northern portion, the Territory of Nebraska, yet that, as regards Kansas, being contiguous to the State of Missouri, which had a very large and a very valuable slave population, and adjacent to the State of Arkansas, the natural consequence would be that the population of those two States would be largely thrown into it, together with their slaves.

In organizing these Territories, what was done? Nothing, in fact, but to carry into effect the principles of the new compromise, as it was called, of 1850. There had been a very large number in both Houses of Congress, who commended the legislation of 1850 to the country, as great measures of peace and reconciliation, and sang hosannas to the illustrious name of the very distinguished gentleman who projected and carried them through. I do not mean to say that Senators on the other side, whose specialty is to prevent the extension of slavery, and thus ultimately to extinguish it, were a part of the majority that carried those measures; but I do mean to say that, so far as I could gather the sentiment of the American people in the States, slaveholding and non-slaveholding, those compromise measures, as measures of peace, were acceptable to them, and received their approbation. And yet, in 1854, when it was proposed, in organizing the new Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, to do nothing more than to carry out the principles adopted in 1850, it was met in limine with the sternest opposition. A part of the compromise of 1850 was that the question of slavery in the Territories was to be left as their constitution should prescribe when they were admitted as States into the Union. Until then, and whilst in a territorial condition, it followed that this question must be left unaffected, except by the Constitution of the United States. There was no prohibition of slavery in the organic law. The people of the Territory, under the restraints of the Constitution, could not prohibit it; and thus the true principle of compromise was, that slavery was to be left to climate, until a final policy should be established by the people who were to be affected by it, when they attained the maturity of State government. The whole of both the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska lay north of the parallel of 36° 30', and thus within the interdict of the Missouri law of 1820. By that law, slavery had been prohibited north of that parallel. How then could the question of slavery be left open until the people should form a State government, unless in the mean time that prohibition was removed?

I say, then, that good faith to the compromise measures of 1850 required that this interdict should be removed; and it was done accordingly in the Kansas-Nebraska act of 1854, by declaring the law of 1820 null, inoperative, and void.

Thus at last, and by a series of legislation, the principle was attained of non-intervention by Congress, as regarded slavery in the Territories. This was the great principle both of the compromise measures of 1850 and the Kansas act of 1854; by it the South has stood, and by it we mean steadfastly to abide. It was a departure from the established policy between the Federal authorities and the territorial governments. There had always been reserved, even in 1850, what was reserved in the ordinance of 1787—a power in Congress to disaffirm the legislation of the Territories. This power was not reserved in the Kansas-Nebraska bill, showing the clearest purpose of the law, not only in what it said, but in what it failed to say, to remit the people who might go there to self-government whilst in a territorial state, subject only to the restraints of the Constitution. We knew Congress was a most unsafe depository of a power to mold the domestic institutions of a Territory; and so far as slavery was concerned it was safer to transfer the question from Congress to the people who were to be affected by it.

So much for the disposition of the slavery question by the Kansas act. The principle of non-intervention by Congress recommended it to the South; and it contained, moreover, a full and final repudiation and abrogation of the odious Missouri interdict of 1820.

Since that day, upon a case properly made in the Supreme Court of the United States, the question has been decided by the highest judicial tribunal of the land, composed of judges who, by the tenure of their office, ought to be presumed to be divested of all interest or feeling further than to do what is right, to be guided alone by that great judicial star which leads judicial minds to attain the truth, and to enforce it; and the question coming before them, the Supreme Court have decided that the law of 1820 was unconstitutional and void, thus confirming what had been the substantial declaration of Congress in its later policy of territorial organization. What is said of that on the other side? The honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] as to whose dramatic representation of what never passed between the judges of that court and the President, I shall say nothing, after what fell from the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] says to the American people in reference to this high and important act of judicial power by the last court of appeal—what? He says to the American people, there is but one way to manage this Government on that subject; the way in which the French physician in the play managed his patients. I will get rid of the disease, says the doctor, even if it is necessary to carry the patient with it. The court shall be reorganized, says that Senator—for what purpose? That he may sap the foundations of our popular Government, and the rights and liberties of this people, to effect the lawless purposes of his Abolition confederates. The court shall be reconstructed or reorganized; that is to say, if those with whom he acts get possession of the Federal Government, the offices held by the judges are to be vacated, and in their place are to be put supple instruments to do the will of the Senator's associates upon the Government of the country. That is the purpose of the honorable Senator from New York, avowed to the country and to his party as their theory of action in the administration of the Government.

Mr. President, I remember some years ago, when I was then a very young member of the convention that sat in Virginia to alter the constitution of that State, of which, among the very illustrious men then remaining with us, the late John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States, was a member, the question was about remodeling the judicial tenure. In our early institutions, I believe, in every State—certainly in mine, and in all that I now recollect—the tenure of the judicial office was during good behavior, or, in effect, during life. The popular mind got hold of the opinion that this stable tenure worked an irresponsibility in the judges requiring reform, and the proposition was to limit the tenure to a term of years. That great and illustrious man made a speech against it, among the very few speeches which he made in that body; one of that judicial exactness and conciseness that illustrate his great mind. I remember well, in speaking of the judicial tenure, how very opposite his views of government were to those now promulgated by the honorable Senator from New York in regard to the judicial office. He said, as the experience of a long life and a great intellect, that “the greatest curse which an angry God could inflict upon a sinning people would be to leave them to a dependent judiciary”—a great truth which lay at the foundation not of the structure alone, but of the security of our Government. But what does the honorable Senator from New York say? That the Supreme Court of the United States, believed to be not only pure but unsuspected, held secret and corrupt intercourse with an incoming President to obtain a political end; and he announces to the American people that when the party with which he acts gets into power, they will take care that the court shall interpose no obstacle to their pathway, for they will reorganize that court—I presume to put it out of their way! That is the substance of the declaration.

Mr. SEWARD. I know that the honorable Senator from Virginia is entitled to the course of his argument, and I have not the least disposition to interrupt him or embarrass him in it. I only rise because, being here, and hearing the honorable Senator, and sitting silent, it might perhaps be inferred that I assented to the justice of the description which he gives of my expectations in regard to the reorganization of the judiciary, to say that, at the present session of Congress, I had already given notice, before I made the speech on which the honorable Senator comments with so much severity, of a bill to reorganize the Supreme and Circuit Courts of the United States in such a way as to equalize the representation of the several States in the courts as far as possible, according to their Federal population, and at the same time to secure greater facility and dispatch to business. That plan, at some future day, I shall bring in. I need not stop now to say what it is for—it is not matured in my own mind. I do not care to confess or to deny any particular system which may be attributed to me in regard to the mode in which it shall be done. I expect to propose a feasible one, a reasonable one, a just one, and one which every Senator of the United States will approve, or ought to approve, because it will be conservative in its character, and at the same time it will be just as it is necessary.

Mr. MASON. From the corrupt practices suggested by the honorable Senator as passing between the judges of that court and an incoming President, I could see no other conclusion in his mind than that which mine attained, that the practical mode of getting rid of corrupt men was to put them out of the way by some mode. I shall of course not undertake to criticize now, any new scheme of organization which the honorable Senator may have in view, more especially as he tells us that it is not as yet matured in his own judgment; but I think he has foreshadowed enough to show that the leading idea in his mind is, by some mode of sectional organization, to make that a political court which shall represent on the bench not the political views of the day alone, but the popular emotions of the day; which shall represent on the bench political parties; and more than all, judges who shall be placed in some condition to be subservient to the fluctuations of political parties. I cannot conceive how a court can be organized in such manner as to attain the ends which the Senator avows, unless it is organized in such a way as to make it the mere conduit of the party passions of the day—to popularize the court of last resort; but I have no right to criticize this new organization which the honorable Senator suggests, because he has not yet matured it in his own mind, as he tells us.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator will indulge me in one word more. Perhaps I ought to have added that I do expect that the court will be brought in its principles and its practices to conformity with the Constitution of the United States and the sentiments and principles of humanity and justice, as I stated in the speech on which the Senator is remarking.

Mr. MASON. As the Senator understands them.

Mr. SEWARD. As I understand them.

Mr. MASON. And his party.

Mr. SEWARD. No; as I understand them.

Mr. MASON. Now, Mr. President, let us come back to the Kansas question. A law was passed creating territorial governments in Kansas and Nebraska, according to their appropriate boundaries. The question of slavery was left open to be decided by the people to be affected by it, as I have said, in consequence, not of the spirit only, but the letter of the laws of 1850. What was the next step? Hardly was the ink dry by which the bill became a law, when there was fulminated from the halls of legislation here a manifesto to all the Abolition societies of the North, telling them that the Territory was thrown open to population, and inviting and encouraging them, under every stimulant that could arouse their passions or excite their hopes, to throw their people into it with the utmost rapidity. I do not claim to be wiser than others, but yet to have some little knowledge of humanity and of my fellow-men; and I say that the state of things that has existed in Kansas ever since; events which Senators delight in depicting as the efforts of great and noble-minded freemen to vindicate their rights; scenes of blood, rapine, and murder, disgraceful to the age, of fraud and violence in every form of licensed depravity, were but the legitimate consequences of throwing (by artificial means altogether) a population utterly irresponsible into a common Territory, under instructions, if not under contract, to carry out the political views of those who sent them. The emigrant aid societies formed a new feature in the laws governing emigration in our country—societies that were got up with large capital for the purpose of throwing a population into the Territory of Kansas at once which should preoccupy it, in order that politicians might effect what the laws had prohibited, in preventing the expansion of slavery. I do not mean to say that we had any law, or could pass any law, prohibiting it; but I do mean to say, before the American people and before posterity, that those who were instrumental in getting up such societies and in carrying through their objects, are responsible for the bloodshed, and rapine, and murder, and the utter destitution of every moral principle, which have disgraced that Territory ever since.

Slaveholders from the adjacent and contiguous States, and from a distance, went there, as they had a right to do, with their slaves, and mingled with this population. The Territory became at once a scene of contention and strife, because they found it preoccupied by men who had been sent there under contract for the very purpose of excluding them. Civil war almost ensued—civil strife certainly did. It was necessary to bring in the strong arm of Federal power through its military force, in order to repress it. Soldiers were quartered there for more than two years to keep peace amongst the people, and make them obedient to the laws. What then did we find on the part of the emigrant aid societies in the New England States? Pen and pulpit were employed alike to fan the flame and to supply the munitions for civil war in the Territory of Kansas; sermons were preached; the popular mind was stirred up from its foundations to induce them to contribute money and fire-arms to be used in Kansas against their fellow-countrymen. If that is the sort of government which these peace and order-loving people prefer, be it so. Our duty only is to see that the laws are enforced; that the laws are obeyed; that the institutions of the country are preserved unimpaired, and not made the sport either of reckless fanaticism, or the calmer calculations of reckless aspirants. I think the President at the head of the last Administration, as well as the present, have done no more than their duty in seeing that the laws were duly enforced by the full use of the military power.

What next? Kansas in due time, through its regularly organized government, passed a law to take the sense of the people whether they desired to remain in a territorial condition, or to become a State. The polls were then thrown open; the vote was cast; and it was found that there was a very large majority in favor of organizing a State government. This law was fairly devised to take the sense of the people, to register the votes so as to preclude fraud, and for electing delegates to a convention to frame a constitution. They were elected, and they formed a constitution. Immediately upon the adjournment of that convention, it became manifest that nothing was to be left undone or unattempted to defeat its work. It was said that frauds were committed at the polls, and gentlemen here have been insisting that we should send out commissions to Kansas, or bring people from Kansas here, to inquire into them. I think it very probable that frauds were committed at the polls. It would be very remarkable, in such a population as they seem to have there, if frauds were not committed; but I should like to know what popular election has been held in many of the States of this Union—I will not designate them further—under great popular excitement, where frauds have not been charged upon both parties, precisely as they are charged in Kansas? In a neighboring State, within less than fifty miles from this Capitol, such allegations were made at the last elections; and questions are now depending before the coordinate branch of Congress to determine, not only whether frauds were perpetrated at the polls, but whether the people were not kept from the polls by armed resistance—a matter coming properly before that House as affecting the election of its members. Do we not know that some years ago, in New York, they got up a sort of popular term, understood almost as a technical term, called "pipe-laying"? Parties charged each other at every election that took place with fraud, by means of what they called "pipe-laying"—the very offense now ascribed to the people of Kansas. It was said that men were carried from Philadelphia to the city of New York, or the villages on the Hudson, under the pretext of correspondence to get leaden pipe, or something of that sort; strangers were brought there who were to control the vote of the citizens of the State. I know not whether it was true or false; but I do know that a vote has not been taken in many of the States in times of popular excitement, that the successful party were not charged with having carried the election by fraud or violence.

But, sir, be such charges true or not, is a matter that belongs to Kansas to determine. It does not belong to us. They are competent to determine it; we are not. Nor should we give any heed or countenance to such charges, unless shown to be true by the constituted authorities of Kansas. We can know the people of Kansas only as we can know any other people on this continent, through an organized government. Sir, it is the great boast of the institutions of this country, that the people are subordinate to law; that political power can be exercised only through the forms of law and of organized communities. Mobs, be they large or small, who attempt to exercise political power, ought to be and are repressed by the strong arm of law. We can only know what the wish of the people is, when it is expressed in conformity to law; to look elsewhere for it, is to lapse at once to anarchy.

Another of the incidental or auxiliary objections put out, like skirmishers, to mask the battery which is directed against the form of government adopted by Kansas, is, that the constitution was not submitted to the people after the convention framed it. It is said that this was an interference with popular sovereignty; that the people of Kansas had a right to have it submitted to a popular vote; and that if it were not submitted, or if it were submitted in part and not in the whole, it was in derogation of the great principle of popular sovereignty. Mr. President, what is popular sovereignty? I do not mean that term in the acceptance of demagogues or politicians; but what is it in the meaning of law, American law and American sense? It means nothing in the world but an assertion of a great principle, which none of us denies, that a people constituting a political community are their own rulers. How is it carried out in that system of government first established upon this continent? That the popular will can only be known through their representatives, or through the forms of law passed to ascertain their will; that the turbulent masses, be they large or small, are to be treated as turbulent masses, and to be repressed by force if necessary. Perfect obedience to law lies at the very foundation of every security of government here, as force is the foundation of the security of every government elsewhere.

Sir, I need hardly say to this body that, whether Kansas is to be admitted or rejected as a State, we can rightfully look no further into her constitution than see the government is republican in form. We, to be sure, are bound to see that it is a constitution framed by the people of Kansas, and not by anybody else—not to have one imposed, as some gentlemen seem to suggest; but when the constitution is here as the act of that people, we can look into it for no purpose whatever but to see what is its form; and if its form is republican, we have no right to look further.

The organic law providing a territorial government for Kansas provides that their Legislature shall have committed to them all subjects of rightful legislation; that they shall regulate all their domestic institutions in their own way, subject to the Constitution, and contains an utter disclaimer of any intent or purpose in the Federal councils, whilst they are so conducted, to interfere with them at any time or for any purpose.

Now, what has been done? Only what every other State has done. They passed a law prescribing the mode of electing representatives to a convention, confided to that convention the power to frame a State government, and did no more, as far as legislation was concerned. The law did not require that the constitution, when framed under the authority confided to the convention, should be submitted to the people. It was competent to the law to have done it. In my own State of Virginia, when a convention was called there, a few years ago, to amend or alter the form of government, the law calling the convention provided that the constitution should be submitted to the people; but suppose the law had been silent: would it not have been competent to the convention to submit it or to withhold it, as the convention thought proper? In other words, if the law which authorizes the convention does not prescribe that the constitution is to be submitted to a popular vote, it remits the whole power to those who represent the people in convention. That, I should say, must of necessity be the law of this question, unless you are to look outside of law and outside of government, to get at the popular will. I say the convention unquestionably possessed the power to submit the whole constitution, or none of it, or part of it. They did submit, I think with statesmanlike propriety, the only question on which that people was divided—the question of slavery. There was no occasion to submit any more; but, whether there was or not, the convention were the sole judges. They submitted the slavery question; and it has struck me, in looking into that constitution, that this so-called slave question is there stated with a compactness and truth that would challenge criticism from any quarter. The section is this:

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable, as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

It does not speak of slavery in any sense as a creation of law; it speaks of it as an existing thing, a status of property in the country recognizing it exactly as it exists, requiring no law whatever, and dependent on no law to create it in Kansas; suggesting none, but simply declaring that a subject of slavery is, like all other property, superior to any law that is known to civilized man, for the law of civilized man recognizes the right of property.

That is the declaration in the constitution, so far as the condition of slavery is concerned. Another clause provides that the question should be submitted to the people of Kansas, whether it was their will to continue that species of property in the State, or not.

This brings me to the consideration of a position very strangely assumed on the other side (as I think) by the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER;] and from which he, and those who think with him, derive most important conclusions affecting the condition of slavery. Their theory is, that slavery is the creation of positive law; and, being so, that wherever the law ordaining is not in force there is no slavery. I know of no authority for any such position.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will suggest to the Senator that Lord Mansfield says so expressly in the Somerset case.

Mr. MASON. I had hoped, after what we heard with so much pleasure and instruction from the honorable Senator from Louisiana, that Lord Mansfield's decision in the Somerset case would have been received, even by the honorable Senator from Maine, and as I think it will by all when the passions of the day subside on the subject of African slavery, as a mere judicial flourish—nothing else.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I beg leave to say that I have a very great respect for the Senator from Louisiana; but it would take many such authorities to overturn my respect for Lord Mansfield's decision in that case—certainly more than one.

Mr. MASON. I am to deal with slavery on this continent. I aver, so far as I have been able to trace it, and I have examined it with care in legislation of the southern States—I have not looked into that of the northern States, because it does not exist there now—I have been unable to find any statute from the beginning, creating the condition of African slavery on this continent. I know from the history of the country that the first slaves which were landed upon the continent from Africa, were taken hold of by the "common law" of that day and recognized as property. The first slaves, I think, landed on the continent of America were brought to Jamestown, in Virginia, in 1620, eighteen in number. I do not recollect whether they were brought directly from Africa or indirectly through one of the Spanish islands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. To what common law does the Senator refer?

Mr. MASON. The common law of England, sir—the law of your ancestors and mine. The common law of England was the only law in the colonies at that day; it certainly was the only law in Virginia, for at that day she had no Legislative Assembly. The common law of England, as it has existed the law of that State from that day to this. When those slaves were landed in 1620, they were purchased by the planters, precisely as any other property, taken to their plantations, and put to work, and as successive importations of slaves in following years were received and treated. They were recognized by that law as property, and protected as such in the same manner. The common law of your ancestors and mine, the great common law of England, was the only law then in Virginia regulating the rights of property. It has remained the law of Virginia from that day to this, except so far as it may have been altered by statute.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Virginia I know to be a very able lawyer, and I wish simply to ask him what maxim, what provision of the common law of England authorized the importation of slaves as property?

Mr. MASON. After the manner of the honorable Senator's country, I might answer that question by asking another: what maxim of the common law of England recognizes property in a horse, or a cow, or any other chattel?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is answered by Blackstone.

Mr. MASON. What is the answer?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot repeat the words.

Mr. MASON. It is all answered by Blackstone.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. MASON. It is all answered by the commentators on the law of England. I would give to the honorable Senator this answer, that the common law of England recognized in England as property, even at the day when the Somerset case was decided, as it did in Virginia when the slaves to which I have alluded were imported, whatever was property in the country from which it was brought, and treated it as such, unless there was some positive law prohibiting it being property.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator from Virginia will permit me, I will say that both in Keble and in Salkeld he will find actions of trover for negro slaves sustained under the common law of England.

Mr. MASON. I doubt not if such action was brought, the common law sustained it; and if the honorable Senator from Maine desires to know what maxim or provision of the common law treats slaves as property, I will say to him that the common law of England, so justly called the consummation of human wisdom, recognized everything as property which was the subject of property in the country from which it was brought unless prohibited by some positive law of that realm; and thus it was, that when slaves were first landed in Virginia, there being no law there but the common law, they were admitted as other property, that law recognizing that as their condition in the country whence they were brought. The condition of property did not attach to them after they reached the soil of Virginia, but they brought it with them. Such has been the law from that day to this. You may look through all the southern States where slaves are best known to us, and you will find laws passed from time to time, as they increased in number, regulating their condition; sometimes declaring them to be real estate; at others, declaring them to be personal estate, exempting them from execution if there was other property upon which an execution could be levied, and making peculiar regulations in relation to them in the distribution of the estate of an intestate. You find laws of that sort almost from the earliest day, and every one of them carries with it a recognition that slaves were property, and nothing but property.

Sir, the common law of England is the accumulated treasure of human experience, gathered in the lapse of ages by a great, wise, and intellectual people; adapting itself from age to age in the progress of the world, by a contractile and expansive power, to the varying wants or necessities of progressive civilization and wealth. Its greatest achievement has been to elevate the social condition of man by securing to him the fruits of his labor; and thus it has ever been a tenet of that law, that whatever comes within its jurisdiction as property must remain and be protected as such. It required statute-law of England to destroy slavery in her colonies, as it requires statute-law in the States of this Confederacy to take that condition from the descendants of African bondsmen.

In the ordinance of 1787, by which involuntary servitude, except for crime, was prohibited in the Northwestern Territory, the sixth section provides for the surrender of fugitive slaves escaping into that Territory. Following this, the Constitution of the United States contains a like provision. I am not at all prepared to say that, as a pure question of law, when a slave absconds from his master and escapes to a State where the condition of slavery has been abolished, he would, because of such law, and in the absence of prejudice or passion in the administration of the law, be declared free. Such a decision would be at war with that comity of law recognized in civilized societies, by which the laws of one State are on grounds of policy and general safety recognized and carried into effect by another. But, be this as it may, the security of this kind of property in framing a common government, was not to be left at hazard; and hence the provision of the Constitution. By its virtue, a slave escaping into Massachusetts remains a slave still, by the law of the Constitution. No law of Massachusetts can set him free; but he remains the property of his owner—protected as such by the fundamental law to which all the States have assented.

There is another dogma which I have heard from honorable Senators on the other side more than once, as a maxim pretty much like this theory of theirs, that slavery is the subject of positive institutions—a misnomer, by the way, for slavery is not an institution at all, it is a mere condition. Another of their dogmas just as untenable, but asserted by them as though it were a maxim in law received in all civilized countries, is that there is no property in man. Why, sir, I should like to know if there is not property in man by contract. What is the relation of master and apprentice but a property in the apprentice during the time that the indentures run, and a control over him and his time, recognized and enforced by law? How is it with an indentured servant, in regard to which honorable Senators from the North have more information than I have, for we have very few of that class of servants in my country? An indentured servant is one who sells his time for a given period and a given price. And is there no property in that man? What is the property in a slave but the property in his time and labor during life, instead of a property in his time, and his labor, for a term of years? What then becomes of this dogma, that there can be no property in man?

There was a time, and in my remembrance, when emigrants from Europe were brought to this country under contracts made at the place of embarkation, that the shipper should dispose of them in this country for a stated term, the consideration for which was to pay their passage and subsistence on the voyage. They were called redemptioners, because they were the property of the shipper, until redeemed by his sale of them for a term of years; and then the purchaser stood in his place. The time of service was regulated as in all other subjects of property, by the value of the commodity—as age, skill, capacity, &c. Until so disposed of, the redemptioner was as entirely under the control of the shipper, so far as liberty was concerned, as any other living chattel on board his ship—and when he passed into the hands of a purchaser, he carried that condition with him.

What difference, then, in every principle of law, between one so brought into the country as property, for a term of years, definite—and another, imported for a term, indefinite? The common law certainly knows of none, nor can such be found, unless by absolute statute. I should, therefore, confidently assume, that in the reverse of the position assumed on the other side, is to be found the true principle of law; that is to say, whilst it requires no positive law to fix the condition of slavery, it does require positive law to destroy it.

A gentleman brought to my notice this morning an extract from one of the northern papers which I would not use without first referring it to the honorable Senator from Maine to know what was their legislation on the subject. I have said the law of all humane and civilized communities establishes a right of property in man, and the extract to which I have alluded states that a man who had once attained distinction, and had substantial wealth, had in his old age fallen into poverty, and had been sold at auction in the State of Maine. The honorable Senator explained it by saying that it was a part of their poor-law system, not that the man was sold at auction, but that each town is obliged to maintain its own paupers; and where they have no poor-house, and no organization for the purpose of doing it, a part of their system is to put them out to be maintained by the man who will maintain them at the lowest rates; but he said that according to his recollection it gave to the party no right to the man's time.

Every humane society has a system of poor laws. What are they? Nothing in the world but this: when a part of the population, from age or disease, or infirmity, is unable to maintain itself, it shall be maintained by the public; and the necessary incident to that is, that as long as the public maintains the pauper, the public shall have the right to the time of the pauper. It is part of the whole system of poor laws everywhere. They give a property in the man, and in the time of the man, as long as he is the subject of public bounty, and properly so. The public is just as inexorably his owner for that time as these honorable Senators would represent a slaveholder to be the owner of his property in a slave.

I say, then, it is a mere catch-word, an unfounded dogma, that has no position in law or in sense, to say that there can be no property in man. It is the law of the civilized world everywhere, must be the law, ought to be the law, for the protection and well-being of society. Where you have a population amongst you, as a pauper population always is, unable to feed and to clothe themselves, humanity devolves it upon the public, and devolves with it a property in the time of the subject of the public bounty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to explain, with distinctness, what I said in reference to the case of which he speaks.

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I noticed that statement in the papers, and I remarked to the Senator that there was no sort of correctness in the statement that anybody was sold by virtue of the poor laws of Maine, and I suppose cannot be by the laws of any other State of the Union except in the slave States, where a slave may be sold. The provision of our law is very simple, and I presume it is like that of most other States. The towns are obliged by law comfortably to support all poor persons who are unable to take care of themselves. The general mode of doing this in large towns is to provide an alms-house, where all the poor people may be supported at the expense of the municipal corporation; but some small towns are unable to do this, and they make a contract with individuals to support the poor—sometimes the whole poor, sometimes certain numbers of them; and, in order to arrive at that contract, they have a bidding to see who will agree with the town to support its poor at the lowest price. That is all the auction there is. Those who agree to do it at a less price than anybody else will, if proper persons, assume the contract, come under certain obligations to afford these poor people comfortable subsistence for a fixed price. That is the only mode in which a person is sold. There is no contract for his service, no obligation to serve, or anything of the kind.

While I am up, I wish to say another thing. The Senator from Virginia asked me for the foundation of other property by the common law, and I replied that the answer was to be found in Blackstone, but that I could not give him the exact words. I happen now to have the second volume of Blackstone, and, if he will excuse me for doing so, I will read the words to which I referred; and the Senator will see whether the argument he is making can be sustained upon what Blackstone says is the foundation of the law of property:

"In the beginning of the world, we are informed by Holy Writ, the all-bountiful Creator gave to man 'dominion over all the earth, and over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.' This is the only true and solid foundation of man's dominion over eternal things, whatever airy, metaphysical notions may have been started by fanciful writers upon this subject. The earth, therefore, and all things therein are the general property of all mankind, exclusive of other beings, from the immediate gift of the Creator. And while the earth continued bare of its inhabitants, it is reasonable to suppose that all was in common among them, and that every one took from the public stock, to his own use, such things as his immediate necessities required."—2 Blackstone's Comm., p. 3.

That is the answer to the Senator's whole question, as to what is the true foundation of the law of property, as recognized by the laws of England.

Mr. MASON. I read with a great deal of interest, not very long since, quite an instructive book that was printed in the section of country to which the honorable Senator belongs—the State of Massachusetts—the diary kept by the first Governor of New England, old John Winthrop, and a very instructive paper it was, as to the condition of the population in that part of the continent at that day, and their habits and usages. I found that when they constituted tribunals of justice vested with proper jurisdiction over all questions, civil and criminal, a part of their jurisprudence was this: they were not very thoroughly read, I presume, in the laws of England, or they had not the books, I do not know which; but they had very few laws of their own, and it was the invariable practice of the tribunals of that early date, in the administration either of civil or of criminal justice, where there was no law to direct their counsels, to refer it to the Bible; and they took the dispensations of the Mosaic code as the true arbiter of the rights of their fellow-men brought before them in their tribunals of justice, and punished them accordingly.

Now, it is very true that Blackstone, who has written a history of the common law, adopted probably as one of the theories of the common law, that the foundation of all property was derived during the theocracy, when the Almighty directly governed man without any intermediate tribunal whatever; and when the Almighty gave to man dominion over the birds of the air, the beasts of the field, and the fishes of the sea, that He there ordained property, and that we must go back to that to ascertain what are the rightful subjects of property. That is his theory. But the common law has certainly very far trenched upon that since; because at last property is but subject to the necessary relations that must subsist between men in civilized society. It has grown up by a series of usages. The common law of England is but the law of usage and of custom. I have attempted to show, I confess very feebly, that the common law does recognize a property in something that is neither a beast of the field, a bird of the air, nor a fish of the sea, and enforces those rights of property. I take the case of master and apprentice; of the servant by indenture; the case of the poor laws, where the interests of society in civilization devolve the maintenance of the pauper on the public. I would take the case of vagrants. There are laws of general police in most of the States, (certainly there are in my own, and police laws are very much the same everywhere,) providing that men who wander about society without having any visible means of support, shall be arrested and sold to those who will undertake to support them for their time. It is a police law; and the necessity of it is not so much to punish the vagrant for his vice in idling his time, but for the great moral example of society to make all contribute to the common good by the proper employment of their time.

Now, what is property in a slave at last? If the slave is killed by his master, it is just as much murder as if he had killed his neighbor white man. If he is maimed by his master, it is just as much a mayhem at common law. If he is inhumanly or cruelly treated, it is just as much an offense as if an apprentice had been so treated, and it is punishable criminally. He cannot kill him; he cannot abuse or misuse him in such a way as to amount to cruelty or ill treatment; but yet, he has a substantial right, and what is it? Trace it as you will, it is at last nothing in the world but the exclusive property in the time and labor of that man so long as he shall live. I can see, so far as the right of property is concerned, no difference whatever between property for life and property for a given term under contract or under law.

How that property arose it is not so easy to determine. The publicists tell us that, at the dawn of civilization, a prisoner of war held his life at the mercy of his captor; and, as the latter might deprive his prisoner of life, it lay at his discretion either to kill him or to keep him in life as his property. Such was certainly the practice in the earlier days of the Romans. History tells us that such has always been, and yet continues, the custom among the negro tribes in Africa. Certainly there the natives sell their own race as slaves; they sell to each other as they sold to the white man, while such sales were allowed by the laws of the white man. Thus it was that the ancestors of those now held in bondage on this continent brought from Africa with them their condition as property. How it was acquired there can now be a subject of conjecture only, and would be an inquiry as fruitless as vague. The common law recognized them as property, and they were treated and sold as such; the offspring following the condition of the female parent, (a maxim of the common law,) made equally slaves of their descendants.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will ask the Senator from Virginia to allow me a minute to correct an error that I made a few moments ago. I stated to the Senator that he would find, both in Keble and Salkeld, actions of trover maintained at the common law for a slave. I find that the decision in Salkeld was not for trover, but for trespass. In Keble, the decision was trover. Here is the old common law statement of the case—it is only five or six lines, and if the Senator will indulge me, I will read it:

"Butts vs. Penny.

"Special verdict in trover of ten negroes and a half, find them usually bought and sold in India, and if this were sufficient property, or conversion, was the question. And Thomson, on 1 Institutes, 116, for the Defendant, said here could be no property in the plaintiff more than in Villeins; but per Curiam they are by usage tantum bona, and go to administrator until they become Christians; and thereby they are enfranchised; and judgment for the Plaintiff, Nisi, and it lieth of moiety or third part against any stranger, albeit not against the other copartners."—Keble's Reports, vol. 3, p. 765, Trinity Term, 29 Car. II., B. R.

In Salkeld, the decision was that trespass was the proper remedy; the court making the distinction that villeinage arose from captivity, and "a man may have trespass quare captivum suum cepit, but cannot have trover de Gallico suo;" he might maintain an action against his Frenchman whom he had taken captive and made a slave, but he could not trover.

"And the court seemed to think that in trespass quare captivum suum cepit, the plaintiff might give evidence that the party was his negro, and he bought him."—Salkeld's Reports, vol. 2, p. 667.

The court sustained the action of trespass.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not hear whether that was in England or not. It does not say that the purchase or sale was in England.

Mr. SEWARD. What year was that?

Mr. BENJAMIN. In the fourth of Queen Anne.

"Trover for several things, and among the rest, de uno Ethiopie vocat, a negro, and on not guilty pleaded, verdict was for the plaintiff and several damages; and as to the negro 30*l*. And it was moved in arrest of judgment, that trover lays not for a negro, for that the owner had not an absolute property in him; he could not kill him as he could an ox. Contra, it was said property implies the right of having and enjoying and disposing; but it does not always imply a power to destroy; that this power holds in beasts, fowl, and fish, which were made the property of mankind by the act of God, and have a natural existence, but not in things incorporeal, which consist in jure tantum; for this being a property ex instituto only, the owner has only a power according to the measure of this instituted right; and it was instanced in the case of a common, a way and a ward. On a ca. sa. the plaintiff has an interest in the body of the prisoner as a pledge not to sell, but to keep, and it goes to the executors."—Salkeld's Reports, vol. 2, p. 667.

This was the argument of counsel. I certainly will not trench on the time of the honorable Senator from Virginia by reading through the argument; but the decision in this case was, that trespass would lie, though trover would not. In the case in Keble, the action was trover, and it was sustained.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does not appear where the action arose. The courts afterwards made a distinction on that point.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is enough for the purposes of our argument that trover would lie for a negro on the other side of the water by the common law.

Mr. CLARK. I will ask the Senator from Louisiana if judgment was rendered in the case he has just read? It was held by the court in the first instance that trover would lie; but afterwards, as I understand it, as the case is reported in Levinz, time was taken to consider it, and no judgment was ever rendered.

Mr. BENJAMIN. This is a different case. There are two in 3 Salkeld.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to know where the case of Butts against Penny is?

Mr. BENJAMIN. In 3 Keble.

Mr. CLARK. Then will the Senator be kind enough to give me the name of the next case?

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Mason.

SENATE.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Smith vs. Gould, 2 Salkeld, 667.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President—

Mr. MASON. If the honorable Senator will allow me to close my remarks, I shall feel obliged to him, as I am not very well. I shall give the Senator the floor very soon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not wish to take it at present.

Mr. MASON. I will not trace the condition of slavery as belonging to the African, back to the Bible, because, although I recognize that as the law which to a great extent governs the relations between man and man, yet it is not a law which is to be enforced by any human tribunal. I will not undertake to say that the African got his condition of slavery from jure divino, although it has been so ascribed. It is enough for me that such is the fact. I know of no race of men now upon the earth whose original normal condition was that of slavery, but the African. You find him precisely in the same form of slavery in every land, where he has gone, and at every age of his existence that you find him in now—at home a slave, abroad a slave; and when that slavery of the African is brought within the influences of civilization, we know, upon the experience of our continent at least, that it has elevated him very far beyond the uttermost conceptions of his ancestors in the scale of being. The African upon this continent, in the bondage to which he is subjected here, compared with the African in his own country upon the continent of Africa, might be compared to the difference between a high grade of civilization and the lowest condition of the savage. I will not undertake to say, or even to suggest, what great ends the Supreme Ruler of the world may have designed, and is now executing in the transfer of a portion of the African race to this continent; but I have seen what feeble results have been obtained from the attempt to carry him back to his own continent. There is a philanthropic society now in existence, formed some thirty or forty years ago, originating, I think, with some statesmen of Virginia, intended to deport the African back to his own country. I know that the colony which that society has established has been maintained as a very feeble colony only by the strong arm of civilized power to this day. I know that wherever the African, even after he has been civilized in bondage, has been left to himself, he has lapsed into barbarism and savagism. I cannot, therefore, but entertain a hope that there is some great end to be attained by the Deity who rules over all races, in the subjection of the African to bondage upon this continent, because I know that whilst in bondage he improves in civilization, and when he is freed from bondage, he sinks in the scale of humanity.

Sir, if there are benevolent purposes on the part of those communities represented by honorable Senators here, how are they exercised in the attempt to free the African on this continent? Look at him in their own cities; look at him in any community where you find the African race free. You will see of course individual instances where they have preserved that degree of elevation which they had attained while slaves; but in successive generations they lose it; and the great mass of those who are emancipated, when they are freed from involuntary servitude, or what is the same thing, involuntary labor, decay and die out. All the great incentives that belong to the white race to improve their condition mentally and physically, or to rear and educate their families to advance in civilization, are utterly lost to the African where ever he is found amongst the white race, in freedom, or not subjected to slavery. He will not labor. You cannot make him labor by any of the incentives you can apply to him but the will of a master. That is the condition of the African race on this continent, and everywhere where I know them.

Now, what is proposed? If the African race were left on this continent to the ordinary laws of emigration, do we not know, has not our experience, even in the short time it has been proved here, established it, that the laws of emigration are the laws of nature; that the African in bondage will go into those climates where his labor is most productive, or which are most congenial to his condition? They cannot exist in a northern climate, because their constitutions are not adapted to it by nature; and if they could, their labor would be of so little value, compared with their labor at the South, that they would necessarily not emigrate there. What purpose, then, have honorable Senators, or what purpose have their constituents, in view, in constantly agitating the public mind on the question of African slavery? They say they have wiped their hands of it, when, in truth, the climate alone has extinguished it in their section. They glorify themselves, as Lord Mansfield did in England, that the air of their country is so pure that a slave cannot breathe it; that his shackles fall instantly from his limbs. We envy not their condition, I assure them. Why, then, should they seek to interfere with ours? Whatever of good, or of ill, belongs to the relations that subsist between the two races on this continent is ours, not theirs. The responsibility is with us, not with them. Why is it, then, that whenever opportunity offers, the whole public mind throughout this country is vexed and disturbed and agitated by the question of slavery—not by us, for we are silent; but by those statesmen who are trying to destroy, or to curtail, or to impair it; and always in terms of denunciation? Sir, there is but one reason; and it is exemplified in the very case before us now. It is a resistance to that principle of the Constitution which makes it an element of political power. Take away that, and I warrant you there will be no more clamor on the subject of slavery. It is, then, opposition to a feature of the Constitution; it is opposition to a part of the compact which brought the States together, and to that part of the compact without which the States never could have been brought together.

The people of the Territory of Kansas have come before Congress, asking to be admitted into the Union as a State. All the class of objections which have been made in the nature of technical pleading about the frauds in their elections, and their not submitting the constitution to a popular vote, are but to mask the great battery which is directed against the Constitution of the United States in the representation of African bondsmen. Strike that feature out of the Constitution, and there would be no longer objectants to slavery.

We have then before the American people now a State applying for admission, and entitled to it by all those relations, and by fulfillment of all the requisites which have heretofore governed in the admission of new States, except this one, that there is a recognition of slavery in its constitution; and he must indeed be willingly blind to scenes around him, who does not know that this recognition of slavery alone bars the way to admission. It is the objection taken to it in the review, the very able review, though I think not exactly according to history in many of its facts, of the honorable Senator from New York. It was the point against which were leveled the arguments of the honorable Senator from Vermont. Slavery is the theme, the only theme. Now let us have it frankly avowed. Here are two States applying for admission at the same time; and it is understood that the honorable gentleman who now represents the Committee on Territories is to propose, as a substitute for this bill, one that shall admit both together, the State of Minnesota and the State of Kansas. Are any objections taken to Minnesota? I have heard of none. That comes here as a free State; and, too, with abundance of irregularity in all that has been done in preparing a State government. I challenge gentlemen on the other side now to object to the admission of Minnesota because of the irregularity under which she comes. What has she done? In the first place, she had no convention at all. A law was passed by Congress to take the sense of the people, and provide for a convention to form a constitution for Minnesota; but she has never executed that law, because there never was a convention; but on the contrary, there assembled two bodies, each claiming to be the convention, with power to form a constitution.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator undertake to say, much less to show, that the people of Minnesota, or any majority of the people of Minnesota, or any portion of the people of Minnesota, object to being admitted into the Union under this constitution? That is the difference in the cases; in the one the people desire to be admitted.

Mr. MASON. I would answer the honorable Senator that I am utterly unaware that any portion of the people of the Territory of Kansas object to being admitted into the Union under this constitution. If you listen to popular clamor, to irresponsible mobs, who undertake to regulate government, not by law, but in despite of law, you may say they are unwilling to be admitted; but I answer the Senator as an American statesman, that the only way in which the popular voice should reach him, or can reach me, is through organs of law. I have yet to hear the first voice from Kansas objecting to this constitution. However, that shall not disturb the level of my argument. I want to know whether, when Minnesota comes, as she will come in the same bill for admission with Kansas, we shall hear any objection made as to the irregularity of the proceedings by which her constitution was framed. There was no convention in the first place. The delegates met, and before organization separated into two parts, and remained separate up to the day of adjournment. They finally framed a constitution by a committee. These separate bodies, not claiming to be coördinates, but each claiming to be the convention, by a committee of conference formed a constitution. Some clumsy mode of that sort was adopted. The instrument was afterwards submitted separately to these separate bodies, and taken by them as the constitution. But here is a still greater irregularity, which Kansas certainly has not attempted; the Territory of Minnesota has undertaken to elect two Senators of the United States, who shall be Senators when Minnesota becomes a State, and has undertaken to elect three members of the other House of Congress, who shall be members of the other House provided it shall be found that the law of Congress assigns three members to them. That, it is true, has been done heretofore. It was done in the State of California—contested by us—objected to as irregular and revolutionary; but the objection was overruled by Congress. I do not mean to say, in the case of Minnesota, or the case of California, that the objections were insuperable; because, if we admit the State, and admit the Senators elected before it was a State, our act of admission may be as good in ratification of what is done, as if authorized in the first instance. But I say these irregularities exist, and very great ones they are.

It is proposed that Kansas and Minnesota shall be admitted together. I, for one, gratified as I should be to see the States holding slaves multiplying in this Confederacy as rapidly at least as those not holding slaves, yet seeing the very opposite, and that the great increase is to be on the part of the free States, still am not prepared to cast my vote against the admission of a State because it is a free State. I ask honorable Senators on the other side if they hold the same position before the American people? The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who was questioned on that very point to-day, said it was enough for him to know that a State was a slave State, to deny her admission; and I take it that is the spirit and feeling of honorable Senators on the other side who represent the non-slaveholding States. How then do we stand? What equality have we in this Union? The social condition of the slaveholding States, together with its just and legitimate expansion, must be preserved as necessary both to their honor and to their safety. It cannot be, if the existence of slavery within its borders is enough to preclude its admission as a member of the Federal Union. What do honorable Senators on the other side intend? Do they intend to force the people of the southern States to put an end to this Confederacy? Answer us that. We have the occasion before us now in which almost avowedly you refuse to admit another State because it is a slaveholding State. How far you will succeed I do not know, but that is the purpose. We have been admonished by the honorable Senator from New York that when the time comes which he anticipates when his friends get into power, there shall be no further admission of slave States. That honorable Senator announced in exulting tones, but I think rather in advance of the fact, that the battle had been fought and already won.

The battle, he said, was to give the numerical preponderance to the free States, because the States are equally represented on this floor, and that was already attained. That battle is fought and won. This is a very significant warning. What are to be the fruits of victory? He shadowed them out to some extent. One branch of the Government, the judiciary, stands in his path, or in the way of his party. That branch is to be reorganized, reconstructed, or, as the honorable Senator explains it now, popularized. I would say to that honorable Senator, though in no exulting tones, however, that so far as I can read the public mind of this country, the battle is not fought, far less is it won.

What do we see? For the first time in forty years, it is proclaimed on this floor, you shall have no more slave States. That is the direct issue before us in this Kansas question, notwithstanding the mist which some have endeavored to throw around it. That battle is now depending. It is neither fought nor won. I will not undertake to say how it will result; but I do know that although friends around me from the northern States have been told on the other side there is not a man amongst them who will survive a vote for the admission of Kansas, they are prepared to do it, and take the consequences. If it be true, that to vote for the admission of another slave State into this Confederacy is to consign the representative to political death, it will take no prophet to tell how long this Union will hold together.

But what do they want? What do they propose when they get the Government—if they should get it? We have three million slaves in the southern States. As my honorable and eloquent colleague said the other day, they are operating there as the means of culture and civilization upon the swamps and morasses and wilderness of the southern country. They are contributing more than any other laboring population known at this day, to the promotion and the extension of all the great benefits resulting from the highest civilization. What do you propose? What is to be done with these three million slaves when the Government passes into your hands? To manifest the elevated purposes of your philanthropy, they are to be set free and returned to barbarism, and that country which they have redeemed by their labor, a country that no other labor could redeem, is to be consigned to its original desolation of swamps and wilderness and morass! That is the result of your theory; that is to be the result of this high philanthropy and benevolence by which you claim to be actuated.

Mr. President, if the States and the people of the States would only look at things as they are, they would see that we have a continent here peculiarly fitted for that priceless form of government which we have adopted, and a Government equally fitted for the continent. There was an impression, I know, actuating the minds of many of our early statesmen, that our forms of government were not susceptible of expansion, but that, in course of time, by its very expansion, the Government would break to pieces of its own weight. So far as I can read the great mission of popular government upon this continent, the very reverse is to be the result. If there be a Government on earth that is susceptible of indefinite expansion, it is the Government of these States. What are they? A confederation of equal sovereigns, each member of the Confederacy a separate organized political community; and, if one or more should fall from the Confederacy, at the very instant of the severance such State would be a perfect whole, and in the immediate exercise of every function that pertains to government—terres alque rotundus—an executive, a legislative, a judiciary department, organized with officers capable of exercising every function of independent power; hardly requiring any additional legislation; but what might be necessary to make provision for foreign intercourse. If the American mind could only be brought to look on this Government in its true character, and remit to the States what belongs to them—the exclusive jurisdiction of their own affairs within their own limits—not interfering with them, but adhering to the behests of the Constitution, and administering only those great Federal powers which were conferred upon the common Government for the common good of the whole, in the administration of which, appropriately done, there would be no interference or collision with State authorities: what would be the result? State after State might come into the Union; they might expand, as they have done, from thirteen to thirty-one and to sixty-one and to one hundred and one; and they would all revolve as harmoniously around their common orbit, the Federal Government, as did the original thirteen; susceptible of expansion to any extent, and stronger as they expanded. And as if to anticipate such expansion in the advancement of the arts of civilized life, the telegraphs and railroads of modern construction lend their powerful aid to bind them together by agencies that annihilate time and space.

What then is proposed? To get a political party into power by crushing out of existence one of the greatest agencies of civilization that the world has ever known—destroying not only the constitutional, but the domestic harmony, that fraternal regard, that should ever actuate citizens of a common country. Violence and discord, detraction and calumny, are badly calculated to promote good will or to retain communities in friendly relations. If the great American mind could only be made to realize what would be the condition of things if their public agents were kept within the limits of constitutional control, they would see, as I sometimes venture (I hope without utopian vision) to contemplate this Government extended over a confederation of States, the number of which shall be limited only by the boundless expanse of a continent stretching from sea to sea; State after State entering the Union; and each received with that cordial welcome which should signalize the access of a new confederate of common lineage, ranging side by side under a common destiny. To what may we not aspire if this great and prosperous Confederacy can be preserved? But if it must be otherwise, let the responsibility rest where impartial history shall assign it.

Mr. CLARK obtained the floor.

Mr. GREEN. I wish to make a suggestion. I propose that the Senate take a recess for two hours, and then reassemble for the discussion which may be desired. I submit that motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the Senator, so as to have an understanding about this matter, at what hour he intends that we shall resume our session?

Mr. GREEN. Half past six o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After we meet again, how long does he design to sit?

Mr. GREEN. I presume as long as we can well indulge in debate. I apprehend there will be no difficulty. I do not suppose there will be a vote to-night.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is it intended to push it to an unreasonable hour to-night?

Mr. GREEN. I want to afford the fullest opportunity for debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate take a recess until half past six o'clock.

Mr. STUART. I suppose that motion is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear a suggestion from the Senator on the point of order.

Mr. STUART. It is not competent, I think, for a Senator to move that the Senate take a recess. That question has been submitted very often since I have been in the body, and it has always been decided that it could not be done without unanimous consent. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. TOOMBS. I differ with the Senator from Michigan entirely. There is nothing in the rules to prevent the Senate taking a recess for two hours. It has been done repeatedly in the two Houses. It contravenes no rule of this body, and does not require unanimous consent. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present motion is to adjourn. When that shall be disposed of the Chair will decide, if it be necessary, the point of order raised by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BIGLER called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; and they were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. I have some delicacy as to voting on the question. On Saturday last one of the Senators from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] received the distressing news of the severe illness of his son, and asked me to pair off with him on the Kansas question. I agreed to do so. I am in doubt whether I ought to vote on this motion. This is not the Kansas question. The difficulty I have is, whether, on his return, he may not think that I ought to have refrained from voting. I shall therefore decline to vote; but I do not believe that I am bound to refuse voting. I do so out of respect to what may be the views of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DÜRKEE. I desire to say that I have paired off.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] desired to go away for an hour or two, and I agreed not to vote on any question connected with this matter until his return, unless my vote should be necessary to make a quorum. I desire also to state that the Senator from Texas [Mr. HENDERSON] has paired off with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, resulted—yeas 17, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sibley, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—23.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate take a recess for two hours. The Senator from Michigan raises a question of order on that motion.

Mr. WILSON. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he allow the Senator from New Hampshire, as he has the floor, to go on.

Mr. GREEN. I have no objection.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say, while I am up, that, on examination of the condition of affairs in the Senate, I find there are fourteen speeches to be made against this bill by men who have not spoken, and some half a dozen, at least, I think, for it. Now, it seems to me to be wrong for the sixteen gentlemen who have addressed the Senate upon this question at proper hours, now to force gentlemen, who have as good a claim to address the Senate as they can have, into unseemly hours of the night. By remaining here in the Senate steadily during the proper hours, the debate can be closed in seven, or eight, or ten days. I see no reason why we should be pressed in this matter, as there is no disposition here, there has been no disposition shown, to make any factious opposition; and I claim that the Senators who have not spoken have as good a right to be heard during proper hours as those who have addressed the Senate. I trust that those Senators who have been allowed, in the proper business hours of the Senate, to speak to this body, and to the country, will not vote to press others into midnight hours. There is no hurry for pressing this matter through the Senate, or through Congress, with such haste.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts. If Senators have not spoken in proper hours, whose fault is it? For several weeks we have been adjourned over, against our protests, from Thursday until Monday.

Mr. WILSON and others. Only once.

Mr. BROWN. Well, say once. It certainly has been attempted more than that. The other side of the Chamber has been continually urging adjournments from day to day, and at the earliest possible hours. I belong to the number who have already spoken. I spoke at an early day; but certainly there have been abundant opportunities for other gentlemen to speak, if they had chosen to do it. We are now far advanced in the session—far advanced in the fourth month of the session; and yet this bill has stood in the way of every other measure before Congress, and it is universally admitted that it will stand in the way until it is disposed of. Here, in the middle of the fourth month of the session, we are asked to adjourn from day to day in a spirit of courtesy to gentlemen who would not avail themselves of an opportunity to speak when time was being wasted. I wish, for one, to vindicate myself from the charge which is now made. If the time that has already been wasted had been properly occupied, no such appeal would have lain. I am not for pressing this question unreasonably or unjustly upon any one; but it must be seen that, unless we intend to waste all the summer days in the discussion of this question, we must commence urging gentlemen up to a delivery of their views.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Stuart.

SENATE.

I should not have said this if I had not been in the category of those who have spoken early. I did not speak at any unreasonable time; I did not insist on the Senate sitting for my accommodation, if it did not desire to do so; nor did I take advantage of its sitting. Other gentlemen, I know, could have spoken, if they had chosen to do it. If they did not choose to do it, I think it is too late to ask this species of courtesy.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question before the Senate, the Senator from Missouri having withdrawn his motion. These remarks, however, may be indulged in by unanimous consent. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not know that the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. GREEN. I remarked that if the Senator from New Hampshire desired to proceed now, I would withdraw my motion, and hear him with pleasure, for it is not my wish to procrastinate debate, or to interfere with a fair opportunity for debate. It is my wish to expedite business, and I think that ought to be the wish of all. My motion is withdrawn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With the indulgence of the Senate, I wish to make a remark or two in relation to this matter; and I wish to make it in a spirit of kindness and conciliation which I feel. I think there is nobody here who will accuse me, certainly, of a disposition, at any time, to make any factious opposition to anything that is in the regular order of business. The honorable Senator from Mississippi is mistaken in saying that this question has stood in the way of all other business. This report has not been made for more than a month. This bill has not been before the Senate very long.

Mr. BROWN. I know this precise bill has not been, but the Kansas question has been here all the time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am aware that some speeches were made on the President's message from time to time; but in the meanwhile a great deal of other business has been done, and only one speech, I think, in relation to this general matter was made on the Army bill. The Army bill was debated for a long time. We certainly could not get at this question as it is presented to the Senate until a bill was before the body. The bill was reported some four weeks ago, I think—I do not recollect the exact time—and then a future day was assigned for its consideration. It was taken up at the time designated by the honorable Senator from Missouri who has it in charge, and since that time the debate has gone steadily on—beginning sometimes at one o'clock, and sometimes at half past twelve o'clock—from day to day.

The Senate will observe that only once has there been any question in reference to adjournment over from Thursday until Monday, and that was a week ago last Thursday. That is the only time when a vote was taken on that proposition. It passed at other times by common consent, and the motion always came from one of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, not from us. Certainly no blame can be imputed to the gentlemen on this side. Senators will recollect that when the President's message was under consideration, the Senators on this side were urged to withhold their remarks in relation to Kansas until the question should come up before the Senate regularly. I was urged to do so myself; but I chose to make then the remarks which I had to make. I made at that time the main speech which I intended to make; and I do not know that I shall make any other. No time was lost by that.

Mr. GREEN. You are losing time now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that; but I wish simply to understand the Senator, and I wish him to understand me. What I mean to say is simply this: that gentlemen on this side of the Chamber have been led by the solicitations of gentlemen on the other side, and by their own sense of the propriety of the time, to withhold the remarks they wished to make, and which they feel it to be their duty to make, until this bill came up. They have had as yet no opportunity to make those remarks. They wish to do it, and to do it at reasonable hours of the day.

Now, I am not disposed to quarrel with gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber because they want to urge this business. I will agree that they shall urge the Senate, and that the Senate shall submit, so far as I am concerned, to a little greater stress in point of time; work more hours than we ordinarily do; but what I object to is that we should be pushed to unreasonable hours in the evening. We all know that it is very fatiguing. If the Senator from New Hampshire goes on with his speech now, we shall have had three speeches to-day, and it will probably take him until seven o'clock. I wish to understand whether there is then a desire to push us into the night. ["Yes."] That being understood, I wish to assure gentlemen on the other side—I may say my friends on the other side of the Chamber, because personally I have no collision with them—that so far as I know, and I believe I understand the matter, there is no disposition here to procrastinate the time unreasonably. All we demand is, that at reasonable and proper hours of the day, when men have the strength and the vigor, (and a very considerable degree of strength is necessary to address the Senate upon this subject,) they may have time to do so.

Mr. BIGGS. Will the Senator from Maine fix a time when he will agree to take the vote?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot, because I do not know how many speeches are to be made. I say that when we have got through with a fair debate on our side, we have no further objection to make; and we want time, at reasonable and proper hours, for that debate. I hope, in order to the preservation of the good feeling personally which ought to prevail among gentlemen on both sides, that will be acceded to. That is all we desire.

Mr. GREEN. I beg leave merely to remark, that I do not think I have exhibited any hot haste in pressing this question before the Senate and the country. I did object, when the subject was first brought before the consideration of the Senate, when there was no practical question pending; but, in spite of my objection, it was discussed day after day. It has been discussed to a greater or less extent now for three months. Although the bill has been before the Senate not quite a month—for it was reported on the 18th day of February—still it has been discussed longer than almost any other question ever has been discussed that passed this body.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will allow me to suggest one thing to him?

Mr. GREEN. I would rather not be interrupted. When the Kansas-Nebraska bill passed, it was discussed for thirty-nine days before it was reported, alternately, occasionally. After it was reported, three days' discussion were allowed, and three days only. Since this bill was made the special order, it has been continued for two weeks and we are now told it will take two weeks more. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] told me this morning that, perhaps, we could get through in two weeks more. I know it is unpleasant to be crowded into an unreasonable hour of the day, and I also know that the most seasonable hour is about one o'clock; but can every man commence his speech just at one o'clock? I know that is the best hour for gentlemen here, but we have to take the chances to get the floor and avail ourselves of the opportunities as they present themselves. The public business must not be delayed to permit every Senator to commence his speech at one o'clock. If so, it is to be continued sixty days more, and perhaps still longer, for some may desire to make even more than two or three speeches. I know there is not the slightest feeling to suppress a fair debate, but there is a desire to hasten that debate, giving as fair opportunities to every Senator as the circumstances of the case will admit. If a just regard to the public business will permit me to do so, I would prefer to adjourn now and allow the Senator who has just obtained the floor to commence his speech at one o'clock to-morrow. If, however, I were to do so, I should be sacrificing my sense of the duty which I owe to my country merely to accommodate a gentleman and a friend. I claim that I have no right to do that; it is not my privilege to do that. I must keep an eye towards the great interests of this country, rather than consult the personal feelings of honorable gentlemen. I have no desire to crowd them into unreasonable hours; but I wish the public business to go forward.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When Senators talk of the time that has been taken up, I wish them to remember that about all the time that was occupied on the subject of Kansas during the first part of the session until this bill was brought in, was on the other side of the Chamber. On this side we took very little part in it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not involved in this controversy at all, and I wish to make a suggestion to which perhaps gentlemen will accede. I desire to see the subject disposed of so soon as it reasonably can be; and with that view, I move that we meet hereafter at eleven o'clock. I suppose the motion will lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to it; let it lie over.

Mr. BIGGS. I would very willingly accede to a proposition that might be made on the other side, if they would fix any reasonable time for taking the vote; but I see no disposition manifested on that side to appoint a time for taking the vote. Therefore, as this discussion is entirely out of order, and there seems to be no disposition on the other side to propose a time for taking the vote, I object to any further discussion, and hope the Senator from New Hampshire, who is entitled to the floor, will proceed.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STUART. I ask the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire to allow me to submit a motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield the floor to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until one o'clock to-morrow. I find myself compelled to submit a motion in order to be enabled to suggest to the Senate what I think I might with propriety have been permitted to say after the course of other gentlemen. Inasmuch, however, as that does not seem to be the disposition here, I submit this motion, and I desire to say two or three things in correction of the history which has been given of this transaction; and to submit a proposition for the consideration of the Senate which, I think, we may very well agree to.

In the first place, as to the delay, I think it will be found on an examination of the records of the Senate that a majority, my own impression is nearly all of them, but certainly a majority of the motions which have been made to adjourn over from Thursday until Monday, have been made by gentlemen favoring this bill since the session commenced. When a motion was made since this bill was reported, to adjourn from Thursday to Monday, I was here in my seat, and voted against it; and it does not become those gentlemen now, who are in favor of this measure, having absented themselves from their seats at that time, to bring that matter up as a charge against those who oppose the measure. If they had been here, as I may say I was, and voted as I did, we should not have adjourned over.

Now, sir, let us see if there has been any disposition on the part of the Senate to abuse the rules of discussion. Has it been manifested by those who oppose this bill? Have they shown a disposition to discuss it factiously to consume time? I know of no such disposition. Is there anything in the condition of the country requiring this unusual course of procedure? What has brought it about? Why, sir, it was agreed to take the question on the Army bill on a certain Wednesday or Thursday, and when that day arrived,

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Clark.

SENATE.

the majority of the Senate on this side of the body were out of their seats, not ready to vote, and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs moved its postponement on that account. I was here and ready to vote for it.

Now, sir, there is a certain amount of labor that men can perform, and there is an amount beyond that which they cannot perform, in justice to their own health. If we can sit here six hours in the day until the fair, legitimate, and proper discussion is ended, I think it is as much as any man, in justice to himself or his country is called upon to do. I am willing to meet after to-day at twelve o'clock and remain here until six. I am willing that the Senate shall to-day or to-morrow fix that the Senate shall be in session that number of hours, if you please; anything that those in favor of this measure desire in order to induce fair discussion. But, sir, I am unable to see a reason, I have heard no reason, why this discussion should now at this day be forced into night sessions. I have shown that the reasons which have been urged lay at the door of this side of the House. We have been adjourning over, so that that does not constitute a reason. The adjourning over is our fault, or if gentlemen please, it is theirs, for I ask no particular favors for having voted against it. If the friends of this bill, those who are now urging night sessions to complete its discussion had been here, they had the power to prevent it; and therefore, that does not constitute a reason for undertaking to force night sessions, and night discussions at this time. I submit that if we sit here six hours in the day, it is as much as the subject demands, and it is as much as Senators can be called upon properly to perform. I agree most freely that whenever the time arrives that there shall appear to be a discussion here for the mere purpose of consuming time, the friends of this measure may then take any course they please, and I will not object to it. Now I withdraw my motion to postpone.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to remark, with the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire, that I have invariably voted against adjourning from Thursday to Monday; and I voted in favor of the motion made a little while ago to adjourn. I did so on the principle that it is more agreeable to transact business in daylight than at night. I shall never forget the memorable occasion on which this subject, with many others, was inaugurated on this floor, when I was gagged down, between the hours of three and five o'clock in the morning, on the occasion of the repeal of the Missouri compromise. I shall never forget that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Messrs. BROWN and GREEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamilton, Harlan, Houston, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sillide, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—25.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am much obliged to the honorable Senator from Missouri for the assurance that this is not to be an effort of physical exertion; that he is not disposed to crowd this debate into unseasonable hours. I have been here in my seat in the Senate since twelve o'clock, and I am not, perhaps, physically well prepared to go on at great length to-night; but if the debate is to continue, I am prepared with the materials around me to go so far as the Senate may be pleased to listen until I get through. I have refrained from mingling in this debate earlier than the present time. The question was put to me, "whether I intended to speak on the subject when it was before the Senate in a different form?" My reply was, "that I did at some time, if convenient, intend to speak; but that I intended to speak on the subject when it came before the Senate in a practical form, when there was something proposed to be done, when the bill to admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution should be here." It is here now; it is before us by a report from the Committee on Territories; and I propose to discuss the policy of the admission of Kansas as a State with the Lecompton constitution.

Before I go further, I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Missouri, who seems to have the charge, in some sort, of this debate, whether he wishes to qualify the language of his report on the ninth page, where he says:

"Such are the characters, such are the objects, and the dangerous results of the opponents of the Lecompton constitution?"

Mr. GREEN. The only qualification I make is to be understood from its context. I am speaking of those in Kansas—of course not of honorable Senators who oppose it here.

Mr. CLARK. That was the very point I wanted to note. The language goes that length. That is the fair interpretation.

Mr. GREEN. Take the context and see.

Mr. CLARK. I take it that every part of the report means something, and if the Senator had expressed what he intended by the previous paragraph in the report, he would not have added this clause. He meant something more. That is the fair rule of interpretation. The previous paragraph was confined to persons in Kansas. This goes the whole length, and applies to all opponents of the Lecompton constitution. I wanted to ask whether the language was not varied intentionally, because I desired to know whether I stood here charged as a culprit, or whether I stood here as a Senator on this floor having equal rights with the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly I will.

Mr. GREEN. The prior part of the report gives a historical detail drawn from official papers. That one expression is a deduction of their character from the historical facts before stated, and the connection is a necessary one. It is confined to parties in Kansas.

Mr. CLARK. That is a matter of inference and argument on the part of the Senator from Missouri. He understood undoubtedly what he meant by this expression when he put it here. He knows the force of the language, and that is the reason why I interrogate him. I can know only from the language what he did mean. The language is broad enough to cover the meaning I attributed to it; but I presume now the Senator did not mean it, and he will pardon the suggestion. I am content with the qualification he makes in regard to myself, but there are numbers of people from my State in Kansas, and if he intends to apply it to them, it is entirely false and wrong.

Mr. GREEN. Do you desire any response to that?

Mr. CLARK. Just as the Senator pleases.

Mr. GREEN. I am not giving an inference as to what my meaning was. I am stating it, and state that that itself is an inference drawn from the facts stated in the prior part of the report. I am not qualifying it or taking back one word. I stand upon the record of the country. I qualify it not. I believe it to be true; but whether it be true or not, is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence submitted. Having described these persons, having quoted from Governor Walker, I then say "such are the characters"—the characters are given in the facts stated; "such are the objects"—the objects they aim at as announced by Governor Walker, are rebellion and revolution; "and such are the dangerous results of the opponents of the Lecompton constitution." As a matter of course, as I was speaking of those opponents in Kansas, it must necessarily be confined to them.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, it seems to me that we have so much wholesale denunciation in this report, and otherwise, in regard to those people who oppose the Lecompton constitution, that it is perfectly legitimate and fair for me to make the inquiry how far the gentleman meant to go; and I desire to make the further inquiry of him whether he means to apply this language to citizens of my State or any portion of them in Kansas who are there now.

Mr. GREEN. I did not know that there was a citizen of the Senator's State in Kansas. If so, he has no business there and ought to go out.

Mr. CLARK. The gentleman understands what I mean, and I cannot be turned aside. He must have known that I meant citizens from New Hampshire who have gone into Kansas, and who have a right to be there.

Mr. GREEN. Very well; if the Senator means those who were once citizens of New Hampshire and are now citizens of Kansas, I say that if Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton speak of them, I speak of them. I speak of those men they describe.

Mr. CLARK. Then I understand the gentleman to have based his whole assertion on what has been said by Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, and he goes no further. I say to him he is not warranted in making that wholesale assertion in regard to the opponents of the Lecompton constitution, because Governor Walker does not say any such thing; he does not name a man, he does not say that one citizen in Kansas who went from my State has been guilty of any rebellion or insurrection, or disorder whatever. Now I tell the Senator from Missouri there are men, acquaintances, old neighbors of mine in Kansas, men who have gone from my State—not from the purlieus of the great cities, but honorable, respectable men, tradesmen, mechanics, men who cultivate the soil. They are in Kansas now, and are opposing this constitution, but they are peaceable and orderly men. If the Senator from Missouri did not know that these men were in rebellion he ought not to have made this sweeping charge on the testimony of anybody. Sir, I am disposed to hold the honorable Senator, so far as I may, responsible for the truth of the statement he makes in his report. He presents the evidence here, and we may judge upon the evidence which he presents; but we cannot know whether that is the only evidence, or whether it is a partial statement; and hence, I ask him whether he proposes to apply that statement to the citizens of my State. I put that question because I hold, as was said by the gentleman himself, the other day, that men are not to be condemned by classes; men are to be condemned, or upheld, or praised as individuals. I agree that there is great danger of wrong when you undertake to condemn men by classes. You may go into any portion of the country, and you will find good men of one class, and bad men of the same class. You may go into almost every sect of religion, and find good men of that sect, and bad men of that sect. Why may you not find good men in Kansas, I ask the honorable Senator, opposed to the Lecompton constitution? There may have been men in that Territory who have been guilty of some indiscretion—I do not say there have not been, for I do not know, and I do not admit that there are; but what I mean to say is that the Senator should not, in this report, make these charges, because they go out to the country, they go on to the files of the Senate, they stand here as part of the country's record, when they are not supported by the facts.

It is no apology for the gentleman's statement in regard to these men; it brings no consolation to them, to have him get up here and state that, if Governor Walker meant to condemn them, he means to condemn them; that, if Mr. Stanton spoke of them, he means to speak of them. Who are the men that he speaks of? All the opponents of the Lecompton constitution put in a mass, put together, and condemned, in Kansas, as he says now, and as I had some reason to believe.

Now, Mr. President, before I go further, I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia who last addressed the Senate, if he will permit me to do so, a question which may facilitate the debate. I wish to ask him, on what he grounds the law of slavery, whether upon the common law or the law of nations? so that I may be prepared to discuss definitely and distinctly, point after point, directly as he makes his positions. I do not wish to ramble in the debate. I was not quite sure—if I had been I should not ask the honorable Senator—on what law he did ground it; though I understood him to ground it upon the common law and upon the law of the civilized world, that is, the law of nations; but I did not understand whether he went any further. If he will inform me that I am right in my inference, that he did ground it on the common law or on the law of nations, and did not go any further, that will answer entirely my purpose.

35TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Clark.

SENATE.

Mr. MASON. I understand the honorable Senator to ask me on what I ground the law of slavery? I would answer the honorable gentleman by saying, that I am not aware that there is any other law that pertains to slavery than those laws which pertain to every other species of property.

Mr. CLARK. Then I am obliged, in order to get any species of information, to ask on what law he grounds the right to other property; whether the common law, or the law of nations; because I get no information, as I understand the Senator's answer now. It is altogether too indefinite for my purpose. The Senator is under no obligation to answer. Perhaps he has not made up his mind.

Mr. MASON. I certainly did not intend to treat the Senator with the slightest discourtesy.

Mr. CLARK. Not the least.

Mr. MASON. I will answer with great pleasure any question in my power. I assumed, in the course of my speech to-day, that the African slave stood to the general law of the country, meaning the common law, exactly in the relation of any other property; that it required no law to create it, it required no law to regulate it, and no law to protect it; no more than it required a law to create slavery in an ox, or to regulate or protect it. Now, if the honorable Senator asks me on what ground I place the law of slavery, I would remit him at once to the common law, which recognizes such a thing as property. The honorable Senator from Maine referred to the first interview that took place between the Deity and the first man, and he said that was Blackstone's theory. I would not interfere with it, for that was what I understood to be the higher law. We know that cannot be administered on earth, except by a theologian.

Mr. CLARK. I will state my purpose in asking the question of the Senator, to show what I mean. I understood him distinctly to state that slavery was grounded on the common law, or existed by the common law. I am prepared with authority after authority, from 1694 down to the present time, in England; I am prepared with authority after authority in our State courts; I am prepared with the authority of the United States courts, that slavery does not exist by the common law. I am prepared to prove that it does not exist by the law of nations, and I wanted to be prepared for any other point on which the gentleman rested. That was the reason of my question.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly I will do so.

Mr. MASON. Suppose a man should come here from Liverpool, and bring with him a valuable horse worth $10,000, and that horse were to be taken from him by the hand of violence, would not our courts interpose to recover his horse for him? and would it not be because it was recognized as the property of the man who brought it here? I want to know upon what law on the continent of America you recognize the property of the Englishman who brought the horse over; to what do you trace it? My position was, that the common law recognized property in whatever was property coming from another nation, and when these negroes were brought from Africa, the condition of property attached to them in Africa was recognized by the common law. Precisely as the law of nations recognized property in the horse, the common law here gave property in the horse; the common law so recognized it, be it a horse or an ox.

Mr. CLARK. I understood the gentleman to start with a question, but he wound up with some assertion and an argument. I do not know whether he wishes me to answer the question or not. If he does, I will say to him that the common law recognized property in a horse, but I will also state to him distinctly, and prove it before I get through, that the common law does not recognize property in man, and I think I shall make the distinction broad and clear.

Mr. MASON. If you prove that, you will refute my proposition.

Mr. CLARK. I do not understand all the Senator says.

Mr. MASON. I say if you prove that the common law does not recognize property in a slave, you will refute my proposition.

Mr. CLARK. Yes; I think I shall. I shall endeavor to do it. I have not a doubt of where I come to, if I succeed.

Mr. MASON. I do not fear it.

Mr. CLARK. I know the gentleman does not fear anything. I do not wish that he should fear anything I should say. It is not my purpose to say anything that would put him, myself, or anybody else in fear. We are here for the purpose of discussion; and if it be the pleasure of the Senate and of the honorable Senator, I will pursue the line of argument which I had proposed to myself here.

I want to take my departure on this voyage from a port in the Constitution, and I want to be clearly understood; because I shall differ materially from many gentlemen that have spoken before. I may advance some new ideas—ideas which have not been referred to; but I wish to say I commit nobody around me—not one man in this Senate—to anything that I may have to say. If it is heterodox, I say it on my own responsibility. If it is orthodox, I say it on authority which I have about me. I do not know that anybody will agree with me, except the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. Foster,] in one part, because he has already foreshadowed his principles in that particular, and on that we agree.

But some things are taken for granted that seem to have been passed in silence, which I am going to controvert. One of them was the position taken by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and it was also taken by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] in his speech yesterday, that we have no right, in discussing this matter, to look into the Lecompton constitution any further than to see that it is republican. I deny it entirely. I claim the right to look that constitution in the face, to look at it from the top of its head to the sole of its foot, to examine it thoroughly, to pass my judgment upon it deliberately as a Senator of the United States, and to say whether, upon an examination of that constitution—not alone, but with other things, (or alone, if I please)—I will admit Kansas under that constitution, or not. I start in the proof of what I have to say, with the Constitution of the United States. Here is the article, and here is the point of my departure:

"Sec. 3, article 4. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

New States may be admitted, Mr. President. That implies, if Congress pleases. They may be admitted by Congress, and they may not be admitted by Congress, where Congress pleases not to admit them. That is a matter left to the sound discretion of Congress to judge of it when a State proposes to come in, not only with reference to the new States, but with reference to the old States; to examine the constitution which she brings; to examine the institutions under which she comes; and if they find anything in the constitution of the new State which is derogatory or injurious to the old States, which is derogatory to the institutions under which we live, which mars the prosperity of the new State even, then we have the right to look into that constitution and reject her if we choose. If this were not so, our discretion would be limited; but in the Constitution there are only two or three limits, and then the whole matter is left in the sound discretion of Congress. In this very section we find, first:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

What next:

"—but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State;"

There is one limitation. Congress may admit new States, but shall not make a new State out of another State. That fixes that point. It then goes on:

"—nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress."

Here are two limitations. Congress may admit new States, or may not; but they shall not erect a new State within the jurisdiction of another State; nor form a new State out of two or more States, without the consent of the Legislatures of those States as well as of Congress. Is there anything further? When you get a little further on, to section four, you find this provision: "Congress shall guaranty?" No, sir, Congress does not guaranty. Congress may admit new States, but Congress does not guaranty:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

Not alone the new State which is admitted; but the United States may guaranty, and shall guaranty, a republican form of constitution to all the States.

Now, Mr. President, there are three limitations put by the Constitution upon the admission of new States. There are no others; and, as I contend, the whole matter rests in the discretion of Congress whether to admit new States or not. Upon this point, that the power rests in the Congress of the United States, and in their sound discretion, I have an authority. I do not regard it as very binding authority. I do not acknowledge its validity to the whole extent to which it goes, but I will take it for what it is worth, and honorable Senators may do so too. It is the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case. I will read from it. Speaking of territory, it says:

"It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress."

Mark the language. The propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress.

Here it is laid down, in this very Dred Scott decision, that Congress have the power, that Congress have the authority committed to their sound discretion, with three limitations placed upon it by the Constitution, and no others: first, that they shall not erect a new State within an old State; second, that they shall not form a new State out of two or more States without the consent of the Legislatures of the States as well as of Congress; third, that the United States shall guaranty a republican constitution. Now, I desire to speak for a few moments upon this clause of the Constitution, that Congress shall guaranty—no, sir, I use the phrase incorrectly—that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will state to the Senator that the form of government and the constitution are two things. The Constitution of the United States guaranties that the form of government shall be republican. It does not speak of the constitution of the State.

Mr. CLARK. I know that it does not say anything in regard to the States having a republican constitution. I use the two terms as synonymous, but the phraseology is peculiar:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

I contend that a State might come into the Union without a constitution, [Mr. BENJAMIN. Certainly.] and have a republican form of government. Then look at the history of that provision of the Constitution. It was a provision adopted by the convention which framed this Constitution, as well for the old as for the new States. It was for the security of those old States as well as for the admission of the new, because it was seen by those wise men who framed this Constitution that there might be intestine division; the constitution of a State might be overthrown, its form of government overthrown, and a form not republican might be established. In order to prevent the mischief which would flow to the several States from such a state of things, a provision was inserted that the Constitution should guaranty a republican form of government to the States. Now, if, in Virginia, it could happen that the constitution or form of government, which is republican, should be overthrown in that old State, the United States would be pledged to interfere, and guaranty to them a republican form of government; because it is not according to the theory of our Government, nor the genius of our institutions, to have a monarchical government, or any other form of government than a republican government, in any of the States. Mr. President, I draw another inference, that such is the conclusion on a fair interpretation of this article from the position in which it is placed. Section four is in these words:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them from invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

The whole section was framed for the purpose of suppressing violence or irregularities leading to the overthrow of a republican form of government in any State of this Union. Such, it is evident, was its design, from the history of the provision. I have here the Madison Papers. They are the history, as you, sir, and honorable Senators well know, of the debates which took place in the convention which adopted the Constitution. I find here the provision guarantying a republican form of Government to all the States by the United States, in the original draft which was presented by Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, to the convention. It may be useful, Mr. President, to look at the history of these matters. You can get the meaning, the force, and the application of these various provisions of the Constitution better by studying their history and their alteration from time to time, as they passed through the convention, than in almost any other way. You see the source from which they came, you see the object for which they were offered, you see the various modifications which took place as they went along; and then it enables you to judge of the precise bearing they may have. I have before me the second volume of the Madison Papers; and I find in this volume that Mr. Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, opened the main business of the convention. He came forward with a plan of government, which had in it especially these two provisions of the Constitution: That the Congress may admit new States; and that the United States shall guaranty to every State of this Union a republican form of government. They were in his original plan. They were, I think, in the plan of Mr. Charles Pinckney, presented afterwards; but I wish only to call your attention, Mr. President, to the original form, that you may see what was the draft, what was the object, and what was the intention of those who brought it into the convention. It stood then, not as it stands now; but it was the eleventh provision of Mr. Randolph's plan:

"Resolved, That a republican form of government, and the Territory of each State, except in the instance of a voluntary junction of government and territory, ought to be guarantied by the United States to each State."

Here was the object. There was then a controversy going on in regard to the boundaries of States. Virginia made large claims to territory; New York made large claims to territory; other States made large claims to territory. The object of this resolution was not entirely to procure a guaranty of its form of government to each State, but it was to procure the guaranty of its territory as well, to bring in the United States to defend and maintain all the boundaries which Virginia had a lawful right to. But before the debate on this proposition got through, it was suggested in convention that Congress ought not to be committed to a quarrel about territory, and hence that provision was struck out. It then went on further to say:

"That Congress shall guaranty a republican form of government."

Then, a little further, it was changed to read in this way:

"Resolved, That a republican constitution, and its existing laws, ought to be guarantied to each State by the United States."

That was the form it once assumed. It was said by some member of the convention, that he would not like to guaranty the laws of Rhode Island, which held a charter under the crown. Some further objection was made, and they struck it out. It was for the protection, safety, and tranquillity of the old States, that it was put in here, and not with a direct reference to the new States. I think Senators go beyond the warranty of the Constitution, they go too far, when they say that this provision was adopted with reference to the new States alone, if they do say so. I am not certain that anybody has said that distinctly, but everybody who has spoken seems to construe it as peculiarly applicable to the new States, and that Congress have no further discretion than to say, that every form of government is republican. I contend that we have a right to go much further, and I propose to go much further in this debate. I propose to look at the Lecompton constitution from its beginning to its end. I propose to discuss its provisions. I propose to say why I object to them, and if I can persuade Senators that my objections are well founded, to do so. I have, I think, a clear right to do so.

It will appear further, Mr. President, that this provision that Congress may admit new States, was not intended to cramp the discretion of Congress, but to leave the whole matter to the sound discretion of the Congress of the United States, as is evident from the history of this provision: Congress may admit new States into the Union. Keep the language, Mr. President, if you please, in your mind. That was a part of Mr. Randolph's plan, not precisely as it stands there, but in these words:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the admission of States lawfully arising within the limits of the United States."

It was not contemplated by anybody, when this provision was brought into the convention, nor when it was adopted, as far as I have been able to trace, that we were to take territory beyond the then territory of the United States, and make new States. It was not proposed; and hence this proposition said, in the original draft, that—

"Provision ought to be made for the admission of States lawfully arising within the limits of the United States"—

—not out of it—

—whether from voluntary junction of government and territory, or otherwise, with the consent of a number of voices in the National Legislature less than the whole."

Now I want to call the attention of honorable Senators to the history of this provision. It shows distinctly what was its meaning, and what was intended by it. Congress may admit new States. The original proposition was that they should admit them out of the then territory of the United States. Then it went further: there was a proposition before the convention that Congress should admit new States out of the territory of the United States upon an equality with the old States. Does anybody pretend, will anybody say, that Congress has the right to admit a new State on a different footing from the old States? I do not say that; yet I will prove to you, from the history of these debates, and from the various modifications that were made to this provision of the constitution, that that provision for putting new States on an equality with the old States was struck out of that provision upon deliberation and upon motion for the very purpose of bringing in new States if they chose, not upon an equality with the old States. I will not go through all the various forms this provision assumed as it traveled through the convention. I will call your attention directly to the point I have in mind. At one time in the progress of this debate, the proposition in regard to new States assumed this form, that Congress may admit new States into the Union:

"If the admission be consented to, the new States shall be admitted on the same terms with the original States."

Here was a proposition distinctly made to tie down the discretion of Congress to the footing of the old States; that they should not have the power to admit a new State, unless it came in on the footing of the old States. I am not contending, and do not let me be so understood, that it would be wise; I will not even contend here that Congress has the power, for that is not my purpose, that is not what I am after; I will not contend that it would be wise, neither will I contend that Congress has power, to admit a new State except on an equal footing with the old States. What I am after, is to show that there was a provision in the original draft of the Constitution, and upon deliberation, upon motion, upon argument pro and con., the convention struck it out, for the very purpose of bringing the western States into the government on a different footing. Let me read from these debates. They are very instructive:

"Article seventeenth being then taken up"—

—which is this in regard to the new States—

"Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out the two last sentences, to wit: 'if the admission be consented to, the new States shall be admitted on the same terms with the original States.'"

Gouverneur Morris, of Pennsylvania, moved to strike out that provision. He did not like it; he did not want new States to come in on an equal footing. I will show you, because the debate shows it, that he also moved to strike out the further provision:

"But the Legislature may make conditions with the new States concerning the public debt which shall then be subsisting."

This is the reason he gave for his motion:

"He did not wish to bind down the Legislature to admit western States on the terms here stated."

That is, on equal terms. He did not want to bind Congress to do it. They should have a discretion.

"Mr. Madison opposed the motion; insisting that the western States neither would nor ought to submit to a union which degraded them from an equal rank with the other States."

I think there is force in the objection. The old States were fearful that the new States formed in the western Territories would grow into a large representation; and it might be they would be able to out-vote the old States by and by, as they are very likely to do, if they have not already done so. He was fearful of that.

"Mr. Madison opposed the motion; insisting that the western States neither would nor ought to submit to a union which degraded them from an equal rank with the other States."

"Colonel Mason. If it were possible, by just means, to prevent emigration to the western country, it might be good policy."

It was not designed then to fill up the western country with emigrant people from the old States, and make States so fast. There was no idea of having them control the thirteen old States. If you would prevent emigration, said Colonel Mason, it would be good policy:

"But go the people will, as they find it for their interest; and the best policy is to treat them with that equality which will make them friends, not enemies."

"Mr. Gouverneur Morris did not mean to discourage the growth of the western country. He knew that to be impossible. He did not wish, however, to throw the power into their hands."

"Mr. Sherman was against the motion, and for fixing an equality of privileges by the constitution."

He was in favor of striking out, but he was for fixing an equality in the constitution:

"Mr. Langdon was in favor of the motion."

The President of the Senate of the First Congress, from New Hampshire, Mr. Langdon, was in favor of the motion:

"He did not know but circumstances might arise, which would render it inconvenient to admit new States on terms of equality."

"Mr. Williamson was for leaving the Legislature free. The existing small States enjoy an equality now, and for that reason are admitted to it in the Senate. This reason is not applicable to new western States."

On Gouverneur Morris's motion, the question being fairly put: Shall that provision confining them to an equality with the old States be stricken out? New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, all voted "ay" to strike it out. We do not want new States upon an equality. We want them under control, so that we can fix them as we please. If their representation is going to overshadow ours we want to limit it. But when they came to adopt a constitution afterwards, they fixed the equality of representation, which, it seems to me, controlled the whole matter on that point. On the motion to strike out, there were nine in favor of it, and two against it, from Maryland and Virginia.

It seems to me conclusively shown, by this history of the provision, that the whole matter, whether we should admit new States on an equality with the old States, was left to the sound discretion of Congress. Congress was to say whether it would admit them. Congress was the Legislature for the thirteen old States. It could examine the situation of those old States; it knew their wants; it knew their requirements, and could say whether new States should come in better than any other body. The whole matter was left in the discretion of Congress. I do not say that that is to be an arbitrary discretion; I do not say that it is to be just as this or that man supposes; but I do say it is to be an exercise of sound discretion—such a discretion as honorable Senators and honorable members of the House of Representatives might be supposed to exercise, governed by all the considerations that enter into so momentous a question; governed by those various considerations as to the position, as to the climate; as to the trade, as to the occupation, as to the number of people, and as to the character of the people of the new States with reference to the old States.

Why, sir, in the debate that has taken place on this subject, honorable Senators seemed to have supposed that a new State had nothing to do but form a constitution just as she pleased, and provided it was republican in its form—nay, provided it had a republican form of government—that she was entitled to come into the Union. Suppose a State comes here, asking admission, with Brigham Young's notion of polygamy; she has a government republican in form, with a Senate and House of Representatives, governed by the election of the people, by those who make laws; with a government republican in form—that is it—not republican in sentiment, not in provision, but in form: you cannot look any further, according to this doctrine; you cannot see what baggage it brought with it; and you might have a State with the institution of polygamy located by the side of an older State: to whom it was very offensive. Suppose a State comes here with a constitution providing that no murder shall ever be punished in the new State: what then? It is hardly a supposable case; but supposing that it had a Senate and House of Representatives and Council, and all the forms of a republican government, and yet a provision that no murder should ever be punished in that State: you cannot look into it—that is the argument—because there is no power under the Constitution except to see that it has a republican form of government. Suppose it tolerated robbery, and should say no robbery should ever be punished: then, if it is republican in form, with a Senate, House of Representatives, all the paraphernalia, all the machinery, all the form, you cannot look into it! What have you to do with robbery in a State? You are only to look into the constitution and guaranty the State a republican form of government. That is all you can do. Well, suppose the constitution of a State contains a provision that no larceny should ever be punished there, and that the government is republican in form, with its Senate and its House: why, sir, if it come with all the iniquity ever dreamed of unpunished—yea, with a provision that it should not be punished in that State; still, if it was republican in its form of government, you have to take it, if that is the doctrine.

I do not believe Congress is tied up in the Constitution in any such way. I believe we have power, if Brigham Young comes here with a constitution tolerating polygamy, to say to Brigham Young, you cannot come into this family with your wives. I believe if any State should come here tolerating murder, robbery, or larceny, we have a right to say that we shall not admit a State allowing those crimes, into this Union. Then I go a step further, and say—

Mr. BIGGS. Does the Senator from New Hampshire assimilate murder, robbery, larceny, and polygamy, with slavery?

Mr. CLARK. I have not done that. I am taking the case of a State coming here allowing the most enormous crimes. I was just going to say—I should have said it if the gentleman had not interrupted me, but I will say it now—that if a State comes here with slavery, which takes the life of a man, which robs him of his labor and liberty, as well as all that belongs to a man, we have a right to look into it. I assimilate it to nothing. I do not know that that institution is like anything else in the world. I hope to God it is not.

Mr. BIGGS. It is an institution that formed a part of the social system of every State in the United States at the formation of the Constitution.

Mr. CLARK. He goes too far in his statement; but still I condemn it because it is disreputable to the Government. The fact that it then generally existed does not make it right.

Mr. BIGGS. Then you are against the Constitution.

Mr. CLARK. No, sir; I am not against the Constitution. I say there are some things in the Constitution which I wish were not there. I am not disposed to extend them, and I will not vote to extend them. That is the position I assume. I had nothing to do with the formation of the Constitution. Its responsibilities, its needs, its requirements, rest somewhere else. I am to deal with the extension of that institution. Its original adoption is one thing; its extension another. I deal with its extension. The question is not whether it went into the thirteen old States. The question is whether it shall go into Kansas. To that I am opposed. I do not hesitate to say it. I say to the honorable Senator just as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] said this forenoon, I will not vote for the admission of Kansas under that constitution, because it does contain a provision for slavery. I do not mean by that assertion to exclude every other objection to it. I have a good many. I stand there square and fair, committing nobody but myself, and to that I mean to be committed. I wish it to be understood that I will not vote to extend slavery into Kansas.

Mr. BIGGS. Or any other State that may apply for admission.

Mr. CLARK. I have not said that. I do not know what cases may arise. It is the part of wisdom of a prudent man to judge of cases when they arise. When another State comes here I will judge of her constitution and of her position in the attitude in which she stands here. I judge of Kansas now; with Kansas alone am I dealing. I think the issue is sufficient, and I want to show the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] that, though other Senators have sought to avoid and conceal the issue, I have not done so. I will not seek to conceal the issue. I say to that honorable Senator, I say to anybody that hears me, that the people of my State are deadly opposed to that institution, and I am here their representative. Nay, sir, I will go further: I will say that the course of the United States Government upon the question of slavery put my colleague and myself here, and we shall maintain the issue which has been committed to our hands, faithfully and fearlessly. We have no threats, no taunts, no ill-feelings to anybody. I make no war upon any State where slavery exists. I do not go into the matter with Delaware or Virginia; they have it; let them take care of it. They have it in Missouri and Georgia; I make no war upon it there; I say nothing about it there; but when asked to extend that institution, I say I am not going to do it. Now, Mr. President, I shall give my reasons why I shall not so vote.

If, however, it be the pleasure of the Senate to adjourn now, it would be very agreeable to me. I have had nothing to eat since eight o'clock; either bread nor anything else.

Mr. HALE. It is now six o'clock.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will give way I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to state that the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] has paired off with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND.]

Mr. FITCH. My colleague, Mr. BRIGHT, and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] paired off for a short time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am requested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] to state that he paired off, until seven o'clock, with the Senator from California, [Mr. BRODERICK.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Pugh, Simmons, Wade, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—22.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President—

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will allow me, I will ask leave to introduce a resolution. If any objection be made, of course I will not ask for its consideration:

Resolved, That, after to-day, the Senate will meet at eleven o'clock, and sit until five, p. m., and then take a recess of two hours, until the bill now before the Senate be disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resolution?

Mr. PUGH. I would rather that it should lie over. The Senator can call it up to-morrow, when we can consider it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution can only be introduced by general consent, and lie over. If there be no objection, it will lie over. The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK. I am only sorry, Mr. President, that I asked the indulgence of the Senate until to-morrow morning. I will endeavor to go along with my argument. I can only assure Senators who voted against the motion, not in the way of any threat, that I propose to proceed; and, although I am hoarse, and it will be uncomfortable to speak, and may be uncomfortable for them to hear, as I am sure it will, I will endeavor to continue my argument.

I now say that I am opposed to the admission of Kansas as a slave State, because the constitution of that State proposes to carry slavery where the common law did not carry it. This brings me to my reply to the authorities cited by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON;] and also to the argument of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN;] for I think I shall be able to show, though the argument of the gentleman from Louisiana was very able, though his tongue was very eloquent, and though he cited numerous authorities, that the weight of authority, the current of decision, and the force of those decisions are entirely to the point in this country, and in England conclusive, that slavery did not exist by the common law. I am about to begin with the earliest case that I can find. I am going to comment upon each case as it proceeds. It may be tedious; but it is the only way in which I shall be able to relieve myself from the position in which I am, because I can here refer to authority and read from books.

The first case that I find bearing upon this point is to be found in Levinz's Reports. It was as early as the 29th Charles II. It was the case of Butts against Penny—the same case which was cited here, I suppose, by the gentleman from Louisiana. It was a case of

"Trover for one hundred negroes, and upon non culp. it was found by special verdict, that the negroes being infidels, and the subjects of an infidel prince, and are usually bought and sold in America as merchandise by the custom of merchants, and that the plaintiff bought these, and was in possession of them until the defendant took them. And Thompson argued, there could be no property in the person of a man sufficient to maintain trover, and cited Co. Lit. 116."

Here you see the doctrine clearly so long ago as the reign of Charles II, that there was no property in man.

"That no property could be in villains but by compact or conquest. But the court held, that negroes being usually bought and sold among merchants as merchandise, and also being infidels, there might be a property in them sufficient to maintain trover, and gave judgment for the plaintiff, nisi causa, this term; and at the end of the term, upon the prayer of the Attorney General to be heard as to this matter, Day was given until next term."

The case never proceeded to judgment. No judgment was rendered upon it, and it is no authority one way or the other. There was a special verdict found, and then time given for showing the cause; and there the matter ended as appears by the report here and in other cases.

That is the first case which I find. The next, Mr. President, is to be found in Lord Raymond's Reports. It is the case of Chamberlain vs. Harvey 8 & 9 William III., before the year 1700—more than seventy years before the Somerset case, which the Senator from Louisiana says was a piece of judicial legislation. It was not new in the history of England at any time.

"Trespass for taking of a negro proletus, 100l. The jury find a special verdict; that the father of the plaintiff was possessed of this negro, and of such a manor in Barbadoes, and that there is a law in that country which makes the negro part of the real estate; that the father died seized, whereby the manor descended to the plaintiff as son and heir, and that he endowed his mother of this negro and of a third part of the manor; that the mother married Watkins, who brought the negro into England, where he was baptized without the knowledge of the mother; that Watkins and his wife are dead, and that the negro continued several years in England; that the defendant seized him, &c. And after argument at the bar several times by Sir Bartholomew Shower of the one side and Mr. Deane of the other, this term, it was adjudged that this action will not lie. Trespass will lie for taking of an apprentice, or hæredum apparentum. An abbot might maintain trespass for his monk; and any man may maintain trespass for another; if he declares with a per quod servitium amisit; but it will not lie in this case. And per Holt, Chief Justice, trover will not lie for a negro."

I find here also a reference to a case which I have been unable to find, between Gelly and Cleve, in which it was adjudged that trover will lie for a negro boy. I mention it because I desire to state authorities fairly. I desire that all shall be presented so that we shall be able to judge how the common law of England was. In a case immediately after this one between Gelly and Cleve, it was adjudged that trover would not lie for a negro slave.

The next case which I have found is in 2 Lord Raymond's Reports. It is the case of Smith vs. Gould. It is also to be found in 2 Salkeld, page 666. It has been quoted on the other side, but, if I understand it, its authority is the other way clearly. The caption is:

"Trover does not lie for a negro. Where several damages are given for several injuries, the judgment may be arrested as to some of them only."

That does not refer to the point.

"In an action of trover for a negro, and several goods, the defendant let judgment go by default, and the writ of inquiry of damages was executed before the Lord Chief Justice Holt, at Guildhall, in London. Upon which the jury gave several damages, as to the goods, and the negro; and a motion as to the negro was made in arrest of judgment, that trover could not lie for it, because one could not have such a property in another as to maintain this action."

That is the ground. Let me read it again:

"That trover could not lie for it, because one could not have such a property in another as to maintain this action."

The report continues:

"Mr. Salkeld, for the plaintiff, argued that a negro was a chattel by the law of the Plantations, and therefore trover would lie for him."

He did not, let me observe, contend that trover would lie by the law of England; but that trover would lie by the law of the Plantations.

"That, by the Levitical law, the master had power to kill his slave, and in Exodus, chapter xx., verse 21, it is said he is but the master's money; that, if a lord confines his villain, this court cannot set him at liberty, (Fitz., Villain, 5.)"

And he relied on the case of Butts and Penny, (2 Lev., 201; 3 Keb., 785,) the one I have just cited, in which no judgment was given.

"As in point, where it was held, trover would lie for negroes. Sed non allocatur. For per totam curiam this action does not lie for a negro no more than for any other man."

That is distinct and emphatic language; and this was in 5 Anne—I think in 1703, sixty-nine years before the Sommersett case. The whole court—nobody dissented—held distinctly that trover would not lie for a negro no more than for any other man. The honorable Senator from Louisiana said that the Sommersett case was a piece of judicial legislation by Lord Mansfield. Here is the same thing sixty-nine years before that case, that trover will not lie for a negro any more than for any other man. It goes on—and I want to call the honorable Senator's attention to this reasoning of the court:

"This action does not lie for a negro no more than for any other man; for the common law takes no notice of negroes being different from other men."

That is the point in this book, that by the common law negroes are like other men. Then the court go on to say:

"By the common law no man can have a property in another?"

remember, this is in 1703—

—"but in special cases, as in a villain!"

villainage then existed—

—"but even in him not to kill him; so in captives took in war, but the taker cannot kill them, but may sell them to ransom them."

But the court go on to say:

"There is no such thing as a slave by the law of England."

This was delivered in 1703, sixty-nine years, as I said before, before that piece of judicial legislation by Lord Mansfield:

"And if a man's servant is took from him, the master cannot maintain an action for taking him, unless it is laid per quod servitium amittit."

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will observe that the question discussed in that decision is a mere technical question as to the forms of action; it is not a question as to the master's right of property.

Mr. CLARK. Then I do not understand it, when the court say that an action of trover does not lie for a negro more than any other man. Can he make trover lie for a white man unless he were a villain at that time?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It would lie for a villain no more than it would for a negro. That case is in regard to the form of action. The chief justice goes on to say, if you want to sue for a slave, put it on the ground that you have lost his labor. That is the form of the action you can bring.

Mr. CLARK. I differ entirely with the Senator from Louisiana, because then you allow the slave to stand upon the ground of a freeman. You can bring an action for his labor.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; as a father may sue for the service of his son.

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir, that is the ground on which you stand. But the court say, in this very case, that there is no property in man; that the law in England does not recognize property in a slave. That is the very point: whether, by the common law, slavery existed in England? and in this very case it was decided that the common law does not recognize slavery. It is a vain attempt to shove it on technicalities. It is fair and square, open and patent.

I now come to the Sommersett case. I cite that, not to be tedious; not because I suppose it is not well understood; but to show that Lord Mansfield considered in his argument the very cases which the Senator from Louisiana has so eloquently commented upon. The Senator from Louisiana talks about the opinion of Sir Philip Yorke, and the decision of Lord Hardwick afterwards. I state here, and will show in the Sommersett case, that in the reasoning of the court, the court were aware of it, and overruled it; and said they could not allow any force to it. I will read the opinion of Lord Mansfield. He says:

"We pay all due attention to the opinion of Sir Philip Yorke and Lord Chief Justice Talbot."

Mr. FESSENDEN. What book are you reading from?

Mr. CLARK. Loft's Reports, 12 George III. I am now reading from the Sommersett case, in 1772, which is to be found on the 19th page:

"We pay all due attention to the opinion of Sir Philip Yorke and Lord Chief Justice Talbot whereby they pledged themselves to the British planters, for all the legal consequences of slaves coming over to this kingdom, or being baptized, recognized by Lord Hardwick, sitting as Chancellor, on the 19th of October, 1749, that trover would lie: that a notion had prevailed, if a negro came over, or became a Christian, he was emancipated, but no ground in law; that he and Lord Talbot, when Attorney and Solicitor General, were of opinion that no such claim for freedom was valid; that though the statute of tithes had abolished villenage regardant to a manor, yet he did not conceive but that a man might still become a villain in gross, by confessing himself such in open court."

Then said Lord Mansfield:

"We are so well agreed that we think there is no occasion of having it argued (as I intimated an intention at first) before all the judges, as is usual, for obvious reasons, on a return to a habeas corpus; the only question before us is, whether the cause on the return is sufficient? If it is, the negro must be remanded; if it is not, he must be discharged. Accordingly, the return states that the slave departed and refused to serve; whereupon he was kept, to be sold abroad. So high an act of dominion must be recognized by the law of the country where it is used. The power of a master over his slave has been extremely different, in different countries. The state of slavery is of such a nature, that it is incapable of being introduced on any reasons, moral or political; but only positive law, which preserves its force long after the reasons, occasion, and time itself, is erased from memory. It is so odious that nothing can be suffered to support it but positive law. Whatever inconveniences, therefore, may follow from a decision, I cannot say this case is allowed or approved by the law of England: and therefore the black must be discharged."

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me to ask if Lord Mansfield does not say, in that very decision, that there were then many thousand pounds' worth of slaves in England?

Mr. CLARK. I will read it all and see. This is Lord Mansfield:

"On the part of Sommersett, the case which we gave notice shall be decided this day, the court now proceeds to give its opinion. I shall recite the return to the writ of habeas corpus, as the ground of our determination, omitting only words of form. The captain of the ship on board of which the negro was taken makes his return to the writ in terms signifying that there have been, and still are, slaves to a great number in Africa; and that the trade in them is authorized by the laws and opinions of Virginia and Jamaica; that they are goods and chattels, and, as such, salable and sold. That James Sommersett is a negro of Africa, and, long before the return of the King's writ, was brought to be sold, and was sold to Charles Stewart, Esq., then in Jamaica, and has not been manumitted since; that Mr. Stewart, having occasion to transact business, came over hither, with an intention to return, and brought Sommersett to attend and abide with him, and to carry him back as soon as the business should be transacted. That such intention has been, and still continues; and that the negro did remain till the time of his departure, in the service of his master, Mr. Stewart, and quitted it without his consent; and thereupon, before the return of the King's writ, the said Charles Stewart did commit the slave on board the Ann and Mary, to save custody, to be kept till he should set sail, and then to be taken with him to Jamaica, and there sold as a slave. And this is the cause why he, Captain Knowles, who was then, and now is, commander of the above vessel, then and now lying in the river Thames, did the said negro, committed to his custody, detain, and on which he now renders him to the orders of the court."

I have now read up to the point where I commenced in the first instance, and I find nothing of that to which the gentleman alludes.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will state, then, that that is an imperfect report.

Mr. CLARK. I do not think it is.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The whole of the decision will be found in 20 Howell's State Trials.

Mr. CLARK. I take it as it is here; and if I found anything in regard to what the Senator alludes to, I would read it. I did not select it because it did not contain such a provision; but on asking for the State Trials at the Library, I was told that it was not in, but that I should find the decision in this volume; and I took it.

The next case which I cite, is one in our own country. I have one further case to cite from England, but I propose to follow the order of time. I have cited a case in 1697. I have cited a case in 1703. There is no case intervening, that I am aware of, between that and the Sommersett case in 1772. I do not find any case after that, and I do not think the question was mooted after 1772 during that century. I do not say there were no other cases. I do not say that I have examined so thoroughly as I desire to. I have taken the cases as I found them, by the aids of such lights as were afforded me within the last few days. I come down now to our own country; and I find a case in the Kentucky Reports, in a slave State. It is the case of Rankin vs. Lydia, a slave. I do not propose to read the whole case, but I propose to read from the remarks of the court.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to read an extract from the Sommersett case on the point which was in issue between him and the Senator from Louisiana. It is in the argument:

"About fourteen thousand slaves are at present here in England."

Mr. CLARK. It may have been so. I do not know how the historical fact was. Negroes may have been there; but the case was not to be decided on the fact of negroes being in the country, but on the fact whether slavery existed there by law. It was not a decision of how many negroes there were in the country. It may have been that a great many were brought in, but that certainly was not the question before the court.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the gentleman will permit me a moment, as I do not mean to make another speech, I will call his attention, not to break down the force of his argument, but to fortify what I have said, which was this: that slaves were recognized as merchandise, were daily sold in the public mart in London, when this decision was made; and the evidence that this decision was judicial legislation consisted in the fact that large masses were daily sold in London without question from the authorities under the opinion of the Solicitor General and the Attorney General, until Lord Mansfield, in Sommersett's case, declared that involuntary servitude could not exist, and destroyed property in about fifteen thousand slaves.

Mr. CLARK. They may have been sold by the merchants. I do not undertake to say how that was. I know that lottery tickets are sold daily, weekly, and monthly, in my State, contrary to law. Although I never bought a ticket in my life, and never shall, yet I get sent me almost every week a magnificent scheme, in which I am told to go to such a place in my own State to get the tickets.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Do they sell them at public auction?

Mr. CLARK. No, sir; but they sell them openly. You might as well justify Peter Funk auctions because they take place in the city of New York. This is the law we are discussing; not the practices of the English people, unless those practices have grown into custom and make law. When Lord Mansfield, or any other English judge, shall decide that so many slaves in England make the common law, then it will have force and effect, but not till then. You may tell me that American vessels go to Africa, and are there loaded with slaves, which are reeking with them, and come into our country, for aught I know; and yet the law here is, that the slave trade is piracy. I know a man may go outside of the law, but that does not alter the law.

I proceed to read from this opinion in 2 Marshall, p. 470, in the case of Rankin vs. Lydia:

"In deciding this question, we disclaim the influence of the general principles of liberty"— the court was careful to do that—

"which we all admire, and conceive it ought to be decided by the law as it is, and not as it ought to be. Slavery is sanctioned by the laws of this State; and the right to hold them under our municipal regulations is unquestionable. But we view this as a right existing by positive law, of a municipal character, without foundation in the law of nature, or the unwritten and common law."

That is the decision of the State of Kentucky, that slavery did not stand upon the common law. Here, Mr. President, let me take a distinction; for I was not quite sure, by the argument of the honorable Senator from Louisiana, whether he meant to say, and confined his argument to, statute law, instead of positive law. I am not contending that slavery exists everywhere by statute law. That is the point. I say it exists only by positive or municipal law, or laws which may become positive and municipal by the force of custom, and grown up to be recognized as the positive laws of the land, but not from the common law. The court, in the decision of this case of Rankin vs. Lydia, say:

"But we view this as a right existing by positive law, of a municipal character, without foundation in the law of nature, or the unwritten and common law."

The next case to which I come, Mr. President, is one I think from the gentleman's own State. It is to be found in 2 Martin's Reports. I cite from the case of Lunsford vs. Coaquillon, page 402:

"The relation of owner and slave is, in the States of this Union, in which it has legal existence, a creature of municipal law."

Mr. BENJAMIN. There was a law in force in our State at the same time on the subject.

Mr. CLARK. The next case I shall cite is that of Forbes vs. Cochrane, to be found in 2 Barnewall and Cresswell's Reports, in which the judge says:

"I am of opinion, that according to the principles of the English law, the right to slaves, even in a country where such rights are recognized by law, must be considered as founded, not upon the law of nature, but upon the particular law of that country."

Mr. FESSENDEN. What case is that?

Mr. CLARK. The case of Forbes vs. Cochrane, page 462. I could cite a great many more cases like that.

I ought, before I go further, to comment a little upon the case of the slave Grace, but it does not go to show at all, as I understand it, that slavery existed by the common law. It was a case where a slave was brought from one of the West India islands, went to England, lived there a while and then went back, and then a suit was brought, not for the purpose of determining her freedom, but which was incidentally brought to the notice of the court, and the court held that however the law might be in England, that though she might be free there, if she brought an action for freedom, yet going back to the West Indies where slavery existed, and having for four years submitted herself voluntarily to that state of servitude, she was not entitled to freedom.

I come now to the case of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The same case was cited by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, and I was a little surprised, I must confess, when that honorable Senator took this case against the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, which was, in fact, as he says, a case between the State of Maryland and the State of Pennsylvania, and read from it a portion of Judge McLean's opinion to sustain the view that he was taking, to wit: that the common law recognized slavery, or that it had not been abolished in this country.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I quoted that for the purpose of establishing, in contradiction to the Senator from Maine, [Mr. Fessenden,] that slave property was guaranteed by the Constitution. I did not quote that upon the subject of the common law.

Mr. CLARK. I may be mistaken about the precise point with which and for which the honorable Senator quoted. I dare say I am. I would not for a moment misrepresent him; but I will still say that while he had been so earnestly contending and citing authorities to show that the common law did recognize slavery; that it in fact brought it into this country; I was a little surprised, when he had this case of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in his hand, no matter for what purpose, nor to what precise point he cited it, and this very case follows the Somerset case, which he says was judicial legislation, in which the United States court decides that slavery only exists by municipal or positive law, that the honorable Senator did not read that portion to the Senate. It was not his purpose to do so. I find no fault because he did not. I only say it seemed to me a little singular that he should not have cited the authority of the highest court of the Union, when he launched out afterwards, I think, or before, no matter which, in so eloquent and so high a eulogium upon that court. In another particular I was a little surprised. When he commented upon the case of the slave Grace, decided by Lord Stowell, he read from some book—I do not understand from what—a letter from Mr. Justice Story approving of the decision in that case, and saying he would have decided it as Lord Stowell had decided it. Now, I want to say to the Senator that this case of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, was decided when Mr. Justice Story was upon the bench; ay, sir, Mr. Justice Story himself, delivered the opinion of the court.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I said so.

Mr. CLARK. Did the honorable Senator say so the other day?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I did in my speech.

Mr. CLARK. On that point?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I understood him not to allude to that point at all. He may have said that Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court; but he did not tell the Senate that Mr. Justice Story decided that slavery existed only by positive municipal law. I think the gentleman will not say he said that.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I did not say that, because I never did understand him so to decide.

Mr. CLARK. Then we will read the decision. I will read first from the caption:

"By the general law of nations no nation is bound to recognize the state of slavery as to foreign slaves within its territorial dominions, when it is opposed to its own policy and institutions, in favor of the subjects of other nations where slavery is recognized. If it does it, it is as a matter of comity, and not as a matter of international right. The state of slavery is deemed to be a mere municipal regulation; founded upon—"

That is it—"founded upon." It is a very curious expression:

"—founded upon, and limited to the range of the territorial laws."

That is the law of the country where it exists. It is founded upon and limited to it. The gentleman would have the Senate infer that slavery came into the country by the force of the common law which extended itself all over the English colonies, and that that is a part of the birthright which we had. Mr. Justice Story says it is founded upon municipal regulation, and confined and limited to territorial law. That is the caption of the case. Let us see what the reasoning is, and what authority is cited to support it. Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

"By the general law of nations, no nation is bound to recognize the state of slavery."

I shall want to cite this presently, in further answer to the Senator from Virginia, who maintained, as I understood, that it existed by the laws of all Christian nations, or almost all; and therefore was to be recognized in this country. Mr. Chief Justice Story says:

"By the general law of nations, no nation is bound to recognize the state of slavery, as to foreign slaves within its territorial dominions, when it is in opposition to its own policy and institutions, in favor of the subjects of other nations where slavery is recognized. If it does it, it is as a matter of comity, and not as a matter of international right. The state of slavery is deemed to be a mere municipal regulation, founded upon and limited to the range of the territorial laws. This was fully recognized in Somerset's case, (Loft's Rep. 1; S. C. 11 State Trials by Hargr., 340; S. C. 20 Howell's State Trials, 79,) which was decided before the American Revolution."

That case settled the question as to the common law, four years before the Declaration of Independence, so that if that was the true law of England, if that was the state of the common law, we did not take slavery by the common law, but we took it by the force of the territorial law. Judge Story, in this decision, continues:

"It is manifest from this consideration, that if the Constitution had not contained this clause—"

That is the clause in regard to fugitives.

"every non-slaveholding State in the Union would have been at liberty to have declared free all runaway slaves coming within its limits."

Now, Mr. President, I want to ask honorable Senators how this could have been under the Constitution, if the common law brought slavery here, if slavery existed by the common law, which was part of our birthright? If slavery came here by force of the common law, it was carried into every State of the Union where the common law went. What was the necessity of that provision, if by force of the common law the master could get his slave? It was in Pennsylvania as well as in Maryland; and when a slave went from under their statute law in Maryland, and got into Pennsylvania, he was still under the common law; he could not be a freeman because the common law would hold him. But understanding distinctly that the common law did not recognize slavery, the framers of the Constitution put in that provision, so that slaves should not be set free who escaped into a free State where the common law did exist, but which did not recognize slavery. They inserted that provision in the Constitution in order that fugitive slaves might be returned into the States from which they came.

This is the decision of the highest court of the nation. I do not know that it has ever been overruled, unless it was overruled by the Dred Scott opinion, and that does not overrule it in terms. Here is a case decided in 1842, fifteen years after the case of the slave Grace. It was not before the decision of that case, which the honorable Senator from Louisiana says Justice Story approved. It was fifteen years after that matter had been brought to his knowledge, and his attention had been turned to it. What is remarkable here is, that the court did not all concur in the reasoning of Mr. Justice Story; they did not all concur in all the points he made, and the other judges went on separatim, one after another, to give opinions and reasons, and yet not one of the judges dissented from Mr. Justice Story upon this point. They all concurred in it; and Mr. Chief Justice Taney, that now is, was then upon the bench when this case was decided, and he did not dissent from that part of it. I think there is not to be found, in Mr. Justice Taney's opinion, that there was a solitary dictum on which he dissented upon that part of Mr. Justice Story's opinion.

I have here another case. I am following the order of time. I have got up to the highest court of the nation. I am not beginning with the lower and going up to the higher by different grades of authority, but I am following the order of time. I have given the case of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in 1842. What is remarkable is that you find these cases as well in the slave States as everywhere else. I hold in my hand 9 Georgia Reports, in which I find a very remarkable case—that of Neal vs. Farmer—where the judge goes into the matter with great research and great learning. I should differ from him in some of his conclusions, for reasons which will be obvious when I come to read the opinion. This is a case in the State of Georgia, which is decided on the ground that slavery did not exist by the common law, but existed by the various statutes passed in England for the Colonies, and by the statutes passed by the Colonies themselves. The case was very maturely considered. I presume the honorable Senator from Louisiana has seen it, though I did not understand him to take any notice of it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will merely suggest to the gentleman that I can furnish him with a hundred cases to the same effect in the slave States.

Mr. CLARK. I dare say the gentleman is much more learned than I am upon this point. I dare say he might meet me two to one in bringing forward cases. I am not surprised, because it was not his object to show that slavery did not exist by the common law, but to show that it did, that he left behind the hundred cases he said he could furnish, and brought the others.

The second note or point in the caption of this case in 9 Georgia Reports, 555, is this:

"African slavery held never to have existed in the Island of Great Britain by the common law, by statute, or by the law of nations."

The point made in this case was this: a negro had been killed, and the question material to decide was, whether that killing was felony or not. Counsel endeavored to show that slavery did exist by the common law, and that by the common law it was felony to kill a man; and therefore it was felony to kill the negro; but the court held the contrary, that slavery never did exist by the common law, nor by statute law in England, and passed a decision on that point. They afterwards go on to give the origin of slavery; and to that part of the case I shall address myself by and by. Let me say that here is a discussion of this decision of that other interesting subject which the Senator so complacently alluded to the other day, that of villains regardant and villains in gross. The whole doctrine was stated by the Senator, and he told the rest of the Senators where they could find it. Here it is, not in England, but in our own midst, in the State of Georgia, examined in connection with negro slavery in England, and a decision solemnly rendered that slavery does not exist by the common law. The court say further:

"We look in vain, certainly, to the common law for traces of Saxon slavery as an institution under its protection."

The opinion was delivered by Judge Nisbet:

"By the court—Nisbet, Judge, delivering the opinion."

"But I apprehend that a judge, sitting to determine what was the status of the slave under the common law, can derive from its consideration no light to guide him, because I consider that the common law recognizes but one species of slavery as having existed in England under its sanction, at any time, and that is villainage."

No other slavery existed by the common law in England, says the court, at any time. The court say further on in the opinion:

"The unconditional slavery of the African race, as it exists in Georgia, never did exist in Great Britain. I do not mean, of course, in the British Empire, but in the Island of Great Britain. It has never had a status under the common law."

Then the court, further on, say:

"I now consider the decisions of the English courts"—

The court reviewed all the English decisions on that point.

"—upon the subject of slavery, and I think it will be seen that slavery has never been recognized to exist there, under the common law. On the contrary, it is well settled, that the moment a slave, whether African, Indian, Jew, or Gentile, sets his foot upon British soil, he is a freeman, and entitled to the protection of the laws as such."

The court say in this case:

"The question is, did this fact recognize slavery in England, as an institution under the protection of the common law?"

That is, the fact that slavery was recognized by the law of nations. England had recognized slavery as a part of the law of nations, and the court go on to consider the question whether, having recognized slavery as a part of the law of nations, it made a part of her common law; and they say:

"The question is, did this fact recognize slavery in England as an institution under the protection of the common law? Clearly, it did not. The laws of nations are recognized by the municipal laws, and will be enforced upon the citizens and subjects of the States parties thereto, in all cases when a question arises which is the object of their jurisdiction. They are recognized by the common law. (4 Black. Com. C, &c.) The law of nations tolerated, but did not enjoin the slave trade. The obligation of England under it was, to respect the rights of those States engaged in it, within their own territories, and upon the high seas. Vessels engaged in the traffic were not liable to seizure and confiscation. Her subjects were also equally entitled to protection under the international law. I apprehend, however, that it is historically true, that neither by statute nor by usage has Great Britain ever availed herself of the license of the law of nations, to introduce slavery into the Island of Great Britain from Africa. In point of fact, pure slavery never did exist in England, neither by capture in war, by municipal authority, or by the law of nations. Had slaves been introduced into that part of her empire by municipal authority, or had they been introduced without municipal, that is, without statutory authority, under a trade sanctioned by the law of nations, the status of slavery would have been there just what it is here. Property in the slave, the right to control his person, his limbs, as Lord Coke expresses it, would have existed and fallen under the protection of the common law. To any correct view of this subject, it is indispensable to distinguish between Great Britain and her colonies. As to the latter, we know that slavery there did in fact exist, and was sanctioned by usage under the law of nations, and by acts of Parliament: as to the former, we know that it did not exist there, and received no such sanction. How could, then, the common law attach upon the institution of slavery in the Island of Great Britain? The law of nations would have justified slavery in England, had it been there. But they did not create it there. Whether by the comity of nations the English courts are not bound to deliver a slave, coming into Great Britain from a State where slavery exists by law, to his rightful owner to be taken back, as was the demand in the Somerset case, is a different question. Lord Mansfield held that they are not.

"Nations being equal, the laws of one State have no operation in any other, proprio vigore."

Then the question arose before the court whether the recognition of slavery and the existence of slavery in the colonies, did not establish it in England; whether, from the fact that Parliament passed certain laws establishing slavery in the colonies, they did not carry it into England? As to that question, the court decide that it certainly did not; and they say:

"The recognition of slavery in the colonies did not establish it in England. This is the answer to the conclusion drawn by counsel. The statutes of Great Britain do not apply to the colonies, unless expressly extended to them, and the acts which relate to the colonies alone, have a local operation only. Such has been the ruling of the courts at Westminster Hall. Expressly so held, in reference to these very statutes in Forbes vs. Cochrane, 2 Barn. & Cres., by Best, J., p. 448; 1 Black. Com., 107, 108; 1 Chitt. Com. Law, 638."

Then the court come back to review all the cases in England on this point:

"I return now, [says the judge,] to a review of the decisions in England upon the subject of slavery. The authenticated cases in England before the Somerset case are five in number, to wit: Butts vs. Penny, in the 28 Charles II."

The same case which the honorable Senator cited. There is also here the case of Smith vs. Gould, in reference to which the court say:

"In Smith vs. Gould, which was also trover for a negro and other things, the plaintiff had a verdict with several damages, and £30 for the negro. On motion in arrest, the court held that trover could not lie for a negro."

I did not find that case in Salkeld's Reports.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will state to the Senator that there are two cases in Salkeld, on the same page, on this subject, and he will find that that is one of them.

Mr. CLARK. I have found a case in Salkeld's Reports, some things in which I want to read to the Senator. This is one of the older cases—Smith vs. Brown and Cooper:

"The plaintiff declared in an indebitatus assumpsit for 20l. for a negro sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, namely, in Parochia beate Marie de Arcubus in Warda de Cheape, and verdict for the plaintiff; and on motion in arrest of judgment, Holt, C. J., held: that as soon as a negro comes into England he becomes free: one may be a villain in England, but not a slave. Et per Powell, J. In a villain the owner has a property, but it is an inheritance; in a word, he has a property, but it is a chattel real; the law took no notice of a negro."

Then, if the law took no notice of a negro, it did not make him a slave; that is clear.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Read it all.

Mr. CLARK. I will read it all. Chief Justice Holt says:

"You should have averred in the declaration, that the sale was in Virginia, and by the laws of that country, negroes are saleable; for the laws of England do not extend to Virginia; being a conquered country, their law is what the King pleases; and we cannot take notice of it but as set forth; therefore he directed the plaintiff should amend, and the declaration should be made, that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for a negro sold here at London, but that the said negro, at the time of sale, was in Virginia, and that negroes by the laws and statutes of Virginia are saleable as chattels."

In England there could have been no sale of a negro, for he would have been a freeman; but the slave being in Virginia, he could be sold though the sale was made in London.

"Then the Attorney General coming in, said, they were inheritances, and transferable by deed, and not without; and nothing was done."

I do not think that is authority for the other side. Here the same case comes up in another shape in Smith vs. Gould, in trover. In the case which I have just quoted they tried an assumpsit, and could not succeed in that, because there was not such a thing as a slave in England, by the common law. They then tried trover, and the court held that trover lies not for a negro; but in a suit of trespass, quare captivum suum cepit, if in technical form, the court intimated that the plaintiff might have succeeded.

I want to call the attention of honorable Senators to one expression in this case of Smith vs.

Gould, which covers the whole ground. I have never seen anything so succinctly stated. It resembles some of those old maxims of the common law:

"Sed curia contra, men may be the owners, and, therefore, cannot be the subject of property."

Man may own, but he cannot be owned. That is the doctrine of the case.

Mr. BENJAMIN. What becomes of the villains?

Mr. CLARK. Now, Mr. President, I have done with that part of my argument which relates to the common law. I think I have shown that slavery did not exist by the common law. If it did not exist by the common law, it could not be brought here by the common law from England, and did not exist here. If it did not exist here by the common law, then, if it existed at all, it existed by the municipal law—the positive law of the State. Wherever there was a positive law on the subject, regarding the slave as property, there he was property. Wherever there was no municipal law, no law upon the subject making him a slave, there he was a freeman. Hence the pertinency of that provision of the Constitution, which was a matter of compromise, in regard to the fugitive slave. If in Virginia and Maryland a slave is held by the force of positive law, custom, or statute, and he escape and goes into the State of Pennsylvania, or any other State where he is not held as a slave, where slavery does not exist, without a provision that he should be returned under the Constitution, he would be free; and, therefore, the framers of the Constitution inserted in it that provision.

Our courts have repeatedly held, and have recently held in New York, Massachusetts, everywhere, that if a slave is carried voluntarily by his master into a free State, he cannot take him back again. If slavery existed by the common law, the master would have a right over him, and he could take him back just as he could his horse, or his cow. He could lay his hands upon him and say: "you are my property under the common law; come along with me." You would not want a fugitive slave law to get him if slavery existed by the common law. You never have had a fugitive slave law for a horse or a sheep. It was only because that by the common law the slave, when he gets from under the statute-law, is free, that this provision of the Constitution was adopted.

This case in Georgia, and some other cases, go to the point to show that slavery was not established by the law of nations. The law of nations, as I said, does not go so far as to make positive law for any State. For instance, England may recognize slavery and the slave trade as part of the law of nations, Spain may recognize them, France may recognize them, the whole world may recognize them by the law of nations; and yet, if New Hampshire does not recognize them, the law of nations cannot force them upon her. The law of nations regulates the rules and the proceedings of trade between nations; but it does not go within a nation and make anything a part of its institutions, and force on that nation what does not otherwise exist by its own law. So, if slavery and the slave trade exist by the law of nations, that law of nations does not have the force of carrying slavery into any Territory where it does not exist, but only regulates the law as between those nations. Each nation is at liberty to regulate its own law. The United States undoubtedly recognized the slave trade as part of the law of nations up to a certain time. I think it recognizes it now as part of the law of some nations, but she has prohibited it herself, and the law of nations does not have such effect as to compel her to have it here. No such force is given to it; and notwithstanding all the nations in Christendom, except the United States, may have recognized slavery, yet if the United States had not recognized it, it does not bring it here; and if some of those United States have recognized it, it does not carry it into States which have not recognized it. It has no force to bring it into free territory, because recognized in Virginia, or because Virginia recognized the law of nations. It does not have any such force. Each nation stands by itself upon its own laws regulating its own domestic concerns, and then there are certain laws, rules, and regulations, called the law of nations, which regulate the intercourse of nations.

With these remarks upon that point of the case I dismiss it. I have some further remarks to make upon this case in Georgia, because it goes further than any case I have found. It goes on to point out the way in which property in slaves was acquired, and to give, in fact, the foundation of the law for holding property in slaves, or holding negroes as slaves:

"The faculty of holding slaves [say the court] was derived from the trustees of the colony, acting under authority of the British Crown, as a civil right, in 1751, by an ordinance of that board. Before that time, their introduction was prohibited."

Remember that this is a decision in the State of Georgia:

"The regulation of slave property is as much the province of municipal law, as the regulation of any other property, and its protection equally its obligation; but we deny that property in slaves, and the title by which they are held, are the creations of statutory law. To view this question fairly, let the inquiry go back to a period subsequent to the ordinance of the trustees, in 1751, and anterior to any legislation upon the subject of slavery. Licensed to hold slave property, the Georgia planter held the slave as a chattel; and whence did he derive his title? Either directly from the slave-trader, or from those who held under him, and he from the slave captor in Africa. The property in the slave in the planter, became thus just the property of the original captor. In the absence of any statutory limitation upon that property, he holds it as unqualifiedly as the first proprietor held it."

Exactly. Nobody doubts that. Nobody in the world that I know of can doubt that the slaveholder has just as good a right to the negro slave as the man who stole him and brought him away from his country, and the slave trader. Here is the foundation of this business which all Christian nations have carried on. They go back to the slave captor, to the man who stole him in Africa, or to the slave trader, and they say the slaveholder has just as good a right to the slave as the captor or the slave trader. I grant you that, or any other robber or pirate, but not better. I do not mean by this, Mr. President, by any means that the people who own slaves are pirates or robbers; I am only speaking of the solidity of the title. It rests exactly upon the title of the captor who makes war upon the African and takes him away, or of the slave trader who is declared to be a pirate. That is exactly the title of the slaveholder to the slave, and he has no other. In many cases the negro gets into the hands of people who are not to blame. I will not condemn any man, or any class of men. I am discussing the abstract principle upon which the title to the slave rests. It rests upon the right of the captor—"you are my negro, my slave; take him away; ship him in irons, and carry him away, and sell him." Now, Mr. President, (Mr. FRENCH in the chair,) if I were to go into Indiana, and take your horse and bring him here, and I should sell him to the honorable Senator from Ohio, he would have just as good a right to him as I had, and not any better; he is your horse for all that. So it is with the man who deals with the slave, either as captor or trader. He has not any more title than that.

This is the sort of property that they want to carry into this new State. I come to another question, Mr. President: who is going to do it? They say the Dred Scott decision has carried it there already. Well, that will not operate after we form it as a State. Here in this Lecompton constitution is a provision that slaves are to be carried into that State by authority of that constitution. Who gives that constitution vitality? The people in the Territory? Not at all. That constitution is not worth the paper on which it is written until we breathe the breath of life into it and make it our child. I, for one, am not going to breathe upon it. It may remain a dead carcass for me for many generations. It cannot exist unless we put it in force. There is a great deal of talk about this being the constitution of the people of Kansas. Well, admitting that they formed its shape, sanctioned its provisions, put the words together; still Congress has got to breathe life into it, and slavery will not exist there under that constitution unless you put it there. You cannot escape it. Now I do not will it. I do not think I shall.

At this point, Mr. President, I desire to make a few observations in regard to this notion of popular sovereignty, and squatter sovereignty, as these words are used now. I think I see pretty clearly what authority there is here in regard to this matter, and I think I see that under the Constitution of the United States this talk about squatter sovereignty does not amount to very much. There has been a good deal of talk about popular sovereignty in the people of a Territory; there has been talk of sovereignty in abeyance; and there has been talk about man being sovereign. Well, sir, every free man is sovereign; but sovereign over what? Sovereign over what he owns, and what he has a right to control. He is not sovereign over what is mine, nor what is yours; nor is he sovereign over what belongs to any of these States; nor is he sovereign over what belongs to the United States. He is sovereign over his own and ought to be sovereign over himself, though sometimes he is not.

Well, sir, let us look at this matter as it stands. Here was this Territory known as the Louisiana Territory, afterwards as the Missouri Territory, which was purchased from France in 1803 for a certain number of dollars. Mr. President, I want to ask you, I want to ask every honorable Senator who hears me, this plain question: when the people bought that Territory in 1803, to whom did it belong? Why, to the United States, everybody will say. Very well. They, owning the soil, had jurisdiction. The United States were the sovereigns in that Territory. It was theirs. Did anybody else own a foot of it? Had anybody else any jurisdiction over it? Not at all. It belonged to the United States. I do not mean, as some say, to the people of the United States individually; that A owed his share, B his share, C his share, and so on with the rest of the alphabet; but I mean the United States, as a Government, owned it; it was theirs. They had sovereign power over it under the Constitution. They could control it; they have controlled it, and I do not see that anybody else had any control over it.

Then the people of the Territory of Kansas go into that Territory, and before you allow them to pass territorial laws or territorial enactments, they have no authority, no jurisdiction over it. It belongs to the people of the United States. Then, by your territorial laws, by your Kansas-Nebraska act, you authorized the people in that Territory to do certain things. Then you invested them with some authority, and they went on and did them with your authority. They derived their authority from the Government of the United States. Nobody else had any authority. You granted it to them. They hold it under you, and cannot get any more authority than they now have under the territorial laws, unless you give it to them. What is the idea of talking about their being sovereigns in the Territory? Do they own anything there? Have they any jurisdiction except what you give them? They go there by your permission. They hold that Territory by your permission. Ah! but you say, we are the sovereign people. Very well—true; but you are sovereign over what you own and what belongs to you, and over nothing more. You have in that Territory just what Congress has granted you, and nothing more. When Congress gives you power to establish a State, then you will be the people of a sovereign State and have power belonging to a State; but you will not have it if Congress does not give it to you. You exist by their authority until Congress gives you permission to become a State. When Congress has given you jurisdiction over the territorial government and made you a State, then it is yours, just as you have jurisdiction over my horse when I give or sell him to you. Congress empowers the people of the Territory to go into it and do certain things, and when a sufficient number get into the Territory and petition for State jurisdiction, then Congress may authorize them to make a State government and transfer their jurisdiction to them; and it then belongs to them as a sovereign State.

Talk about the people having a right to State government! It depends upon what you mean by right. If you mean to say any power to assert, then they have not got it. If you mean that Congress ought, under the Kansas-Nebraska act, following out the policy of exercising its sound discretion, to erect them into a State, then I agree with you entirely, they have the right. Congress can hold out that inducement to the people under the Kansas-Nebraska act, and it should keep it faithfully to them. That Territory belongs to the people of the United States. I do not understand what particular right those people who go into it get, any further than is given by Congress and conferred by law; they are in there under the law; and when Congress gives them the right and power to establish a sovereign State, then, as citizens of the State, they become sovereigns just so far as citizens of an independent State are sovereigns, being permitted and having the right then to do what a sovereign State may do, but having no right to contravene the power of Congress in the General Government under the Constitution.

Thus much, Mr. President, for the law. I now come to more general considerations which are going to govern me in regard to the vote I may give. I said a short time ago—I said it deliberately, I said it upon mature conviction, I said it under the full knowledge of what I did say, as something which I mean to stand by without committing anybody else—that I do object to Kansas coming into the Union as a slave State. I object to slavery going into that Territory now, henceforth, and forever, unless the sovereign people, after it is made a State, in virtue of their sovereign power, choose to carry it there; and I had almost said that I then would have objection to it, because that State was a part of the territory covered by the old Missouri compromise. You forced that compromise, Mr. President. The people of the North did not want to take it; they did not want slavery to go into Missouri; they wanted that to be free territory; but at the time she was about to be admitted as a slave State, you put in a provision that all the rest of that territory should be free. Why have you not kept it? Why has not that compact, if you call it a compact, been kept? Why this agitation growing out of the question to force slavery in there? Do you tell me that that compromise was unconstitutional? Suppose it was: I ask whether, when you made that provision and agreed fairly to it at that time it now becomes you, if you can do it by the form of law, to wrest that territory from freemen? That is the point I make. I want to know why there has not been honor enough in the people of the other side to maintain that pledge, even if they were not obliged to do so, when they forced that division of the Territory, and said slavery should not go to Kansas? I want to know why the other side are not willing now that that should be a free State?

Mr. President, it cannot be denied—I will not undertake to deny it—that on this side is a contest for freedom, and on that side is a contest for slavery. That is the great contest between us. I like to meet this matter plainly. I have no concealments; nothing to deny. It is the great cause of free labor against slave labor; and it is the cause of free labor in that Territory or State against slave labor. I do not come here without a reason. I think I have a reason, coming here as a Senator, exercising a sound discretion, looking for the welfare of the old States, why slavery should not go into Kansas; because if slaves go there, they get an undue representation. By the Constitution, in a slave State you add a certain portion of the slaves to make up your representation. Five slaves are equal to three white men for that purpose. If slavery goes into Kansas, you will reckon the slaves in the representation; and if you get enough there to elect a Representative, do you not get one vote in the other House, over and above the other free States, which rightfully you should not have? Hence I object to extending that right of representation. I know that that provision was put in the Constitution by way of compromise. I agree with what the gentleman from Virginia said on that point. Here were thirteen old States. They came together for the purpose of Union. Some of them had slavery, and some had not; and they agreed, under that Constitution, and for all time, that the slave States should have representation so and so; but I do not understand that that binds us to make all the States slave States, or to let slavery go into the free States, or to let States come into this Union with slavery, and thus give them an undue representation over the free States. I object to it on that account.

Mr. President, I object to it for another reason. I am glad now to see the honorable Senator from

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Clark.

SENATE.

South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] in his seat, because I shall have occasion, in this part of my argument, to take notice of some suggestions which he threw out upon this subject. I object to slave labor, because you seek thereby to degrade and vilify free labor. Your slave labor, in your own eyes, is disgraceful. You seek to bring it in contact with free labor, and thereby degrade free labor. I object to that. I come from a section of the country where labor is respectable. I come from a section of the country where labor is honorable. I come from a section of the country where labor is dignified; where we seek to make it honorable; where we seek to make it respectable; where we seek to make it dignified; and when the honorable Senator from South Carolina, as he did the other day, gets up in his place, and says your white laborers are essentially slaves, or, as he afterwards modified it, "your hiring laborers and your operatives, are essentially slaves;" I desire, in the Senate house of the United States, to protest against it. Nine tenths of all my people are working men; they are the men who cultivate their farms; they are the men who work in mechanic shops; they are the men who are at the various trades; they are the men and the women in the mills who are called operatives; and when the honorable Senator says that they are essentially slaves, with all due respect, but with firmness in the truth of what I say, I tell him he states what is not true—not in any offensive sense, but because he does not understand my people so well as I do. I dare say he honestly thinks what he says. I accord to him that merit; but what I want to impress upon his mind is, that he is entirely mistaken in regard to our laborers. They are in no sense slaves. I grant you some of them are poor; but does poverty make a man a slave? Then some of the noblest men the nation ever had have been slaves.

Why, sir, in my country, a large portion of the husbandmen cultivate their own few acres; they raise their corn; they raise their potatoes; they raise their wheat, their rye, their oats, and grass; they take them to market and sell them; they are the product of their labor. It is in some sort hiring labor; but I would like to ask the honorable Senator from South Carolina if he intends to call the agricultural people of my State slaves?

I know, Mr. President, that my people are poor. There is the State of New Hampshire, God bless her! She has not a bed of iron ore in her whole territory; she has not a bed of coal; she has not a mine of copper; she has not a mine of zinc; she has a poor agricultural soil; she has water power; she has free hands and free hearts; and there is not a people in the Union more attached to the Union, and who live more comfortably and more happily, than that same people in New Hampshire; and I do not wish to hear them called slaves. They are in no sense slaves. Why, you can sell your slave. Go and attempt to sell one of those freemen, and what would be the result? You can compel your slave to labor. Go and try to compel one of my countrymen to labor, if you can. You can take from your slave his liberty. Go and take from my countrymen their liberty, if you please—try it. You can feed your slave as you choose. Go and administer food to the laborer of the North. You can clothe your slave as you choose; but the laborer of the North will say, I can clothe myself; I can feed myself; I am master of myself. You say he is a slave because he is poor, because he is obliged to labor. Is that it? Yes, sir; but he can labor where he pleases, where he can find work, and when he pleases; and he can buy what food he pleases, what clothing he pleases; and is, in every sense, a freeman.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, that the honorable Senator has mistaken the condition of that people. I do not know but that he has been there; but I feel very sure that he has not. I am very certain he would not have said what he did, if he had been there; and I am very certain, if he were to go there now, he would find a great many things very different from what he anticipates. Why, sir, he says: "Your operatives are essentially slaves." I come directly from a city where there are ten thousand of those operatives about me. I know their condition; I know their habits; I know their mode of living; I know their mode of thought. I know that some of these operativos lease their farms, and leave them behind them; they come from neighboring towns, and go into the mills. They work as operatives because they can make more money at it. They hire their labor; but are they slaves? Why, they can buy as good a dinner as the gentleman from South Carolina, and as good a hat or as good a coat, and supply their wants as well. In what sense are they slaves? Perhaps the gentleman can tell me.

Mr. HAMMOND. I have already said that, on some future occasion, I will answer the remarks of those gentlemen who have taken exceptions to what I said a few days ago. I do not choose to do so now. I only wish to say, that the Senator from New Hampshire himself knows that he is depicting a state of things that does not exist. They do not get work when they want it, and a large portion of them cannot get a dinner when they want it.

Mr. CLARK. I will not tell the gentleman that what he says is entirely wrong; but I will tell him that, if he will go into my country, he will find that ninety-nine out of every hundred of them can not only get a dinner when they want it, but would give him a dinner when he wants one, and would be glad to do it. The gentleman asked how we would like to have missionaries sent into every quarter of our country. I would say to the honorable gentleman that I would have no objection to them. I would like to have him go there, and see for himself, and he would find that what I state is true; I know it to be true; but if he does go there, he had better be careful of one thing; and that is, not to talk about "the mud-sills of society"; to them; because, if he does, I am sure that about five feet ten inches—if that is the Senator's height—of mud-sill would be made of southern timber.

Now, Mr. President, it is this same sort of feeling that is engendered in the slave States against the North and free labor that makes me so much opposed to the institution of slavery going into Kansas. Let slavery go into Kansas, and exist there as it does in South Carolina, and how long would it be before our free people would go there and settle? They have been told they were white slaves—essentially so; that they are the mud-sills of society, and that cotton is king. Cotton king, sir! Cotton cannot make a hat; and these men, who rise and boast about cotton could not get a hat, if they did not buy it. Cotton does not make shoes; cotton does not make pantaloons; cotton does not make a coat. You can buy those articles; but free labor can make a hat, shoes, pantaloons, or a coat. Your cotton, king! So said the gentleman from South Carolina; so said the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. KENNEDY.] Cotton is king! It rules the world! Sir, there is another king there besides cotton: humbug is king!

Mr. President, I have sometimes been in the opposite end of the Capitol, and gone into that new Hall of Representatives, which is entirely cut off from the air by all the rooms around it. Not a breath can come from windows, because there are none opening into the Hall. I have then gone down below, and seen a steam-engine and blower, with which they were pumping it up, and we hear the air passing up to those regions; and I have sometimes wondered, if steam-engines were invented when God made the world, whether He would not have ventilated it with a steam-engine; whether He would not have put the world in an iron shell, with a hard case, and fixed outside a big steam-engine to pump air into it. When I heard the gentleman the other day say that cotton was king, and that England would topple down if you did not raise cotton, I could not help thinking if cotton had been grown at the time the Lord created the world, whether He would not have made the world of cotton. I want to ask the honorable gentleman how the world got along without it? They got along up to the Christian era without cotton, and for some sixteen hundred years afterwards. How did the world get along without cotton? Does anybody know? Can anybody tell? I have no fault to find with the South, except that I wish they would treat my people with courtesy, and that they would not stand up here in the Senate and call them slaves.

Mr. President, pardon me a moment while I relate an incident: and the gentleman will see why we have some feeling on this subject. In the years 1776 and 1777, there lived in my State a young blacksmith, some sixteen or seventeen years of age. He got his living by pounding it out on the anvil with a strong arm. His country needed his services. New Hampshire wanted to supply her quota of troops. He was drafted, and he went. He was at the battle with Burgoyne. When his time was out, he returned to his native State. He went to the anvil again, upon the banks of the Merrimac. He hired out his labor; he was one of those whom the gentleman calls slaves, if any of them are. He hired out his labor to his neighbors; he made for them nails; he made for them plowshares; he made for them everything that they wanted. When he got back from the war, the State of New Hampshire owed him some money for his service. His father said to him, "Benny, the State of New Hampshire is poor; the country is poor; do not call upon the State to pay you now; let it be; the country is illy able to pay it; give your service to your country." He did not call for that pay; he never called for it. His children after him never called for that pay. There it stands now, in the capital of New Hampshire, so many pounds, so many shillings, and so many pence, due to that humble blacksmith. His children will not come here or go anywhere else to call for that pay. They would rather have the record there that that father gave that pittance to the State in poverty and necessity, rather than to have all the goodly stones of your Capitol; and yet it is the fortune of the son of that poor blacksmith to come into the Senate and hear the Senator from South Carolina call his father a slave! I did not think it would have been done. God knows, when I heard it tears ran down my cheeks that he should be so vilified and abused, and I sit here to hear it. To Benjamin Clark, upon the record, stands the sum he earned and gave to his country; and now, when his son comes into the Capitol of this same nation, which he fought to make free, a Senator stands up and calls him a slave! I did not think I should have lived to have heard it.

Why, Mr. President, there are in my own State, a great many excellent young women who work in the mills there. I suppose the gentleman calls them slaves. Now let me tell you what I have known to be done time and again. I have known the father of a family, from ill habits, or some other reasons, become impoverished. I have known the farm to get mortgaged. I have known that father to have daughters, and I have known those daughters to go to the mills. I have known them by thrift, prudence, and saving, accumulate money enough to leave that farm unmortgaged, give it back to the father and mother, make a happy home again, and then to contribute to educate their brothers or sisters. I have known many of those honorable young women. The gentleman says they are slaves. They earned not only enough to clothe and to feed themselves, but enough to educate themselves, and to fit themselves to adorn some of the highest stations of life.

Mr. President, I have another wonderful incident which I should like to relate. You all know the name to which I shall allude, and I want to know if the honorable gentleman would call him a slave. There was a poor man once lived in my neighborhood. He cultivated a poor farm on the banks of the Merrimac; he lived by his hands. He lived by his labor in the field; he had no menial servants. When the summer and seed time came, he went into the field and planted; but when the country needed his services, those services were at her call. I speak now of the hero of Bennington, of the late General Stark, who lived close by my home; who was buried by the side of the Merrimac. He was a laborer all his days. He was a man who fought for his country's liberty with Rogers in the Ranger, and at Bunker Hill, and at Bennington, and yet he is to be called a slave. I have a higher example still, of a little printer's boy, who was born in Boston. He left his father and went to Philadelphia. He hired out his services. Was he a slave? Why, sir, he began by running away from Boston, and he ended by making the lightning come from the clouds at his bidding; and he was a slave!

Now, sir, I only ask the honorable Senator from South Carolina, before he uses these terms again towards the people whom I represent, to go and see them. I will be bound that they will treat him kindly; I will be bound, if he will come and give them the opportunity of showing him how they live, what is their condition, and how happy they are in their homes, that they will forgive him what they might almost consider an insult, and set it down to the fact that he did not know them better.

But the gentleman says they vote; they hold your power. They do vote; and they do hold the power. They put their men into office when they are fitted for it; and I will tell the honorable gentleman that there are no class of people that can hold power more safely, no class of people who will exercise the power more securely; and if your institutions are never overturned until these laboring men overturn them, they will exist for a great length of time.

Why, Mr. President, history is full of reminiscences on this subject of laboring men. I have said I come from a poor State. I mean a State poor in resources. She has, thank God, given the world some men. She has free hearts, free heads, and free hands in abundance. She is poor in some respects. Poor as she was, when you wanted a ninth State to adopt the Constitution, that poor State of New Hampshire was that ninth. These laboring men, who it is said are essentially slaves, were the same then as now. Those laboring men are the men who enabled you to adopt the Constitution; and now you turn round, and vilify them as slaves! Mr. President, it ought not to be so. I wish it were not so; but such is the issue upon us, and I am disposed to meet it calmly, to meet it quietly, and to meet it determinedly.

Mr. GREEN. I merely wish to ask the Senator whether, at the time that the Constitution of the United States was adopted by the State of New Hampshire, they did not hold slaves in the State of New Hampshire?

Mr. CLARK. I am not aware that they did hold a single slave; but if they did, it would not make any difference at all. I am not aware that they did. I have searched our statute-books, I have searched our records, and I have not been able to find the first provision in regard to slaves. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Missouri if he knows whether they did or not? I say I have never been able to find any provision in regard to the subject of slaves. I know that slaves have been held in the province. There is no doubt of that. I will tell the honorable Senator how I know it, but I want him to answer if he knows that there were slaves there.

Mr. GREEN. Not by personal knowledge. I only know from history that there were slaves there.

Mr. CLARK. Where is the history, and what is it?

Mr. GREEN. I think I can show it.

Mr. CLARK. I wish you would.

Mr. GREEN. At the time of the separation from Massachusetts of the province of New Hampshire, and at the time of the State organization, there were some slaves in the limits of its borders.

Mr. CLARK. When was it separated from Massachusetts?

Mr. GREEN. Before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CLARK. At what time?

Mr. GREEN. I do not recollect the date.

Mr. CLARK. Nor I either.

Mr. GREEN. Then there is no difference between us.

Mr. CLARK. There is a difference about the date. New Hampshire never was a part of Massachusetts. Maine was taken from Massachusetts.

Mr. GREEN. Maine was a territory attached.

Mr. CLARK. To what?

Mr. GREEN. To Massachusetts.

Mr. CLARK. That is not New Hampshire. New Hampshire existed as a province under the King.

Mr. GREEN. It had a separate charter under the King, but I can show what I state.

Mr. CHANDLER. You are mistaken.

Mr. CLARK. If you show it, I will give in.

Mr. GREEN. Very well.

Mr. CLARK. I have read history to very little purpose if it is so. Now, I want to tell the Senator what I do know in reference to slavery in New Hampshire. I happened to be engaged, some years ago, and not so long ago, in a suit in regard to the incorporation of a town—whether Hooksett was incorporated. It involved a great deal of history and research. I went into the history of the town, and of the neighboring towns; and in the town of Hooksett found a bill of sale of a little negro girl, a good many years before the province became a State. That is all the trace I could find of slavery in that province. It may have been there; I think I have heard, as the gentleman says, that slavery some time existed there. I have searched the laws of the province; I have searched the State laws; and I cannot find any statute law recognizing it; I cannot find any decision of courts upon it; I cannot find any law abolishing it, and I am sure it is not there now. That is all I can say in regard to it.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this constitution because it admits slavery. I am opposed to it upon another ground. I am opposed to it because it excludes the free negro from the State. It says that a free negro shall not be permitted to live in Kansas. Now, I want to know why? I want to know if the exclusion is not an invidious one? We have free negroes in the United States. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KENNEDY,] whom I do not now see in his seat, yesterday told us that there were forty thousand free negroes in Maryland. Now, if they are a burden to Maryland, Maryland would like to have them go out of her State; but if every other State should prohibit a free negro from living within her border, then they could not go out of Maryland. Why should one State be compelled to bear the burden, if free negroes are a burden, and Kansas not take her share? I hold that the free negro is as much entitled to live in one part of the country as another. I hold that it is not proper for the Congress of the United States, breathing life into this Lecompton constitution, to say it is not proper, it is not desirable, it is not an exercise of sound discretion, for the Congress of the United States to say that the free negro shall not live in Kansas. I object to this provision in the constitution of Kansas, which excludes from it the free negro. I say that the negro has a right to a portion of this common earth. You have no right to exclude him from his portion of the common earth. Do you tell him that he came from Africa, and if he wants his portion of the common earth to go back to Africa? Then I tell you, you came from England, or your ancestors did, and if you want your portion of the common earth to go back to England. It is the law of the strongest that enables you to control. It is not the law of justice; it is not the law of equality; and I say it is the insolence and arrogance of slavery that demands that you should exclude the free negro.

Mr. President, I wish some gentleman on the other side of the House to answer me this question: By the provision of the constitution of Kansas a free negro cannot live in the State. Suppose that the sovereign people of Kansas (and you say they may alter their constitution and may emancipate their slaves under certain conditions) should say that after 1870 every negro child born should be free; suppose that at the very session of the Legislature after they were admitted as a State they should declare that after the year 1870 every negro child born there should be free, with a view to emancipation; your constitution stands, and a negro child is born free; what are you going to do with it? What can you do with it? Carry it out of the Territory? But its mother lives in the Territory. If you carry it out you endanger its life; you sander the ties between mother and child; you are driven to the necessity of taking the infant child and hastening it out of the Territory, or else you cannot carry on the work of gradual emancipation. Such a plan as this perhaps may be the easiest way in which emancipation can be done. Mr. President, do you think that is desirable? Does anybody think that it is desirable that there should be such a provision forced upon that State?

If Senators will allow me, I wish now to touch upon another topic in this Chamber, all unused as Senators may be to hear it; but I am not going to pass it. I wish the Senate to give me its attention. It may be that what I say may not be of much importance; but I am going to speak upon a subject which, I think, every member of the Senate will say is of importance. I know that what I have to say is—

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN. I merely wish to call his attention to the fact—it is a mere question of fact—that, in 1790, in the State of New Hampshire, there were one hundred and fifty-eight slaves returned by the census.

Mr. CLARK. Where do you find it?

Mr. GREEN. In the census report, page 82.

Mr. CLARK. Will you be kind enough to furnish me the report? It may give me some information.

Mr. GREEN. Certainly. It was merely to that question of fact that I wanted to call your attention.

Mr. CLARK. I see it so set down, and I do not know but that it may be correct. I can only state, as I have stated, that I have not examined the census returns, but I have examined its legislation, its history, and its laws, to see if there was any provision in regard to slaves in New Hampshire, and I have not found any. If there were slaves there, they were there by sufferance, without any law regulating the subject that I am aware of, and without any provision on the statute-book, or any decisions of a court allowing them to be there.

But, sir, if they were there I can only rejoice that they are not there now. I hope the time will come when every State that has them will find some way to be relieved of them if they choose, and I could wish that they should be relieved of them; that is, those who wish to be. I want it to be understood distinctly, in all that I have said, that I do not claim the right to go into Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, or any other of the slave States, and meddle with slavery there. I only claim that when we inaugurate a new State, when it comes into the Union, and when I think that we have some power in this matter, we should be permitted to use it for the good of the country. I do not know but that I might appeal to the Senator from Missouri to answer me, if he does not think that Missouri would be better without slaves if she could get rid of them. I will not ask the question. It may be unpleasant.

Mr. GREEN. Not in the least. Ask me?

Mr. CLARK. No, no. I will now take my tea, as it has just come in. I am sorry to have to be obliged to do it, but I cannot help it.

[The honorable Senator had been furnished with tea and sandwiches, of which he proceeded to make a fitting disposition.]

Mr. GREEN. While the Senator is at tea, I will answer that question if he desires it.

Mr. CLARK. I will yield the floor, while I take my tea, to the Senator.

Mr. GREEN. I wish to make a remark in regard to the question which the Senator proposed to me.

Mr. CLARK. Very well. Get up a little social chat, while at tea. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN. This will be a tea-chat. I do not believe the interests of Missouri would be promoted by prohibiting or abolishing slavery in that State. That is my opinion. The Senator asked me for my opinion. I give it. I believe very serious injury to the blacks would result from it. They are not Africans now. They are descendants of Africans. It would seriously harm them. It would seriously harm the owners. It would seriously harm the production of the State. Their labor is employed in the production of hemp and tobacco, and it yields a profit almost equal, in my opinion, to the profit on the production of cotton and sugar. They are well cared for and well provided for in youth, in middle age, and old age. They have a guardian and protector from the cradle to the grave. Their labor in the intermediate period well remunerates the master, whose powerful intellect controls and directs the muscular energy of the black, who has not the intellect and the forecast to provide for himself. That is my answer to the question. If the Senator has not finished his tea, I will speak again.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Clark.

SENATE.

Mr. CLARK. I should be very glad if you would.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BROWN and Mr. GREEN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Trumbull, and Wade—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—24.

A pause ensued, the Senator from New Hampshire not having finished his repast.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As there seems to be nothing going on, I move to lay the whole bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. PUGH. Permit me one moment. I desire to know whether the Senator from New Hampshire yields the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Fitch in the chair.) There is nobody on the floor.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from New Hampshire has not concluded his remarks. If he does not yield the floor, I object to the motion of the Senator from Illinois, and I say it was out of order.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator is out of order, and I submit that the motion and debate is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire suspended his remarks some time ago. The Chair thought he had finished his remarks, and entertained the motion of the Senator from Illinois, and will put it to the Senate. The question is on the motion to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not desire to press the motion. I will withdraw it.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator from New Hampshire give me the floor a moment?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. PUGH. I am extremely disinclined to press the Senator to a conclusion of his argument to-night. I have felt that he has not had the treatment at our hands that Senators newly coming amongst us receive.

Mr. GREEN. A motion to adjourn is not in order.

Mr. PUGH. I have not made any motion.

Mr. GREEN. What is your proposition?

Mr. PUGH. I was going to suggest that a general agreement be made upon the floor of the Senate, by Senators on each side, to name some early day when the vote can be taken, which would be much more agreeable than to go on now during the night.

Mr. GREEN. Everything of that sort has been refused.

Mr. PUGH. I was told by some Senators on this side that they would agree to take the vote on Monday.

Mr. GREEN. We will not agree to it. The friends of the bill will not agree to it. We will agree to any day this week, if it be made final; but to no other day.

Mr. PUGH. There would not be much difference between taking the vote on Saturday and Monday. I was in hopes that some agreement of the sort might be made.

Mr. BRODERICK. I move that there be a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not aware of any such motion ever being entertained or heard of in the Senate. He does not know of any rule on the subject, except in the absence of a quorum.

Several SENATORS. It can only be done when there is less than a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A call of the Senate can be entertained only under the 8th rule, which says that no member shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. There is no other rule under which a call of the Senate can be entertained.

Mr. BRODERICK. According to the last vote there were very few more than a quorum present and I find that several Senators have absented themselves since that time. My object is to ascertain whether there is a quorum of Senators on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is disposed to concede this matter to older Senators. His understanding is, that unless some vote shows that there is not a quorum present, such a motion would be out of order.

Mr. BRODERICK. Is it in order to move an adjournment?

Mr. GREEN. No, sir; the Senate has just refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No business has intervened since the vote was taken on an adjournment.

Mr. BRODERICK. The Senator from Ohio addressed the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Senator from Ohio made no proposition to the Senate.

Mr. BRODERICK. Then I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. CAMERON. I would ask whether it is right to press us in this way. It does seem strange to me that gentlemen should refuse to appoint a reasonable time fixing the termination of the debate. They have had it all their own way for a long while. They have made their speeches, voted for adjournments, controlled the Senate, and now on the last day desire to gag gentlemen on this side of the Chamber. Is that fair? Is that the way honorable gentlemen expect to be dealt with? The gentlemen on this side said that they thought they could get the vote by next Monday; why not agree to it?

Mr. GREEN. I will answer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield the floor?

Mr. CAMERON. I do not yield yet, for a moment. There are a number of gentlemen desirous to make speeches. I had some slight intention myself to make a speech; but I will not do so now, as I have agreed to pair off with a gentleman who has been called away from the Senate by a misfortune in his family—an act of God, over which he could have no control—the severe illness of his son, nearly arrived at manhood. I received a letter from him this evening, stating that he would not be back for a day or two, and for that reason I cannot act in this matter. Other gentlemen are similarly situated. I think great courtesy has been extended on this side. Whenever gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber desired to be away, some of us agreed to pair off with them; but if we were to go on pairing off, you could control us to the end of time. On the other hand, if we thought proper to come here and depend upon our muscle, we could stand it as well, and perhaps better, and as long as they could; and longer, because they have sick members and ours are all well. I ask Senators, is it fair, under these circumstances, at this time of night, that the Senator from New Hampshire, who is unable to proceed with his speech, should be compelled to go on? This is not the sort of courtesy that used to prevail here in past times. I do not want to be a Senator here, if we are to be gagged as members are in the other House, and in the Legislatures of our States. I thought that all men aspired to be here because there was a degree of kindness, liberality, and generosity prevailing here, which could be found in no other body under heaven. I do not want to come here if it is to be changed from that rule. If I had the majority, I would give the other side time to go on in this matter.

Mr. GREEN. I beg leave to respond to the Senator from Pennsylvania. He first says his friends on that side of the Chamber were willing to take the final vote on Monday. I answer, that his friends on that side of the Chamber told me, not five minutes ago, that they were not authorized to make an agreement for Saturday, or any other day, without consulting their friends, and they refused. The Senator from Pennsylvania, then, is in conflict with the assurance given by Senators on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator suffer me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON. I understand the gentlemen on the other side have had a caucus, and determined on their proceedings.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON. We have had no intimation of anything of the sort. To-morrow morning we can meet and decide on our course, and then, if we do not agree to meet them on some day, we cannot complain of the course of debate; but we should have an opportunity to confer.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Missouri give way to me for a moment?

Mr. GREEN. I cannot until I answer this. After I have done so, I shall be willing to have any interrogatory propounded to me. The first statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania was, that they were willing to take the final vote on next Monday. It now turns out that he was not authorized, as they assured me, to make any agreement without a caucus consultation; and what have we to hope for or expect? We have been trifled with, and the time of the Senate has been whiled away day after day. When this bill had been made the special order, when we had taken it up for consideration on Thursday, contrary to the wish of the side which I represent, all on the other side united to postpone the subject and to adjourn from Thursday to Monday, throwing away Friday and Saturday. Two or three Senators on that side having had the floor, and after having spoken from one to two hours, gave way for such motions. They have not been treated with discourtesy.

Mr. TOOMBS. I rise to a question of order. I am very desirous of getting on with the public business. I make the question of order that this discussion has nothing to do with the debate on the bill under consideration. I want that to go on.

Mr. GREEN. I know it is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. GREEN. I felt compelled to say something in response to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BRODERICK. If a motion for adjournment is in order, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Several SENATORS. We can vote it down without the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRODERICK. I call for the yeas and nays, if the Senator from Mississippi does not call for them.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—23.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CLARK. When this interregnum occurred, I was about to make some remarks upon a matter which is not, I think, usually touched upon in the Senate of the United States. I would not do it, were it not for some remarks which fell from the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] on Friday last, and also some remarks which fell from the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. KENNEDY.] I stand here to rebuke no one, to censure no one, to find fault with no one, but it did seem to me that some remarks that were made a few days since by those gentlemen were extraordinary. They were such remarks as, with all due deference and kindness to these Senators, I was sorry to hear. I do not know but that I might say, in charity, that I do not think the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Maryland would have made them, if they had bestowed upon them a little more consideration. I certainly was pained to hear them. I stand here to avow it, however unusual it may be in the Senate of the United States, I stand here proud to say—no, sir, not proud, I do not feel proud—I stand here acknowledging the “higher law” as the true rule for the guide of men in their human affairs. I did not like to sit here in my seat, and hear the Senator from Virginia, and the Senator from Maryland, say they were opposed to the principles of the higher law. Now let them tell me what they mean by the higher law? If they mean the law of the God who governs us, then I am sorry to hear, in the United States Senate, any man say he is opposed to the principles of that law. I do not mean to say, as was said by the Senator from Virginia, that we are here to administer the higher law. That is not what I mean; but I do not like to hear the higher law—I will speak of the law of eternal justice and right in that term—spoken of in that way. I stand here as a Senator, I hope we all do, to acknowledge that law. Sir, it would be a bitter mockery to put a clergyman in your seat to pray in the morning, and then stand up before night and deride the Giver of the law, by which we all ought to be regulated. It is the law of eternal right. I tell you, sir, in your place, I tell honorable Senators in their places, whatever they may think of it, whatever may be said in regard to it, that when the Senate and the Government of the United States forsake the principle of that law; when they disregard it, and cast it away, we are on the road to ruin. Our fathers did not so. They acknowledged the hand that ruled them, and why should not we?

Now, sir, I acknowledge those principles. I do not ask you; I do not ask the Senate of the United States; I do not ask the House of Representatives; I do not ask the Government of the United States; I ask nobody to administer that law. The author of that law will administer it, whether we are opposed to it or not; but I do ask Senators, if they do not choose to recognize it, not to stand here in the Senate and scoff at it, if I may use the expression. I do not censure anybody, Mr. President; but I do believe that the safety of the nation, the safety and salvation of man here, as well as hereafter, depend upon recognizing those great rules of right which that law prescribes. That is all I do mean. I do not ask you; I do not ask anybody; to go into their own hearts and take their own conscientious notions, and administer them as the law. I have no such idea. But I ask here, in the Senate of the United States, that we should not ignore those great principles of right which mark and characterize that law. Mr. President, we have all got to be governed by it, and all our actions have got to be conformed to it or punished by it, whatever we may say, and whatever we may do, and however much we may oppose it. Why should men recognize it in almost every department of business, and here in the Government of the United States, where we need as much wisdom as anywhere else, entirely ignore it? I read no lesson to any Senator; I read no lesson to the Government; but I do ask that, if we do not choose to follow it, that such allusions should not be made to it.

Now, Mr. President, I will pursue what I have to say in regard to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. I said I was opposed to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution because it carried slavery into that State, and because it excluded the free negro from that State. I now say that I am opposed to it because it places the right of property in the slave above and beyond the constitution, and for aught that I see, beyond the control of the constitution. Such is, in substance, the language of the constitution, in the article regulating slavery. It is section first, article seventh:

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

I do not say, I do not mean to say, that in a State where slavery exists by law and is made so by positive law, that that may not be true. I do not say that by the mere force of law in a State which tolerates and establishes slavery, that laws may not be passed which may not give, by the force of law, the same right to a slave and its increase that it gives to any other property; but I do say that I am opposed to admitting any State with a constitution containing provisions like that, for this reason: this constitution, though adopted in form by the people of Kansas, though they have molded it, and sent it here, and when admitted as a State it will be declared to be the constitution of Kansas, and of the people of Kansas, yet it cannot exist except by the passage of this act, and unless we give it vitality. So if this constitution goes into operation with this provision in it, the Congress of the United States, in fact, passes the provision giving it force, giving it vitality, and it may be said to be their act. I dissent from it; I do not understand that the right to property in a slave is higher than the Constitution. I understand it, as I think I have shown, to exist by the force of law. I know the report in 9 Georgia Reports traces it back beyond the constitution in the State, outside of the United States, to the capture in Africa, to the slave trader, who brings him here and sells him to a person here; but still I hold it to be entirely under the control of the Constitution and the law, and I do not want to sanction anything of this kind. It is a doctrine which is new, I think, in the Constitution of the United States, and I do not want to vote to admit a State with that provision in its constitution, and I do not intend to do so.

You tell me that the people may alter this constitution after they are admitted. I know they may within the forms prescribed by it. There are gentlemen who say they may alter it beyond the form prescribed. I am not going to stop to argue that point now, although I am prepared to do so by-and-by. The point is, this provision is in the constitution now. I have got to vote for the admission of Kansas with this constitution as it is, or not vote for it, leaving it to be altered afterwards; and I do not choose to vote for the constitution as it is. I prefer that the alteration should be made first; I propose to say to the people of Kansas, "stand outside; we do not choose to admit you under that constitution," and to tell the people of Kansas why. Let them see if they can form another constitution, but say to them that we will not give them that constitution. I do not propose to sit down and form a constitution for them; I do not claim that right; I propose to say to them we do not assent to that constitution; there are things in that constitution which we think should not be there; we will not admit you under that constitution; take the constitution to your people; let them amend it if it be agreeable to them to amend it, and form another, and we will see if you can form a constitution under which we should be willing that you should come into the Union. This is my opinion in regard to it; and I do not choose to vote for a constitution having that provision in it. I deny entirely that the right to a slave, and its increase, is above and beyond the Constitution; I think it is under the control of the Constitution, and under the control of law, and should be under the control of the Constitution and law.

But, Mr. President, I object to this constitution for another reason. I object to it because it takes from the people, no matter now whether by fraud or otherwise, (that is not what I am going to assume,) the power to alter the constitution until 1864. I do not know but that I ought here to allude to an amendment which I shall propose; I do not know that I shall get another opportunity of speaking, as it seems to be the determination to force the vote. It may be, perhaps, somewhat out of order to speak of it now; but here in this constitution we find this remarkable provision:

"Sec. 14. After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention, and if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall, at its next regular session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that choose the Representatives; said delegates so elected, shall meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution; but no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

Here is an attempt by a provision of the constitution—I do not say whether it can be successful, or whether the people have or have not power to alter it—on the part of the people who framed this constitution to perpetuate slavery in that Territory forever.

They may alter their constitution, according to this provision, after the year 1864; but any alteration made shall not affect the right of property in the ownership of slaves. What is the result, if this is so? You have slavery in the constitution when the State comes in; you have a provision that after 1864 you may alter that constitution; but you shall not in any way affect the ownership of slaves. Whether that attempt to fasten slavery upon the State may be successful or not, leaving out of the case the power of the people to alter this constitution, if you please, I object to voting for the admission of a State with any such constitution. I object to voting for the admission of a State which makes the pretense even by its constitution to fasten slavery upon the people in that way, because it leaves the whole question open. There is to be discussion about it; there is to be division about it, and quarrel over it, which is to agitate that State; and I would have them have a constitution by which they would have it under their control. I would not have a constitution which ties up any subject from the people.

But, Mr. President, I differ entirely from some gentlemen who say that the people can alter their constitution any time they please after it is made. I do not agree with them. I do not think it is so. I do not know but that a State may be admitted in a way which shall give the people power of amendment. The amendment I propose, that the State should come in on that condition, is with that view. I do not know but that we have the power to impose a condition on the admission of a State. I see by the bill for the admission of Kansas which has been framed by the Committee on Territories, that they say that the State shall be admitted upon condition that they shall not interfere with the public lands. If you can impose one condition, or a condition of that kind, cannot you impose a condition that the constitution shall not be construed in a particular way? But they will say this is an alteration of the constitution. It may be some check upon the constitution; but I believe the people have the right and the power, that we have the right and the power, to so admit a State upon express condition that nothing in that constitution shall be construed to impair the right or take away the right of the people to alter that constitution as they may please.

I would like to call the attention of the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] to this point. I would like to call his attention to his amendment, if it be in order, or allowable in the latitude of debate, the amendment not being precisely under consideration before the Senate. I understand the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio to be to this effect: that nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the people from construing it. I have not the amendment before me.

Mr. WADE. Will the Senator give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CLARK. If the gentleman desires to make a motion to adjourn, I will give way, and call for the yeas and nays on it.

At nine o'clock the yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 6, nays 24; no quorum voting:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Clark, Hamlin, King, Stuart, and Wilson—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Silldell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—24.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. BIGGS. There is evidently a quorum in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is evident that there is a quorum in the Senate. Many Senators did not vote.

Mr. TOOMBS. I take it the vote is sufficient. Less than a quorum can refuse to adjourn just as well as forty. The Senate have determined that they will not adjourn.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is very true. It does not require a majority to adjourn or to refuse to adjourn, but it requires a quorum to proceed with the business of the Senate.

Mr. PUGH. If that be the case, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms bring in the absentees.

Mr. TOOMBS. They are here.

Mr. PUGH. Let them be brought to the bar of the Senate.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move that the gentlemen present who did not vote be called to the bar of the Senate. The question may as well be decided at this time as any other.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate, for a moment, to one of the rules of the body. The 16th rule of the Senate provides that—

"When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one fifth of the members present, each member called upon shall, unless for special reason he be excused by the Senate, declare openly, and without debate, his assent or dissent to the question."

There is a quorum in the House evidently, or was a moment ago. A number of Senators did not vote. It will be for the Senate to say whether the Senators who did not vote shall be called upon to do so, or what steps shall be taken in regard to it.

Mr. MASON. The usage always has been, as I recollect, since my entrance here several years ago, when there was really not a quorum of the Senate present, and those present desired to proceed with business, to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the absentees to attend. There has been no instance within my knowledge, where the Sergeant-at-Arms has been directed to bring them here. I think it desirable to have the usual courtesies preserved. It is manifest that on the last call of the yeas and nays, the want of a quorum was on account of Senators present declining to vote. A Senator does that on his responsibility, and it will be for the Senate to say whether they will take any order to require the rules of the Senate to be observed. I would suggest, therefore, that the vote be again taken, so that it may be seen whether there are any Senators present who declined to vote, and if that be the fact, let the Senate decide whether it will take any order to see that the rule be enforced. I move that the roll be called again on the same motion.

Mr. BIGGS. I wish to inquire whether it would be in order to call the names of the absentees, to ascertain what Senators are present who declined to vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is most strictly in order.

Mr. BIGGS. I shall then call on them by name to request them to vote, if I can ascertain who declined.

Mr. CAMERON. I will make a suggestion; I can hardly make a motion at this stage of the question. I suggest to gentlemen on the other side to adjourn, so as to give Senators on this side an opportunity to consult in the morning; and if, after being in caucus to-morrow morning, we fail to meet you with a proposition to fix some reasonable time to close this debate, I, for one, will give up; but I think for the present we had better adjourn.

Mr. GREEN. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CAMERON. Oh, there is no order about it. There is no order in what was done before. Without a quorum we can know of no order.

Mr. GREEN. I demand order.

Mr. CAMERON. I cannot be put down by that man.

Mr. GREEN. There is no question pending.

Mr. CAMERON. I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri has a right to raise his question of order. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. GREEN. My question of order is that there is nothing debatable before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That point of order, if insisted on, is well taken, and the Chair must so rule.

Mr. CAMERON. There can be no question before the Senate when there is not a quorum here. How can you decide a question of order without a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend for a moment. The Chair desires, of course, to act with perfect propriety in the premises. The Chair is satisfied that there is a quorum of the body present. The 16th rule, which has already been read, says that upon a call of the yeas and nays, "each member called upon shall, unless for special reason he be excused by the Senate, declare openly, and without debate, his assent or dissent." The Senator from North Carolina desires that the Senators present not voting shall be ascertained, in order that the Senate may determine whether it will excuse them from voting. Under these circumstances the Chair will direct the Secretary to call the names of the Senators who did not vote, so that the Chair may ascertain the Senators who did not vote, and then the Senate can take such course as it deems proper. The Secretary will therefore report the names.

The Secretary called the names of the following Senators: Mr. BELL, Mr. BRIGHT, Mr. CAMERON—

Mr. CAMERON. I did not vote, because, as I have stated several times to-night, I have paired off with a gentleman who is compelled to be absent.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be excused from voting.

Mr. CAMERON. If I am to be counted as being present, I shall walk out.

The VICE PRESIDENT put the question on the motion to excuse Mr. CAMERON; and it was agreed to.

Mr. FITCH. I think I heard my colleague's [Mr. BRIGHT's] name mentioned. I announced once before this evening that he had paired off with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] I understood it was to be a temporary pair; but I do not see Mr. BELL in his seat.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] be excused from voting.

Mr. WADE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana is not present.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. CHANDLER.

Mr. WADE. I demanded the yeas and nays before that name was called, on the motion to excuse the Senator from Indiana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair doubts the propriety of a motion to excuse a Senator from voting when he is not present.

Mr. STUART. How does the Chair know that fact, sir? The Chair cannot know who is here and who is not here, unless by the vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that he thinks there is a quorum present.

Mr. STUART. But the Chair is now deciding points of order. My point is, that the Chair cannot officially take notice whether a Senator is here or not. There is a motion to excuse a member from voting. If he manifests that he is here by a vote, or by a remark, or by anything else that the Chair can take notice of officially, that is proper; but the Chair cannot decide whether he shall be excused from voting by saying that he is not here.

Mr. GREEN. Yes he can.

Mr. STUART. Not at all.

Mr. PUGH. I think that point of order will bring us just to the suggestion I made before. A Senator is either present or absent. That is a clear case. If the Senator from Michigan is right, that those who do not vote are absent, then I think the Sergeant-at-Arms ought to bring them here. Whether they are inside of the Chamber or not, he ought to bring them into the Senate, and to the notice of the Senate. If they are here present and do not vote, and the Chair can take notice of them, then there is no propriety, of course, in sending the Sergeant-at-Arms after them. I will do what I have tried all night long, to make some compromise, so as to effect an adjournment. The majority will not adjourn unless that is done, and I shall vote against all factious proceedings on either side.

Mr. STUART. I certainly have no desire to introduce anything here of a novel character. I have a great desire, however—

Mr. GREEN. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator state his point of order?

Mr. GREEN. It is this: that while the Secretary is calling the names of the absentees, to see whether there is a quorum present, no question of order is debatable, and a Senator cannot even make a motion until the call is gone through with.

Mr. STUART. I think the Senator will have to look into books that nobody else has seen to find any such principle as that.

Mr. GREEN. I expect to do it.

Mr. STUART. Well, we shall see. Now, sir—

Mr. GREEN. I have not yielded the floor; I have made my question of order, and I submit it to the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will remind the Senator—

Mr. SEWARD. One moment, if the Chair pleases. I wish to be heard on the question of order.

Mr. GREEN. I call the Senator from New York to order, until my point is either sustained or overruled.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall object to any point being sustained or overruled by the Chair in my presence here until I am heard about it.

Mr. GREEN. You have no right to be heard until he either sustains it or overrules it.

Mr. SEWARD. You will see.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators will be good enough to pause for a moment. Will the Senator from Missouri restate his point of order?

Mr. GREEN. My point is this: that under a rule of the Senate, the President of the Senate has ordered the names of those who did not answer on the last vote to be called, and during the progress of that call no matter of debate is in order. The Senator from Michigan is undertaking to make an argument in excuse, and to avoid the effect of the call. I say that is not in order until the call is through.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs leave to suggest that the proceedings of the last fifteen minutes are new to him; but he will state his opinion on the points of order raised, with the leave of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I must insist that the Senator raising the point of order shall take his seat.

Mr. GREEN. I call the Senator from New York to order.

Mr. SEWARD. I call the Senator from Missouri to order, and my point of order is this: that he has not the floor while the Chair is explaining.

Mr. GREEN. He has no right to call me to order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri has stated his point of order. The Chair will hear the suggestion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. GREEN, (to Mr. SEWARD.) Make your suggestion.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to know whether I must make my suggestions under the permission of the Chair, or by the command of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GREEN. Either is equally obligatory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. The point of order made by the Senator from Missouri is that a call of members is being made by the Secretary, and that while that call is proceeding, no Senator can speak to any question whatever. I answer that the Secretary is without authority to make the call. Then the Senator from Missouri says that he is ordered by the President of the Senate to make it. I answer that when there is not a quorum of the Senate present, the President of the Senate cannot direct that call to be made.

Mr. GREEN. It is too late for that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York comes to the precise point.

Mr. SEWARD. I say that without authority of a majority of the body, no proceedings can be had.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that on the last call of the yeas and nays there was not a quorum voting. It was quite apparent to the Chair, however, that there was a quorum in the Chamber. The Chair supposes it to be usual in all deliberative bodies to ascertain whether a quorum be present, and that power would exist in the Chair, as the organ of the body, to ascertain the fact whether a quorum be present, of necessity. The Chair assumed at the moment that there was a quorum present, and he might take this mode of ascertaining whether a quorum was really present, by directing the Secretary to call the names of those Senators who did not vote, and if they are present in the Chamber and respond to their names or are obviously present, the Chair will be able to announce to the Senate that there is a quorum of the body here.

Mr. TOOMBS. Certainly; that is the proper way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Accordingly, the Chair directed the Secretary to call over the names of those Senators who did not vote. Those who voted are present in the Chamber. There are many other Senators present whom the Chair sees, who did not vote. How many, whether enough to make a quorum or not, may be said to be in doubt, and the Chair directs the roll to be called, with a view to ascertain whether there be a quorum present.

Mr. STUART: I should like to call the attention of the Chair especially to the point of order which was made upon me, and to show the Chair that the Senator from Missouri has not recollected the facts. There was a motion made to excuse a Senator from voting. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] demanded the yeas and nays upon that motion. The Chair remarked that he doubted the propriety of moving to excuse a member who was not present. Now, sir, that is a debatable motion, to excuse a member, and I have the floor on that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no hesitation in retracting an opinion expressed by him when he believes that he was in error.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will pause; the Chair is speaking to the point of order. The Chair doubts the propriety now of the motion which he put to excuse the Senator from Pennsylvania, because the object he had in having the roll called was to ascertain whether there be a quorum present; and he was wrong in putting the question on the motion to excuse the Senator from Pennsylvania before the preceding question was determined—whether there was a quorum present? If the case were before him again, with his present opinions, the Chair would not entertain the motion to excuse the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STUART. But the motion now before the Senate is to excuse the Senator from Indiana; and to that motion I rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no motion before the Senate; and no question can be now before the Senate except to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

Mr. GREEN. That is it.

Mr. STUART. Will the Chair inform me what has become of the motion that the Senator from Indiana be excused from voting?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not entertain the motion, because he does not know that there is a quorum to vote upon it.

Mr. STUART. Very well; what next?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will do his best, in justice to all sides, to conduct the proceedings with regularity and propriety. The Secretary will continue to call the names of absentees.

Mr. WADE. What is the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question before the Senate. The Chair is trying to ascertain whether a quorum of this body is present. The Secretary will continue to call the list of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of—

Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. CLAY, Mr. COLLAMER, Mr. CRITTENDEN, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. DIXON, Mr. DOOLITTLE, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. DURKEE, and Mr. EVANS.

Of these gentlemen, Mr. DIXON alone answered.

Mr. FESSENDEN was called.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to hear the rule read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What rule does the Senator desire to hear read?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The rule with reference to voting on a call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator has shown his presence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will read the sixteenth rule:

"When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the members present, each member called upon, shall, unless for special reason he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate, his assent or dissent to the question."

The Secretary will proceed with the call.

The Secretary called the names of—

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No response.

Mr. FOOT. "Present."

Mr. FOSTER. "Present."

Mr. HALE.

Mr. HALE. I was not in when the question was put. I do not know the motion before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator shows that he is present.

The Secretary continued to call the names of—

Mr. HARLAN. "Present."

NEW SERIES—No. 7.

Mr. HUSTON. No response.

Mr. HUNTER. No response.

Mr. PEARCE. No response.

Mr. REID. No response.

Mr. SEWARD. "Here."

Mr. SIMMONS. No response.

Mr. SUMNER. No response.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. No response.

Mr. TRUMBULL. "Here."

Mr. WADE. "Here."

Mr. YULEE. No response.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon the call of the yeas and nays, the yeas were 6, and the nays 24—less than a quorum. The Chair being satisfied that there was a quorum present in the Chamber, and on the suggestion also of Senators, directed the vote to be called. Nine Senators who did not vote, have answered to their names, which, added to those who did vote, makes a quorum. The names of those nine Senators are at the service of the body.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, we have attained a new stage in the deliberations of the Senate. The rule of this body requires that each Senator present shall vote when his name is called.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to say to the Senator from Virginia, that his next duty is to have the names of those Senators called in their order, that they may vote, unless they be excused by the Senate.

Mr. MASON. I intended to make a motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the names of those Senators who responded to their names on the last calling of the roll, but who did not vote when the question was put.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. CHANDLER.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the question? I was not present when it was put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question was on adjournment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I vote to adjourn.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. DIXON, and he answered "nay."

Mr. PUGH. I hope we shall not pass the first case. We may as well make a stand there.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator voted; that is all you can ask.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. FESSENDEN.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask to be excused from voting.

Mr. BROWN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PUGH. I believe, under our rules, that request cannot be made, unless before the call commences.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will again refer Senators to the rule:

"When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the members present, each member called upon shall, unless for special reason he be excused by the Senate, declare openly, and without debate, his assent or dissent to the question."

The Senator from Maine is now called upon to vote for the first time. He asks to be excused, but has assigned no reason. The Chair, however, will entertain the motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. At the suggestion of the Senator near me, under the circumstances of the case, I withdraw my request to be excused, and vote "yea."

The Secretary called the name of Mr. FOOT.

Mr. FOOT. I vote "yea," but at the same time I beg leave to say that I was not present when the yeas and nays were called on the motion.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. FOSTER, and he voted "yea."

The Secretary called the name of Mr. HALE.

Mr. HALE. What is the question? I was not in when the motion was put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on adjournment.

Mr. HALE. Does the rule require a Senator to vote if he is not in the Chamber when the question is put?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now put.

Mr. HALE. I am ready to vote. I vote "yea."

The Secretary called the names of Messrs.

HAMLIN, SEWARD, TRUMBULL, and WADE, and they voted "yea."

The VICE PRESIDENT then announced the result—yeas 15, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—24.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield the floor to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of this question be postponed until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. I rise to what I believe is a privileged question; but I do not know that it is. I understand that there has been a call upon the members who were not here when the question was put on the last motion; and it appears by the call that there were a good many absent members. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to procure the attendance of absent members.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was in the act of addressing the Senate, and the Senator did not obtain the floor. The Chair will hear him in a moment, as soon as the Senate determines whether it will take the question by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. My proposition is to procure the attendance of absent members. I think it is the privilege of the body to have the Senate full. I move, therefore, that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to procure the attendance of the absent members. I have not had an opportunity to look at the rules; but I take it this order is in the power of every House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to think that the motion is in order.

Mr. GREEN. If the Senator has made a motion, I should like to know what it is.

Mr. HALE. That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to procure the attendance of absent members.

Mr. GREEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. STUART. I submit that that cannot be done. To lay a simple motion on the table is not parliamentary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair inclines to think that the motion to lay on the table is in order. If that is carried, it is an expression of the sentiment of the Senate, that they will not at this time call for absent members.

Mr. SEWARD. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring in the absent Senators. The Senator from Missouri moves to lay that motion upon the table. Upon this the yeas and nays have been ordered. Senators who are for laying the subject on the table, will, when their names are called, answer "yea;" those opposed to it will answer "nay."

Mr. STUART and Mr. HAMLIN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HAMLIN. With the permission of the Senator from Michigan, I desire to say that in my opinion, the Chair, in stating the motion, does not state it in the language in which it was made by the Senator from New Hampshire. I think there is a great deal of force in the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. PUGH. I call the Senator to order. The motion to lie on the table is not debatable.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am making a suggestion to the Chair in relation to the manner of proceeding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is willing to hear the suggestion; but if the Senator from Ohio insists, I must—

Mr. STUART. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PUGH. I insist on it; if we are to have this course of things, I call Senators on all sides to order.

Mr. STUART. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HAMLIN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, if he sustains the point of order of the Senator from Ohio; and I suppose on that question I may be heard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be good enough to come to order. The Senator from Michigan takes the appeal on the same point, I believe, that the Senator from Maine proposes to take his appeal.

Mr. HAMLIN. On this appeal, which has been taken, I only desire to state to the Chair what I think is material. I have risen for no other purpose. I heard the Senator from Virginia—

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator give way for a moment? If it will relieve the Senate from any embarrassment, although I have no doubt on the question, I will withdraw my motion, and allow the vote to be taken directly on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, to send for the absentees, so that we may see whether the Senate means to send for them or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and it requires unanimous consent to withdraw the motion. Is consent given that the motion be withdrawn?

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Chair will allow me to proceed on the appeal which the Senator from Michigan or myself has taken from the ruling of the Chair. I believe it is a debatable question.

Mr. PUGH. I want to find out whether that appeal is debatable. I object to your proceeding until the Chair decides it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I only want to state the form of the question, and I will state it. What is the decision of the Chair?

Mr. STUART. There is nothing for the Chair to decide.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to go after the absent Senators. The Senator from Missouri moved to lay that motion upon the table. The Senator from Michigan raised the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Missouri is not in order. The Chair decided it to be in order. From that decision the Senator from Michigan appeals. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

Mr. HAMLIN. Now I propose to say a word on that appeal.

Mr. PUGH. I object that that is not a debatable appeal, because the motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let us hear what the Chair says.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Since the present occupant has been in this chair no question has ever arisen in regard to the point whether appeals are debatable or not. The rules say that the Chair must decide every question of order without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate. Whether, when an appeal is taken, that appeal is debatable or not, the Chair must decide according to the usage of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. The uniform practice of the Senate, without exception, has been to allow debate on appeals.

Mr. HALE. As a matter of history, if the Chair will indulge me, I will say that a few years ago, when Mr. Dallas presided over this body, this very question was raised. I remember that Mr. Dallas suggested that the appeal must be decided without debate; but the late Mr. Berrien, who was then on this floor, a Senator from Georgia, immediately suggested that that would be to paralyze the Senate by the will of an officer not of their own selection, and that, when he had decided a question, and an appeal was taken from his decision, that was always open to debate. Mr. Dallas retracted the opinion which he had advanced, upon the suggestion of Mr. Berrien. I believe it has always been considered that an appeal from the decision of the Chair is debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On a question of order?

Mr. HALE. On a question of order.

Mr. GREEN. The uniform rule of parliamentary law is this: if the question itself is debatable—

Mr. STUART. I call the Senator from Missouri to order.

Mr. GREEN. Very well; state the point of order.

Mr. STUART. I call the Senator to order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. STUART. I call him to order.

Mr. GREEN. On what ground?

Mr. STUART. The Chair has arrested the Senator from Missouri to decide the question of order; and, while the Chair is deciding it, no Senator has a right to say a word on the subject.

Mr. GREEN. He has not arrested me.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. GREEN. Correct yourself, not me.

Mr. STUART. I stated the fact. My point of order is, that the Chair having arrested the Senator from Maine upon the point of order made by the Senator from Ohio, that this is not a debatable question, until the Chair decides that point no Senator has a right to say a word.

Mr. GREEN. I wish to do justice—

Mr. STUART. I call the Senator to order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senators will both take their seats, the Chair will say a single word. The Chair decided the point of order without debate. The Senator from Michigan took an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The question is, whether that appeal is debatable. Such a question has not arisen since I have occupied this chair, and I was disposed, with the consent of the Senate, to take the experience of a few of the older Senators on that point, and to be governed by the practice of the body.

Mr. STUART. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I think it is a very plain mode of proceeding.

Mr. MASON. Will the Chair be good enough to state the judgment that is appealed from? I did not hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to go after the absent members. The Senator from Missouri moved to lay that motion upon the table. The Senator from Michigan raised the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Missouri could not be entertained. The Chair decided that motion to be in order, as the effect of its adoption would be the expression of a purpose on the part of the Senate not to send for the absent Senators, but to lay aside the consideration of that matter. The Senator from Michigan appealed from the decision of the Chair deciding that the motion of the Senator from Missouri was in order. The Senator from Maine proposes to debate that appeal. What the Chair desires to know is, whether, by the practice of this body, appeals from the decision of the Chair on points of order have been debatable. He heard the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, and would be glad to hear other brief suggestions to the point from any Senator who is aware of the practice. The Senator from Maine is on the floor, and the Chair will hear what he desires to say.

Mr. GWIN. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to ask the Chair a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. GWIN. I desire to ask whether, when there is a quorum present—and the last vote showed thirty-nine Senators to be here—it is in order to move to send for absent Senators?

Mr. JONES. It is not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has decided that question.

Mr. MASON. The Constitution of the United States declares that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide." The eighth rule of the Senate has this provision:

"No member shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. And in case a less number than a quorum of the Senate shall convene, they are hereby authorized to send the Sergeant-at-Arms, or any other person or persons, by them authorized, for any or all absent members, as the majority of such members present shall agree, at the expense of such absent members, respectively, unless such excuse for non-attendance shall be made, as the Senate, when a quorum is convened, shall judge sufficient, and in that case the expense shall be paid out of the contingent fund. And this rule shall apply as well to the first convention of the Senate at the legal time of meeting, as to each day of the session after the hour has arrived to which the Senate stood adjourned."

Now, I think it is very manifest from the Constitution constituting this body, that there is no power to send for absent members, unless there is not a quorum in attendance, and when there is no quorum in attendance, the eighth rule points out the mode in which it can be done, and it cannot be done by more than a quorum.

Mr. BIGLER. That is the uniform practice.

Mr. HAMLIN. The rule which the Senator from Virginia has just read, confers upon a number in this body less than a quorum the power to do certain things without which rule they would be powerless. Because it has conferred upon a number less than a quorum a power to compel the attendance of absentees, does it follow as a matter of course that a quorum cannot compel the attendance of those who are absent, if there is a quorum present? Far from it. But that is not the point to which I rose, and if Senators had not interrupted me, I should not have detained the Senate more than a single moment. I rose because the Senator from Virginia had made a suggestion in which I thought there was much force. He stated this evening that it had been the uniform practice of the Senate up to this time to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. MASON. For want of a quorum.

Mr. HAMLIN. No matter whether there was or was not a quorum. The Chair in his statement of the question to the Senate put it in this way: Will the Senate direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in the absent members? and that was the point to which I rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the language of the motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will modify his motion so that it shall conform to what has been the uniform practice of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I will do that.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is all I had to say. I now withdraw my appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STUART. It is my appeal.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well.

Mr. STUART. I yielded the floor to the Senator from Maine. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. FITCH. With the permission of the Senator from Michigan, I wish to ask the Chair a question. The decision, I understand, from which the Senator from Michigan appealed, was a decision that a motion to lay on the table another motion was in order. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable. Now, can a non-debatable question be made debatable by some collateral motion in relation to it?

Mr. STUART. I have yielded the floor a good many times to-day, and am willing to yield it a good many times more; but I should have got through long ago with what I had to say if Senators had allowed me the privilege. I have not the slightest disposition to raise any controversy here in the Senate; on the contrary, I intend to exert every power that I have to prevent it. Upon this point I wish to suggest to the Chair, in obedience to his own request, that every question of order, either put by the Chair to the Senate, taken from the Chair on an appeal to the Senate, is debatable in the very nature of the question. There is a provision in one of our rules that a question of order is to be decided, without debate, by the Chair, but that means a question whether a Senator is in order in debate; it does not mean any other question of order. When a Senator is called to order the Chair is to decide the question whether he is in order or not. It is also provided in the same rule that the Chair may submit the question of order to the Senate. Does not the Chair see that the moment a question of order is submitted to the Senate each Senator is at liberty to give his reasons for his vote upon it? The Chair has that right. When the Chair is called upon to decide a question of order, there is no human power that can prevent him from stating the grounds on which he decides it. You would stultify him if it were otherwise. So, when an appeal is taken to the Senate each Senator is called upon to vote, and he is not to vote sub silentio. He has a right to state the grounds on which he bases his opinion; and, therefore, the Chair will see at a glance that, without restriction, every appeal from the President to the Senate is debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that he has not decided that it is not debatable.

Mr. STUART. So I understood; but I also understood the Chair to say that he desired the opinion of some Senators on that question, and it was in obedience to that suggestion that I was giving my opinion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to debate the appeal?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator.

Mr. STUART. I do not desire to detain the Senate on this topic. I am satisfied that the ground assumed by the Senator from Virginia is correct; that the motion made by the Senator from New Hampshire itself is not in order; that it is not a power which attaches to any portion of the Senate, unless there is not a quorum present. The Chair will allow me to say further, with great respect, that I do not think he had any power to cause the roll to be called. The Chair can do what the rules authorize him to do. The eighth rule, read by the Senator from Virginia, authorizes the Senate, when less than a quorum is convened, to take measures to bring in the absentees at their own expense. That is the extent of their authority. Now, sir, upon this question—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator allow the Chair to interrupt him with a suggestion?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, in the language in which it is now put, is simply that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. Does the Senator from Michigan think there is any objection to the motion in that form?

Mr. STUART. I do not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the motion before the Senate.

Mr. STUART. Now, sir, the Senator from Missouri moves to lay that motion on the table. The Senate may refuse to agree to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, but I submit to the consideration of the Chair, that a motion which connects with it no papers, no substance, no subject, cannot be laid on the table, any more than a motion to adjourn can. I know there is another reason connecting itself with the motion to adjourn; but it is a mere motion. A motion to adjourn over to a particular day, or anything that rests on a mere motion, connecting itself with no bill, no papers, nothing that is substantial, cannot be laid upon the table. I was about to say—and it is really all the desire I had on this subject—that I made an effort to-day, and I should like to make it again, to have the Senate come to some understanding by which we shall progress in some mode that will correspond with the dignity of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator suspend for a moment? The Chair must request Senators on all sides to preserve order. The buzz in the Chamber is so great that the Chair cannot hear the Senator from Michigan. Senators will be good enough to come to order.

Mr. STUART. I was about to say that I desire that there shall be some arrangement made, some understanding in the body, by which we shall proceed with this discussion in a manner corresponding with the dignity of the Senate and the importance of the question; and so long as the discussion is of a proper character, it ought to be permitted to proceed, so that each Senator may be heard, and heard at a proper time. I should be glad to have that done; I should be glad to make any arrangements to perfect it; but, sir, I have no purpose—and I beg to say to the Chair and to the Senate, that whatever may result from this controversy, I hope to be able to maintain a proper feeling myself, and a proper respect for everybody. It is obvious, however, that if this course of proceeding is to go on, a mere question of endurance at this stage of the debate, we shall hardly be able to keep ourselves within that rule. Hence it was that I desired that no decision should be made either by the Chair or the Senate in the haste or under the excitement of the occasion, which might be deemed improper hereafter; and it was for that reason, and that alone, that I took the appeal at this time, and with great reluctance, for it would give me vastly more pleasure to sustain the Chair, than to overrule him on any occasion; but I insist that it is not in order to move to lay a mere motion on the table.

Mr. MASON. I wish only to add a word to what has fallen from the Senator from Michigan. My impressions strongly are that he is right in his suggestion that it is not in order, in the Senate at least, to move to lay a motion on the table. I think there is such a practice in the House of Representatives. How it arose there, I do not know; whether it is under rule or under usage; but I do not recollect of any proposition in the Senate to lay a motion on the table. I have been confirmed in that impression by a recurrence to the Manual, which is a part of our rules; which, with the permission of the Senate, I will read, as it is very brief:

"When the House has something else which claims its present attention, but would be willing to reserve in their power to take up a proposition whenever it shall suit them, they order it to lie on their table. It may then be called for at any time."

That refers altogether to propositions; it cannot refer to a motion. In my recollection of the usage of the Senate, I have never known a motion made, or to prevail if it were made, to lay a mere motion on the table.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. With the leave of the Senate the Chair will very briefly state the grounds of his decision. The Senator from New Hampshire moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. The Senator from Missouri moved to lay that motion on the table. The Chair decided the motion of the Senator from Missouri to be in order. From this decision the Senator from Michigan appeals. The question is, whether the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire was of a character which could be laid on the table. The Chair considers the word "proposition" in the clause read by the Senator from Virginia to be of very broad significance and covering a motion. A motion is a form of proposition. It is a question. It was under debate. The question was, shall the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent members? It is not for the Chair to say that it is not in the power of the Senate to declare that they will lay aside, for laying on the table is nothing more than laying aside the consideration of that question, proposition, or motion, to wit: directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators. There is a rule of the Senate which the Chair supposes to bear somewhat on this point. "When a question is under debate"—the word is very broad—"no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, to postpone indefinitely," &c. The Chair thinks that the effect of voting to lay this motion on the table is nothing more than the expression of the purpose of the Senate not to consider at this time the motion or proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of absent members. This is the ground of the decision. The Chair will put the appeal.

Mr. GREEN. I merely wish to remark that all I had to say has already been said by the Chair, and said in a manner more clear and explicit than I could possibly say it myself. I made a motion to lay a proposition on the table. The Chair entertained it. A question of order was raised whether a motion could be laid on the table. A motion is a proposition. Every resolution is a motion; every motion is a resolution; and there is no distinction between them. If any member of the Senate chooses to require that that proposition be reduced to writing, it must be put in the shape of a motion. There is, therefore, no distinction, no question between the Senator from Michigan and myself. The Senator from New Hampshire moved a certain proposition, I moved to lay that proposition on the table. He says that a motion to lay another motion on the table cannot be entertained because that may be reconsidered and taken up at any time.

Mr. STUART. No, sir.

Mr. GREEN. What then? So of the motion to reconsider; and I have heard him move to reconsider a vote that has been taken; and when that motion to reconsider has been made, I have also heard him move to lay that motion on the table. Here is a motion laid on the table, and it has been the uniform practice of the Senate.

On the other question of order I shall not take one moment of time, for the reason that I esteem the decision of the Chair to be right, correct, and proper. With reference to the idea of the Senator from Michigan, that the Chair could not entertain the appeal because a motion to lay it on the table was out of order, that seems to me so in conflict with the ordinary practice of the Senate, so in conflict with the principles of parliamentary law, that there can be no difficulty on that subject. Any proposition, any motion, any order, anything pending before the Senate, may be laid on the table. You may present it in the shape of a motion, proposition, bill, petition, or anything else, and you may then move to lay it on the table. There is now a motion pending; and if I had chosen to exact it of the Senator from New Hampshire, he would be compelled to reduce it to writing in this form: "Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to send for the absentees." That would be his resolution; that is his motion. The fact that I have not chosen to require him to reduce it to writing does not lessen my rights on the question pending before the Senate. When that resolution, proposition, or motion, is pending, I may choose to move to lay it on the table, and the Senate has the right so to order, there being a quorum present authorized to transact business. I will not consume the time of the Senate. I know the Senator from Michigan is mistaken in his point of order. I know that a motion and a resolution are really the same; that the one is reduced to writing, and the other may be reduced to writing, if any Senator so requires. They are the same; there is no distinction between them. I shall not consume time, but ask for a vote on the point now pending before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. What is the question before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. SEWARD. I understood that the Chair had invited the opinion of Senators on the question whether the appeal from the Chair was debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to be a general understanding in the Senate, several Senators, without contradiction, stating that it had been the custom of the body to debate appeals, and the Chair therefore listened to debate.

Mr. HALE. I was going to say a word or two, because I do not wish to set a bad precedent set now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has heard debate on the appeal, and he will hear the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. I wish to thank the Senator from Missouri for not compelling me to reduce my motion to writing. [Laughter.] That is a little favor.

Mr. GREEN. I know the Senator is not a good scrivener, and therefore I excuse him.

Mr. HALE. If he had insisted on it I should have asked the clerk to write it for me. [Laughter.] But, sir, I want to be serious. I do not want a bad example set here at this time. I think a decision or an intimation sustained by grave Senators that an appeal from the decision of the Chair is not debatable would be very dangerous, and very alarming to the liberties of the Senate.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Toombs.

SENATE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not so decided, and it has been for half an hour actually under debate. The Chair hears debate on it.

Mr. HALE. If that is the understanding of the Chair and the Senate, I will not say a word. Before I sit down, however, I wish to say that I concur in opinion with the Chair and the Senator from Missouri about this point of order which was raised by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. PUGH. I objected to the Senator from Maine proceeding; but he made his speech; and now I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. WADE. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clark, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hale, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—15.

So it was ordered that the appeal taken by Mr. STUART from the decision of the Chair lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion that the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire do lie on the table. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I will trouble the Chair to state the question again; there is so much noise here that I cannot hear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Senate comes to order, the Chair will state the question before it. The Senator from New Hampshire has moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. The Senator from Missouri has moved that that proposition do lie on the table; and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Chandler, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—15.

So it was ordered that Mr. HALE's motion do lie on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move a reconsideration of the last vote; I think it is wrong.

Mr. GREEN. Did the Senator vote in the affirmative?

Mr. WILSON. I believe the question now to be taken, is on the motion to postpone this matter until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is on the reconsideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Senator from Michigan vote in the affirmative?

Mr. CHANDLER. I did.

Mr. PUGH. Is it in order to reconsider a vote of the Senate deciding that a motion shall lie on the table? The motion that it lie on the table is itself a privileged motion. If you can reconsider that, you might reconsider the previous question and everything. The proper motion would be to take it up when the Senator can get his motion in order.

Mr. STUART. Certainly; the rule is without exception that any motion made and carried in the affirmative may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to remark that he was not aware of any rule which would cut off the motion now made. It is moved to reconsider the vote by which the proposition was ordered to lie on the table. That motion will be entered on the Journal and can be called up hereafter. The question now before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock. On that question the yeas and nays were called for, but have not yet been ordered. The Chair will take the sense of the Senate as to whether the question shall be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PUGH. Is it in order to move that that motion lie on the table after the yeas and nays are demanded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a question before the body.

Mr. HAMLIN. That would carry the whole question with it, would it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio refer to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not so understand. That is in order.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts lie on the table.

Mr. HAMLIN. We will all vote for that. It carries the whole subject.

Mr. STUART. I hope I shall not be considered, by the Chair or the Senate, as specially obtrusive; but I wish to suggest that this motion to postpone is a bare, naked motion, connecting nothing with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, on reflection, will rule this motion to be out of order.

Mr. PUGH. I will call the attention of the Chair to the Manual.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rules provide that, "when a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, to postpone indefinitely, to postpone to a day certain," &c. The Chair does not understand that, under this rule, the motion of the Senator from Ohio is in order.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. Jefferson, in remarking on that subject, says in the Manual:

"When the House has something else which claims its present attention, but would be willing to reserve it in their power to take up a proposition whenever it shall suit them, they order it to lie on their table. It may then be called for at any time."

I think we have something that suits our attention better than this motion. We can take it up an hour hence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests to the Senator that, by the eleventh rule of the body, when a proposition is under debate, there are a series of motions which may be made; one of which is to lie on the table; another is to postpone to a day certain.

Mr. PUGH. The paragraph I have read is Mr. Jefferson's commentary on that very rule, as the Chair will see if he looks at the Manual.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further suggestion, the Chair will direct the roll to be called.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to postpone the further consideration of this subject until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On that question, which I believe is debatable, I should like to make a suggestion or two to the Senate, if one so humble as myself may get the ear of the Senate. It seems to me that very little is being accomplished by this night session. I have never known much accomplished by such sessions. There are several gentlemen who desire to say something upon this bill. I myself had desired to address the Senate upon it; but I am not entirely ready to do so to-night, and if I were to undertake to do so now, it would probably take me much longer than it would if I were better prepared. We have abundance of time before us, and I apprehend we shall get the final vote as soon by going on in the ordinary way, meeting and adjourning at reasonable hours, as we shall by the attempt to coerce members of the Senate to deliver their views now, or be cut off. I think nothing will be gained even in point of time by this attempt. It will engender bad feeling; we make a bad exhibition of ourselves before the country. In any point of view in which I can look at this matter, I can only see evil to grow out of it, and no possible good. Now we have consumed nearly six hours since the usual time of adjournment, and but one speech is partly through. If we had adjourned at the ordinary time, I doubt not that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] would make his speech, probably, in a couple of hours to-morrow; and now his remarks have been interfered with, and thereby prolonged. We have first one motion and then another, an appeal from the decision of the Chair, motions to lie on the table, and motions to adjourn. All these, it seems to me, can accomplish no good, and will not further the business of the Senate at all. It comes to a matter of physical endurance whether Senators can be forced to make their speeches at unreasonable hours, or whether they will forego the opportunity to deliver their views which they consider it due to themselves and the positions they occupy to lay before the people. The question before us is a very important one, admitted to be such upon all sides of the Chamber; one affecting the peace and harmony of the Union; one putting to hazard, I may say, the peace and harmony of the Union.

Mr. BIGGS. Will the Senator from Illinois be kind enough to suggest some day when we can probably take this vote? If he will do so, I shall be much obliged to him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot do that, because I am not authorized to speak for others; but I will give the Senator my own view about it. I have no doubt, from what knowledge I have of the Senate, that the vote can be taken this week, or certainly by Monday next. I am not aware myself of Senators who propose to speak, that would occupy half that time. Still, I cannot give that assurance, because I am not authorized to speak for other persons; but I know of no disposition to prolong the debate unreasonably; nor do I know of any gentleman who desires to speak for the purpose of occupying time. If there are such persons, they are unknown to me. I had supposed that on this question ample time would be afforded for all Senators to be heard upon it during the week. I think this week will be sufficient; but still I cannot promise that it will be so. I think it would be better for us to stop where we are. Let this matter go over, and the other side will find that the question will be disposed of quite as soon by pursuing the ordinary course, as by this attempt at coercion. It is unpleasant always to be coerced. It is a delicate subject. There is bad enough feeling in the country at best. Sections of the country are being arrayed against each other. I do not wish to increase that feeling unnecessarily, be the issue of this matter what it may. I hope it will be permitted to go over until another day, and take the usual course.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will claim a few moments of the time of the Senate, by their permission. Gentlemen around the Chamber have alluded to gagging and forcing and cramming. I wish to give a short history of the country, for I trust this night's work will be remembered. It ought to be remembered here and elsewhere. It is a new era in the Senate, and one that ought to be marked. This question has been discussed since the session commenced. I believe the first speech that was made in the Senate of the United States at the present session of Congress was on the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, on the 9th day of December, 1857. We have continued from time to time, probably every week, when any gentleman desired it, to argue the question up to this 15th day of March. We have consumed upon it more than the time allotted every second year to the discharge of the entire legislative business of the Republic—more than sufficient to discharge that business every year by persons fit to do it, and who address themselves to its performance.

It has been the fixed purpose, if I may judge of the conduct of the Opposition, at all times within the last fortnight, to delay this business. Some of the gentlemen have even availed themselves of the casual absence of Senators on the other side to cut off a speech in the middle at an early hour of the day, and thus take up two days with one speech. Two or three Senators on this side of the Hall have taken two days each to speak upon the subject. Now they talk of proper hours. Some of them have commenced their speeches at one o'clock, spoken an hour and a half, and then, in the casual absence of Senators on the other side, postponed the subject, and consumed the next day in the same way. So, too, they have adjourned over from Thursday to Monday. A week ago to-day, according to the usual custom of this body since I have been a member of it, notice was given that we would endeavor, in order to expedite the public business and address ourselves to the other great interests of the Republic, to have a vote on this bill to-day. This notice was given in the usual form, according to the expressed will of the majority, the Democratic party, who are responsible to the country for the conduct of business here. That announcement was publicly made a week ago to-day, by the Senator who has the bill in charge. Notwithstanding that, we have been going on listening to a speech for an hour or an hour and a half a day, and then adjourning. This side of the House has always, without exception, at all times, voted for adjournments at the earliest hour.

We came here this morning with a view of carrying out the notice which was given a week ago; but we were willing to allow three more days, until Thursday next, if that would be accepted. The gentleman who has charge of the bill made that proposition to the Senators who oppose it; and some of them said it would take a month longer, and some said two or three weeks, and some jeered at what they pleased to term this interference with their rights. Sir, the country has rights. The majority have rights, and they have duties; and one of those duties is that the business of this country shall be done decently, and in order, and in due time; and I trust there is fidelity enough to themselves, and to their principles, and to their country yet in the majority of the Senate, to stand at all hazards, and crush this faction. [Applause in the galleries.]

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Disorder cannot be tolerated in the galleries or upon the floor.

MR. FESSENDEN. I do not know that it will be quite so easy a matter to crush us.

MR. TOOMBS. I did not say it was easy.

MR. FESSENDEN. I do not think it can be done. The Senator talks about new eras in the Senate. Sir, I think it is a new era when a Senator rises here and talks about crushing the minority in the Senate as a faction. I have had occasion to say before, and I repeat now, that, although a minority in this body, we have our rights; we understand that every individual member of this body has his rights. When the Senator talks about undertaking to crush us, I want to know by what process he intends to do it. We understand perfectly, sir, that we may be brought to a contest of physical endurance; and very likely if we are the Senator from Georgia may be able to endure more and longer than I can; but if we are brought to that, so long as we are able to stand here within the rules of the Senate, and so long as the Presiding Officer administers those rules firmly—and from what we have seen I have no doubt he will do so to the end—I want the Senator from Georgia, and every Senator, to understand that we shall not hesitate to do what we please, under the rules of the Senate, with reference to protracting this matter, until we see that we are to be treated fairly and honestly on this floor.

Now, sir, what the Senator has said with reference to the course of the debate on this bill, I do not undertake to say, or to intimate that he does not understand to be so, but I will say that it is very contrary to my understanding, and to the understanding of the minority on this floor. I have given notice to Senators, over and over again, that there was no disposition on the part of the minority here to talk for the sake of talking, that we had no disposition or wish to protract the time one hour or one moment beyond the period when we had an opportunity fully and fairly to express our opinions, and that we should have that opportunity unless the crushing process was undertaken, and if it is, I am perfectly willing to go to the country with it, and that the country shall understand precisely how this matter stands; and it will be for the country finally to settle, and to settle by votes, with reference to the question whether or not it will sustain men.

The Senator from Georgia says that there have been arguments made on the Lecompton constitution ever since the 9th of December last—ever since the commencement of the session. Why, sir, I believe this subject was not acted upon in the Territory of Kansas until after that period. It did not come here until the month of February. What were the questions which agitated the Senate? The first questions that agitated the Senate, were questions that arose on the annual message of the President. We debated that; we debated the sentiments of that message; we debated the recommendations of that message. I say "we," but it was not debated on our side of the Senate. The debate arose on the other side, between Senators hitherto of the same political party and the same political faith, though now differing. We abstained day after day, week after week, I had almost said month after month, but not quite so long as that. We abstained until our constituents complained of us for not expressing our sentiments to the country on the questions thus presented. We left the debate to the other side, and it was kept there. Senators on the other side of the Chamber exclusively debated that matter, day after day. We hardly opened our mouths upon it. We certainly took no time in regard to it. It was the understanding that we should take that course, and leave the question to be debated there, until Senators on the other side satisfied themselves of their own position.

Then what was the next question that came up? The President sent in his special message, and upon that debate arose. In the mean time other questions intervened. The Army bill was under consideration for some weeks. That was debated in the Senate day after day; and because occasionally the question of Kansas was mentioned, because, on the Army bill, we chose to debate the effect of the measure upon Kansas, was that debate on the Lecompton constitution? Sir, this question of the Lecompton constitution has been before the Senate but a fortnight, and I say, as a matter of fact, that most gentlemen on this side held back their speeches on the main question for the single reason that they wished to debate it as my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] has said he did, when a practical issue was before the Senate. I was not one of that number. I said what I desired to say upon the President's special message; but I was only one, and hardly any one on this side followed my example. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] delivered a portion, I hope it was only a portion, of what he had to say on another question, because he was ready to debate it; but the main body of the Senators on this side withheld the delivery of their views until the question should come practically before the Senate, and they took no part whatever in the debate before it did come here.

It has now really been before the Senate only two weeks. What have we done since? There has been only a single occasion when we adjourned over from Thursday to Monday; and there have been only two occasions, according to my recollection, when we carried an adjournment. One of them was a week day, long after four o'clock, the hour at which the Senate usually adjourns. The other was on Saturday afternoon last, when we had been debating the whole week, and when the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who had been out of health for a week or ten days past, his own strength being exhausted, requested the Senate to adjourn, and give him until to-day to finish his speech. This is the head and front of our offending. What have we been ready to say now? What I have said, privately and publicly on this floor, that all we demanded was, that every Senator on this side should have a fair opportunity, within reasonable hours of the day, to say what he had to say on this great question which has agitated the country; and that we had no disposition to debate for the purpose of consuming time. When we came into the Senate this morning, we were not notified that the question was to be taken to-night. We did not go on upon that supposition; but, between four and five o'clock in the afternoon, when many Senators on this side had left, it was demanded of us that we should decide at once when this question should be taken, or we should be compelled to sit here until the vote was finally taken.

Do you call that treating us well? I have made no complaints about it; it is not my habit to complain. I have appealed to gentlemen on the other side of the House to give us an opportunity to be heard, to give us an opportunity to consult fairly, and then, after they have given us fair notice of what their terms were, we were ready, if we could not make terms, to agree that they might sit us out if they had the physical endurance to do it. I do not object to that; but I want Senators to understand that we are not to be crushed out.

We know what the rules of the Senate are; and if Senators will compel us to resort to them in order to get time, very well, we must meet it as we can. We have some degree of physical strength, and what we have we are ready to exert, and we will do it, let me tell the Senator from Georgia, without being particularly alarmed about his crushing process.

I wish now to repeat what has been said by my friend from Illinois. I have proposed to the Senate to adjourn until to-morrow morning, and give us an opportunity to ascertain when the debate can be finished with reference to what we on this side of the Chamber have to say, and not with any desire to misspend time; and I have said that if then, having this notice from Senators in the majority, we could not agree on a time, they might resort to their power as a majority in the Senate and accomplish what they desire to accomplish, and we should not complain. We know what the rights of a majority are; we know what the powers of a majority are, but we know quite as well that the minority has rights, and that the minority has a certain degree of power, and we can exert it if Senators drive us to it. I hope, however, that a better spirit and a better feeling will prevail. I do not believe that the great bulk of the majority entertain the harsh sentiments—I must call them so—which seem to be entertained by the Senator from Georgia; and, that yet we may have some conciliation on this matter. What we ask seems to us to be reasonable. I hope Senators will accede to it after the assurance we give them, as honorable men, that we do not mean to talk here or to make motions for the purpose of expending the time of the Senate uselessly. When we say that to them we have a right to expect that they will believe us, and act upon it understandingly with reference to what we do say; but if we are to be met in this manner by gentlemen on the other side saying, "we are the majority: we have decided to do a certain thing, and we mean to crush you;" then it only remains to be seen whether they can do it; or, at any rate, how long it will take to do it.

MR. GREEN. The motion now, I believe, is to postpone. I do not appreciate the spirit in which the Senator from Maine has spoken to me and to the Senate, for this very plain and palpable reason: if I have seen any disposition to coerce and press this question without a fair opportunity for debate, I cannot name when it occurred. He says it occurred to-day for the first time. The question has been long pending. It has been fully considered. More time has been allowed for its consideration than was allowed for the Kansas-Nebraska bill, when the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] came in and said you shall have three days and no more. Now, because we desire to come to some fair and honorable understanding, we are charged with undertaking to coerce this measure. Minorities have rights; majorities have responsibilities. The people and the States of the Union have a right to hold a majority responsible for the action of the Senate. The minority have rights, but they have no responsibility. They cannot be held responsible before the country except so far as by a factious course they interfere with the majority. [Laughter.] Let gentlemen laugh. I have heard of the devil laughing at the destruction of his own victims. Let them laugh. I say the minority is not responsible before this country. The majority are. Minorities have rights of discussion, of voting; and majorities have no right to destroy these rights of the minority, but in a conflict of opinion between the majority and the minority, who are to give way? If they cannot agree to compromise and come to terms, who are to give way? The majority?

MR. SEWARD. Yes, if wrong.

MR. GREEN. Who ought to decide the question of wrong? The majority or the minority? Answer, popular sovereignty, what do you say? Sir, the majority must take the responsibility, and stand before the country with that responsibility in their hands, conscious that they will be held up to public gaze for the manner in which they exercise it. We intend to do it; we are resolved to do it. The peace of the country, the good of the Union, the good of the North, the good of the South, of the East, and of the West, all combined, require us to take that responsibility, and exercise it as we believe to be right; and hence we are opposed to postponement. We want no delay.

Mr. HALE, Mr. SEWARD, and Mr. WILSON, rose.

Mr. GREEN. I am not through. I should like to give way, but three States jumping up at once rather discomposes me. Maine has been heard. New Hampshire, New York, and Massachusetts, are ready to be heard. All I desire to say is, that a postponement of this question does more harm than good. It subverts no public good; it advances no public benefit; it does not tend to the public understanding of this question. It is as well understood to-night as it will be when the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from New York, and the Senator from Massachusetts, shall have spoken. They have all spoken once. If there is to be no limit to debate, there can be no decision of any question whatever. When shall we say that decision shall take place, that termination of debate be had? The public responsibility hanging over the heads of a majority is a corrective for their position, if they fail to exercise their power. Their responsibility to the country is enough to stimulate them to do their duty; and hence I must say it is their duty, even if the minority think it to be harsh, to demand an expression of the opinion of the Senate on this question. It has been debated; it has been discussed; it has been investigated; and even to-night we have consumed more than two hours on immaterial matters, which time could have been very properly appropriated to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] in the delivery of his legal argument to spread before the country, rather than thus consume time upon these immaterial points.

Are we responsible, am I responsible, is any other one man responsible, for this consumption of time?

Mr. WADE. You talk more than anybody else.

Mr. GREEN. If I had ever made as long a song as the Senator from Ohio, about Moses in his exit from the land of the Egyptians to Canaan, I hope I should be held responsible for the consumption of time; but I trust I have never done it. My object has been to talk to the question pending before the Senate; and every argument I have made, every point I have presented—as he will admit, if he admits the truth—was pertinent to the question pending; and what I am now saying is as to the propriety of a postponement of the subject now under consideration. Now, sir, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] suggests to me, let them talk; let them vote.

Mr. WILSON. When the Senator from Missouri made his report on the 18th day of February, he pledged himself to the Senate and the country that Senators should have a fair opportunity for the full and free discussion of this question. The records of the Senate bear evidence that he, as the organ of the committee reporting this bill, gave that pledge to this body and to every member of the body. On the 1st day of March, upon his own motion, under his own lead, the Senate entered upon the discussion of the bill now before us. Two weeks ago the debate commenced. Eight members have spoken in support of the bill. When the Senator from New Hampshire shall have closed his speech, eight members will have spoken against the bill. Here are sixteen members of the Senate who have addressed the body upon this question. I take it that each member who has not spoken has as clear a right to speak as the Senator from Missouri or any of those gentlemen who have spoken, and who now stand before the Senate and the country to compel us to speak now or abandon our rights, thus violating the pledges they have given.

Senators know that this is a question which interests every man, woman, and child in the Republic. No such domestic question has been presented to the Senate of the United States during this century. It is not only of itself one of transcendent magnitude and importance, in which the people are deeply interested, but it towers above all other questions. In it are involved matters concerning fraud, violence, and outrage of unparalleled atrocity, that have been perpetrated in one of the Territories of this Union. I say that this is the most important domestic question that has been presented to the Senate during this century. I take it that nearly every Senator desires to express his views upon it; and he has a right to express his views and to express them in proper hours.

We had from the Senator from Missouri, as the organ of the committee, the pledge which I have stated. During the week before last, the Senate engaged in the discussion of the question four days. It has been the practice of the body, since the Christmas holidays, until last week, to adjourn from Thursday to Monday. Last Thursday week, that motion was made and prevailed, and Senators may claim that two days were lost by that vote. Last week we met day after day, steadily, and for five or six hours each day the time of the Senate was occupied in the discussion of this question. On Saturday last, about four and a half o'clock—

Mr. GREEN. Three and a half o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. Well, sir, at half past three o'clock on Saturday, on the request of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who has recently been confined to a sick bed for days, the bill was postponed until to-day, to allow him time to finish his speech. That speech has been finished. I know that fourteen members of the Senate opposed to this Lecompton fraud and this Lecompton swindle, desire to express their views upon the question. I understand that some four or five Senators on the other side intend to speak in support of the measure. Be that as it may, I think those gentlemen who had the pledge of the Senator from Missouri, to which I have already adverted, have a right to express their opinions within proper time and at proper hours. I believe that by meeting daily at twelve o'clock and sitting until six or seven, this question can be settled during the present week; I have not a doubt of it; at furthest, it can be settled a week from this day. Some amendments will be offered to the bill, and they may occasion a brief debate; but if the Senators who claim to have all the responsibilities and all the duties will adjourn, we will consult together to-morrow, and will tell them what we desire. If it be reasonable, they ought to grant it. If it be unreasonable, they ought to reject it.

Mr. KENNEDY. I rise merely to ask a question. Will the gentlemen on the other side agree to the settlement of the whole matter on any day this week?

Mr. WILSON. What we have asked is—

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not inquire what you have asked, but will you do it?

Mr. WILSON. We will settle it to-morrow morning.

Mr. GREEN. What will you do?

Mr. WILSON. We will settle that point to-morrow, and give you an answer in good faith.

Mr. GREEN. We must have an answer to-night, or sit it out.

Mr. WILSON. I tell you there is no disposition here to be factious. Everybody knows that this is a question on which there is a deep feeling in the Senate and the country.

Mr. KENNEDY. What am I to understand as the answer of the gentleman?

Mr. WILSON. I cannot answer certainly what we shall do. All we ask is, that we shall have an opportunity to meet and consult to-morrow.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Do you believe your friends will fix some day this week?

Mr. WILSON. I am asked by the Senator from Louisiana to say what I believe about it? Well, sir, I believe that, by sitting here five or six hours a day, Senators who desire to be heard can all express their views, and the question can be settled this week, or at any rate I think it can be settled within a week from this day. That is my opinion.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator will permit me, I will state the question I intended to put to him. The Democratic party announced last week that it desired to take the final vote on this bill to-night. In the course of to-day, it was suggested by gentlemen on the other side that they had not had a full and fair opportunity for debate; and, as I understand, a suggestion was made to them to name a time which would be sufficient to give them an opportunity of expressing their views on the question, but they have uniformly declined to suggest any time. I understand further, that the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House have suggested to them, that if they would appoint any day this week, and any hour of any day this week, at which the vote was finally to be taken, they might have their adjournments and their recesses, and arrange the business to suit themselves; but we cannot get it said by anybody that even that will be done. I now repeat that I understand the Democratic party would be entirely willing, if the gentlemen of the Opposition would say, "let us consult to-morrow morning what we will do; we expect to accept your proposition; but if we do not, we shall have no further complaint to make; we think if you will give us an opportunity of consulting together in the morning, we shall consent to take the vote this week"—the Democratic party will agree to do it.

Mr. KING. We cannot say so.

Mr. FESSENDEN (to Mr. BENJAMIN.) If not, you can push it through.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If not, there will be a continuous night session until the vote can be taken.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is what I said.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to say a word in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Louisiana. I think he charges us on this side of the Senate—I speak of my own political friends—unjustly in saying that we have failed to indicate any time when we thought the vote could be taken on this question.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Any time this week, I said.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, any time this week. I desire to say that I had an interview with Senators on the other side of the Chamber—the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] was one of them—in the ante-room, and that Senator made the suggestion to me, and my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER] that the debate should be closed this week, and the vote taken one week from this day; and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] was also present. I told them very frankly that I had no authority to conclude any arrangement for any persons; but this I would do: if they on their part would make an effort upon that side of the Chamber to allow the debate to proceed in its regular order during this week, I would interest myself with my friends upon this side of the Chamber to get them to agree to it. I came here and I found a general disposition on this side to accede to these terms; but we had no man who could speak authoritatively. It was instantly suggested that we should meet and confer with each other to-morrow morning. Immediately following came the word from the other side of the Chamber that it was to be a question of physical endurance here.

Now, I am willing to carry out in good faith the suggestions that I made on that occasion; and I think the reason which I gave why the vote should not be taken on Saturday was a very good and a very satisfactory one. After the legitimate debate shall have closed, every one knows there will be amendments offered. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] has already offered an amendment; and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] has indicated amendments which he will propose. There is always on a question of this importance, after the general discussion is closed, a discursive debate, which would undoubtedly run into Monday night if we agreed to take the vote on Monday. With that knowledge before us, and knowing the history of all our legislation, I thought Saturday night an inappropriate time on which to agree to take the vote—much less appropriate than Monday. I did not see that one day made much difference; I do not see it now; and I think I gave a very good reason for fixing upon Monday, instead of Saturday, for taking the vote.

I have no authority to speak for anybody on this side of the Chamber; but I think I can say that if the majority are disposed to give us the opportunity, we will come together to-morrow morning and confer with each other, and then we will tell them what, in our opinion, under all the circumstances, we ought to do, and then, if our terms be not satisfactory, or if they do not come up to the propositions that have been submitted, if it becomes a question of physical endurance, so be it. I insist that we, on this side of the Chamber, are not to be charged with refusing any terms, while I stand here affirming that I am ready, so far as I may be able, to carry out the suggestion which my friend from Mississippi made to me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I distinctly proposed to the Senator from Missouri, as he will remember—and I said I was sure my friends on this side of the Chamber would agree to my proposition, for I had some concert with them—that if the Senate would adjourn until to-morrow morning after my friend from New Hampshire should have closed his speech, without attempting to coerce us, without forcing us to make an agreement to-night when we had no opportunity to consult with each other, we would meet to-morrow morning; and, if we should then fail to come to such terms as would be satisfactory to Senators on the other side, we should have no complaints to make if they reduced it to a contest of physical endurance, and endeavored to push the bill through at the next sitting. We have said that this evening such an attempt was not fair, not right; for the reason that we had not sufficient notice given to us so as to have a consultation with our friends to prepare our line of action. We told them that it came upon us by surprise late in the afternoon. If you had given us notice this morning that this was your intention, so that we could have had a meeting and consulted on the subject, we should have been able to give an answer; but that being impossible to-night, all we have demanded was to be allowed an opportunity for consultation in the morning; and then, if we failed to agree upon terms, it would be a fair contest, and we should have no complaints to make if the majority should exercise its rights and powers; but we did complain that this contest was sprung upon us at the hour of the day it was. I now understand from the Senator from Louisiana that our idea is one that he does not seem to think is very unreasonable.

Mr. SEWARD. I am not going, Mr. President, to-night, to undertake to make an agreement for my associates on this side of the Chamber, and I am not going to consent that they shall make an agreement for me. I take that stand upon this ground, that it is confessed and avowed that the party which supposes itself to be in the majority in the Senate has had a consultation, a deliberation to-day before we met, and determined upon its course, and that by degrees as the debate proceeds in this Chamber it is disclosed partially and problematically and suppositiously that the question is to be taken to-night, unless the minority without an opportunity for consultation other than can be afforded here in the Chamber, will agree upon a day when the vote shall be taken.

Now, sir, I should be perfectly willing to fix a day when the question is to be taken, if I could; I am perfectly willing to consult on that subject; I should be perfectly willing to undertake to fix a day, if there was an opportunity for such consultation as I know to be necessary on the part of those with whom I am associated here, to determine and give an honest, direct, manly answer to the proposition. I know that is impossible now; it has been all day, for as you see, taken by surprise, a portion of our members are absent.

Mr. DIXON. A large portion.

Mr. SEWARD. A very considerable portion of our members are absent: some are away from the city; others are absent from the Chamber on account of sickness. There is no possibility of our answering the proposition made to us to-night, unless a minority of our own party shall undertake to determine the course of action by which we shall be bound when the others come in. In regard to those who are here and those who are absent, it is a matter of calculation how many gentlemen wish to be heard, and how long those gentlemen will desire to speak; how much time they will occupy in delivering their views; and from the aggregate of that time must be deducted the time which may be reasonably allowed for the answers which may be given on the other side of the Chamber to our arguments. Every suggestion that has been made I have met directly and distinctly by saying that I was unprepared; that I could not be prepared; that, sitting here and watching to take care lest the main question itself might be taken if I were absent for a moment from the Chamber for consultation, it is impossible for me to ascertain who wish to speak, and how long a time they will occupy, so as to arrive at the grounds on which an answer might be given to the proposition made to us. We are entitled to that consultation.

Mr. President, I am not proposing to make any threat. I shall never make any in the Senate Chamber. I can promise for one—and I think my whole course of action since I have been in the Senate will justify what I say—that I not only shall not of myself institute any factious opposition to the transaction of the public business, but that it is not in the power of men or of associations to draw me into any. I will not be drawn into any such opposition. I can say also, upon a very thorough acquaintance with my associates, that I do not know, I do not believe, I have not the least reason for believing, that there is any member of the Senate on the part of the supposed minority who would be content to occupy, even on this great question, one moment of time more than was necessary to deliver himself of the views which he entertains, according to the sense of responsibility he confesses, for the instruction of the Senate, and for the information of the country, and his own justification to his constituents, acting in good faith. You may go on with the crushing process, but it will come to that at last, that every member will perform that duty, and he will do no more—he will do no less. You may reverse the screw and suspend the crushing process, and you will arrive at the same result, and I think in the same time.

Now, sir, this crushing process has no terrors for me; I am used to it. I have been here eight years; this is the ninth year of my service in this body; and I have been crushed continually; but notwithstanding all that I find that the party or the interest that has been crushed out here has grown larger and larger just in proportion as madness has directed the force and pressure of the screw; and that on the other hand the screw has grown weaker and weaker. If I wanted perverseness to be gratified with a speedy punishment, I should invite gentlemen to go on with this oppression and force a conclusion under the circumstances of this case, for I hold it to be most unreasonable as well as most unwise. This debate involves the admission of a State into this Union, or the rejection of an application for admission. Such a question, if you except the question raised under the Topeka constitution, has not been here since the year 1850. At that time, the admission of the State of California, together with the organization to be provided for the government of the Territories of Utah and New Mexico, came before the country and the Senate under circumstances not dissimilar. Then, sir, wise men, strong men, great men, were here, and they undertook to bring into the Union the State of California with conditions, which, in their judgment, the interests of the country under the circumstances required. A desultory debate on that great question began on the first day of the session, which was, I think, the 1st day of December, 1849; and every Senator was promised by the great leader in that movement, and the promise was faithfully kept, that he should be heard on that question, and when all were heard the vote should be taken; and the bill for the admission of the State of California passed the Senate on the 13th day of August, 1850. This debate began on the 1st day of March, and not before—just fifteen days ago; and of those fifteen days there have been two Sundays, thus reducing the number to thirteen; and there have been two week days when the Senate was not in session, and for the failure of the Senate to sit during those two days the majority of the Senate is responsible according to the confessions of the leader of the majority.

Thus it appears that eleven days have been allowed to this debate when there are twenty Senators, all of whom desire to be heard in opposition; twenty Senators opposed to the measure, bound by their consciences, bound by their responsibility to their constituents, bound by the expectations of those constituents to protest against it and to assign their reasons for opposition. Eleven days is entirely too short for such a debate, if you allowed the whole of that period to the Opposition; and yet of those eleven days more than one half,

I think, has been occupied by the majority in delivering their opinions.

Mr. GREEN. Less than one third.

Mr. SEWARD. One third is enough for my present purpose; I will not dispute about fractions. I remember a case that happened in the House of Representatives, which admonishes me always not to stand upon fractions. My old friend Gideon Lee, who is now gone, was an eminently useful man, and a very useful and efficient member of the House of Representatives. When the great fire occurred in the city of New York, which burnt up a large portion of the city, the merchants sent on an application to Congress to remit the duties upon the goods which were destroyed by the fire. The memorial was a very eloquent one, but it was thought best to have it enforced by the eloquence of the most commanding and influential member in the House at that time, who was understood to be a celebrated orator from the State of Vermont, Mr. Horace Everett. Mr. Everett, after preparing his speech on that occasion, and being ready, entered the House. Mr. Lee, being a leading member of the New York delegation, sat beside him. Mr. Everett opened the debate on the presentation of the memorial in a very effective manner. He said that the sun of yesterday morning looked upon a great and prosperous city; the sun of this morning looked down upon the same city, and disclosed fifty acres of it covered with ruins. My excellent friend, Mr. Lee, rose and begged leave to correct the honorable member: it was fifty-three acres and a half. [Laughter.]

I will not dispute about fractions of time upon such a question as this; but, sir, I wish to correct the idea that this debate began in the month of December, or could have been begun in December. The question is, whether Kansas shall be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution? No man pretends, or did pretend, that the Lecompton constitution ought to be, or could be, submitted to Congress, until it was here, or that it could be here until it was brought here, and that could not be until after an election held on the 21st day of December, in the Territory of Kansas. For aught we knew, the constitution might be rejected in the election which the convention itself had appointed. We did not know, but that the people might determine not to have it with slavery, or without slavery, or either way. What the constitution was, was not known. The President forestalled our action by recommending to us that we could settle this great disturbance in the country by waiving the objections which would exist when the question should come before us. Then, after the election was held on the 21st of December, every one knows that it was fourteen days before intelligence of the result of that election reached here, or before this constitution could get here; and then it was delayed because the Legislature of the Territory had appointed another election to be held on the 4th day of January, in which the question whether the Lecompton constitution should be adopted or rejected was submitted to the people of Kansas; and the president of the convention, who was to report whether this constitution was accepted or rejected at the previous election, remained in the Territory with the constitution until after the election on the 4th day of January was held; and so it required fourteen days more for intelligence to reach us here of the result of that election, and for the constitution to be received here by the President of the United States, and to be transmitted to the Senate.

Were we, then, to debate that hypothetical question; and, if so, under what state of facts? If so, why was not the subject referred to the Committee on Territories in the beginning of December; and why did the Senate wait and suspend all official action upon it until the constitution was received here, and then refer it to the Committee on Territories? Was the reference a mere mockery, or did the Senate mean that its committee should examine the subject, and recommend a bill for the consideration of the Senate? The Senate acted in good faith, and the committee acted in good faith. I do not know on what day the bill was introduced; but the question was not before the Senate, so that it was proper, so that it was in order to debate the subject, or so that a practical legislator would debate it unless he had special reasons for departing from his customary course of action, until the bill was here. When the bill was brought into the Senate, the gentleman who presented it from the committee named a day, the 1st of March, when he would ask the Senate to take up the bill, and consider it, and continue to consider it from day to day, until every member of the Senate having a desire to be heard on the subject, and acting in good faith, should be heard; and then, without surprise, the question should be taken. So the debate began on the 1st day of March, and it has gone on until to-day, when, for some unexplained reason—I think unexplained—the majority of the committee, or, as gentlemen imply, a majority of the Senate, are inclined to bring this question to a vote now. Well, sir, I am to assign the reasons why I think it is not best to come to a vote now.

There are a large portion of the Senators who have not been heard, and who are entitled to be heard, and who desire to be heard, and who, therefore, ought to be heard on the subject. Then the question recurs, why shall they not be heard to-night. The answer is, that our entire experience shows that it is impossible for Senators to deliver themselves during the night, after the fatigues of the day, devoted to the public business in such a manner as to discharge their duty satisfactorily to themselves and to their constituents, and usefully to the country. That, however, is not the only reason. It is but to substitute the form and the mockery of a debate for an actual debate when you say that Senators shall speak under such circumstances as these; for the moment a Senator rises to address the House under such circumstances, all the chairs are vacant; the Senators are not here to hear. They are here to wait without hearing, until the empty form of a debate has been gone through, by addresses to empty seats, and then they can take the question. It is, therefore, unreasonable.

I should not have dwelt on this subject at so much length, had it not been that a purpose or expectation seemed to be manifested on the part of the majority to submit a case to the country on this question. I have, therefore, shown the reasons why I shall vote for the postponement of this bill until to-morrow; and I close with giving my assurance, as far as I can do so in the absence of any consultation, that the subject shall be taken into consultation to-morrow, when the debate can be closed, and then an honest, direct answer shall be given in good faith, by which I suppose all parties making it will be willing to be bound; but for myself I do not require it, I do not need it, and it is left to the judgment of the Senate. If it come to a question of physical endurance, I shall not shrink from enduring.

Mr. POLK. Why not let the gentleman from New Hampshire close to-night?

Mr. SEWARD. Let him close when he can get the floor.

Mr. BROWN. An hour ago I had some hope that, by a prudent and proper suggestion, we could come to an understanding of this question, and get along with this business without wearying and fatiguing ourselves, by sitting here all night. All must see that this is an exceedingly senseless proceeding. It results in no good. We weary ourselves and do no benefit to the country. I confess that the remarks of the Senator from New York have somewhat shaken my confidence in our ability to come to a proper understanding, because his mind seems to be in doubt as to what his party friends will agree to. When I heard the two Senators from Maine, their views accorded with my own as to what has been the proposition submitted on the other side. I will restate it, and those Senators shall testify as to whether I am right or not; because if I am right, I mean to give my commendation to the proposition. I understood them to say that on to-morrow morning they would have a full consultation of their friends, and determine that they would take the vote on Monday next; or, if that could not be agreed upon, they would then notify us, the majority, on the meeting of the Senate to-morrow, that they did not agree to it; and that we might after that either sit it out or not as pleased us, and that they would make no opposition so far as calling for the yeas and nays, and resorting to technical motions under the rules of the Senate to avoid the progress of business was concerned; in other words, that they would meet the question squarely, and go on with the debate; and that, when physical endurance had given out, they would take the vote without resorting to work of this character. That is as I understood them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the Senator give way to me for a moment?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from Mississippi will bear in mind the important fact that, while we represent one party, there are, so to speak, two other parties to be consulted. There is the American party—the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] the Senator from Texas, [Mr. HOUSTON,] and I include also the Senator from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] in the call of the roll of Americans.

Mr. BROWN. Never mind them. So far as the Senator from Texas is concerned, you need not give yourself any trouble.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is also another party, and an important party, to this question, in the Senate; and that consists of those who have acted hitherto with the Democratic party, but on this question do not act with them—the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. BRODERICK,] and certainly, before we could mention a time definitely it would be necessary that we should have a little time to consult with those gentlemen on this question. As they oppose the measure, perhaps we should expect to consult with them as well as with our friends, for we do not know how much time they may desire to occupy in this debate. We have no desire to postpone this question factiously, but to give a fair opportunity for the discussion of the question; and on consultation, as we can have the consultation doubtless to-morrow, we can give an answer which will probably be satisfactory.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator hear me a moment? I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I want to have this matter disposed of as much as anybody, and I accede to the proposition that has been stated by the Senator from Mississippi as made to the Senators from Maine, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BROWN. You cannot.

Mr. HALE. I can and will. But I wish to suggest to my honorable friend from Wisconsin that I have no doubt ultimately—ultimately, I say—we shall have to take care of the American party and these seceding Democrats; but we have not yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENNEDY. I cannot consent for one moment that the gentleman shall ever take care of the American party.

Mr. HALE. I know that the Senator will not consent, and the time has not come for it yet; but I say it will be so ultimately, because we have been told here, I have been told a hundred times, that the country would not stand more than two parties. I see in my eye now a very honorable Senator, [Mr. BRIGHT,] who sometimes has been taken for me, he looks so much like me, [Laughter,] who suggested that I did not belong to a party having a sufficiently healthy organization to be put on the tail end of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. He said there could be but two parties in the country, and at the time to which I allude, I did not belong to a healthy organization. [Laughter.] I do not pretend to say we are in a situation now to take care of these seceders, but ultimately we shall have to do it, and we shall deal liberally by them all. Now, however, we can only speak for ourselves. I think it is injudicious in my friend from Wisconsin, if he will allow me to say so, to undertake at this stage to make this provision for them, but we can only speak for ourselves; and I will say, for one, that I agree to everything the Senator from Mississippi says.

Mr. BROWN. I did not understand that any one here was stipulating or proposing terms which were to be absolutely binding, but that the other side proposed to hold a meeting to-morrow, or, in some way suitable to themselves, to ascertain what could be done, what they would agree to do.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will my friend from Mississippi yield to me for an instant?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENNEDY. I merely wish to make a remark for my party. The American party do not mean to be factious in regard to the decision of this matter. They have no particular views to press upon the Senate, and they are prepared—I am at liberty to say so for them—to vote to-night, to-morrow, or any day when it may be the pleasure of the Senate to take the vote. The American party do not want time on this question. We have been worn out with it already. The interests of the country are suffering.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. KENNEDY. No, sir; I cannot. The Senator from Mississippi yielded the floor to me, and I cannot yield it to anybody else. I only say the American party does not ask time in order to be ready for the vote on this bill. We are prepared to vote now.

Mr. BROWN. If Senators will allow me to conclude I shall say in a very few words what I designed to say in the beginning. First let me recapitulate; for what I said at the outset has already, perhaps, escaped the recollection of gentlemen. I understood the two Senators from Maine to state a proposition which had, to a great extent, the approbation of my own mind; and that was, that the opposition to this bill, whether you call it the Republican party, or the Republican party with its allies, some Americans, and some Democrats—I mean all opposed to this bill—should have a consultation, and conclude that they could take the vote on Monday next, or that they could not, and if they could not, they would notify us to-morrow morning, and that being so notified we could then proceed to-morrow to make this a question of physical endurance, if we chose to do so; and that on their part, if the proposition to take the vote on Monday next failed, they would not, so far as they as gentlemen are concerned, resort to technicalities, calling the yeas and nays upon motions to adjourn, and to postpone, and so on, so as to delay the taking the question; but that, so far as they as gentlemen are concerned, they could come here to-morrow with an honest purpose either to take the vote before we adjourn, or prepared to give a party pledge that it should be taken on Monday. So I understood the two honorable Senators from Maine; so I have understood other Senators on that side.

We on our side have proposed to do—what? To take the vote at any time during this week. I think our friends have been prepared all the time to say that, while we want the vote to-day, and would greatly prefer to have it on Thursday at the latest, still we are willing to concede as far as Saturday. Then the extreme of the two propositions, as I understand them, is between taking the vote on Saturday and taking it on Monday; our extreme proposition, up to this time, being a vote on Saturday, and yours being on Monday. I submit that, upon such a difference, it is hardly necessary for Senators to be wearying themselves here in the witching hours of morning, and wholly unpreparing themselves for to-morrow's business. I believe honorable gentlemen will do what they say they will do. The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] and myself differ in politics; but never, within my knowledge, has he sacrificed his word; and, in my opinion, he never will. His colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] has never deceived me, so far as his personal honor is concerned; and I am not prepared to say that he ever will. Other Senators on that side—I may name the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER]—have given a like pledge. I believe that they will come here to-morrow to redeem the pledge—the pledge that we shall either have the vote on Monday, or be notified by them to-morrow morning that it becomes a question of physical endurance; and for this night's delay certain members of the party pledging themselves that they will unite in no factious opposition, but let the debate go straight on—if we want to speak, let our side speak; if they want to speak, let their side speak; but refusing to coöperate in any proposition to postpone the vote factiously. I think the proposition a fair one. I am not authorized to make any proposition or any motion here; but no caucus resolution, no obligations to party, can prevent me from saying what I believe, in a case like this, ought to be done. I think my party ought to accept this proposition.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator thinks so, I will move to adjourn, as I am under no such obligations. If he says he is satisfied, I will make the motion.

Mr. BROWN. I do not ask the Senator to make any such motion; nor will I yield for that purpose.

Mr. PUGH. I thought the Senator appealed to some gentleman who was free to make the motion, to make it.

Mr. BROWN. I am speaking simply for myself. If there is anything like a tolerable understanding—

Mr. GREEN. There is none.

Mr. BROWN. I think there is. I differ with Senators. When honorable gentlemen come and say they have consulted with their friends, and that there is a partial agreement to such an extent that it can be carried out, and will be carried out among honorable men, I am confident they will do it. The Senator from New York, I confess, in the outset of his speech, did a little shake my confidence, because I know his potent influence with his party friends—an influence to which he is fairly and justly entitled. His talents, experience, and seniority here, entitle him to weight and influence with his party; and I know he has it. He said he could enter into no agreements which could bind his friends, and that his friends could enter into no agreements which could bind him. Those were potential words, coming from that source. My friend from Michigan [Mr. STUART] suggests that he said he could not do it to-night.

Mr. SEWARD. That is it. I said that to-night I could not make arrangement to bind others, nor others to bind me.

Mr. BROWN. I do not understand any of the Senators on the other side to enter into any positive agreement by which they are to be bound to take the vote on Monday, but that to-morrow morning they will either give us notice that they will do it or not, ["That is it,"] that having had a fair consultation among themselves they will give us notice what they are going to do.

Mr. GREEN. That will not do.

Mr. BROWN. My party friends some of them say they will not stand this. I am not going to submit any motion. I simply say that I think the proposition is a fair one, and it ought to be accepted. It commends itself to my judgment.

Mr. GREEN. Who made it?

Mr. BROWN. Senators on the other side; as honorable men, my friend, as you and I. They differ with us in political sentiment, but I am not to assume that they would violate their plighted faith as men of honor given in the presence of the Senate, and to the world. I do not believe it, and I will not believe it, until the thing has been done.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator from Mississippi will give way, I will answer the question of the Senator from Missouri as to who said so. I said it for myself two hours ago.

Mr. GREEN. Who speaks for the party?

Mr. CAMERON. I said then, as now, that I for one would in good faith go into consultation with our friends to-morrow; we would debate the question, decide, and bring in a fair answer; we would either agree to fix a day when we should bring the debate to a close, or else tell the other side that we could not do so; and after that we should be governed by what the majority thought proper.

Mr. BROWN. I have said about all I care to say. I simply declare to the Senate and to my party friends, that this proposition seems to me to be fair, and it ought to be accepted. I submit no motion, however, because I am not authorized to do it.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I believe that words threatening to crush us out were used in the Senate to-night; and, so far as I am concerned, all hope of reconciliation with me is gone until these words are withdrawn. I can sit here and be outvoted, but I cannot be conquered or crushed out. I stand here the representative of a sovereign State of this Union; and I would sooner die in my seat than that either my constituents or myself should be humiliated in this way. What! talk here, in the Senate of the United States, of crushing out Senators! In this place, where men meet as peers, the representatives of the sovereignty of States, to decide upon the most transcendently important question that has ever come before the American people, thinking honestly that it is their duty to argue the question in this high forum, they are driven into the night, and finally told they are to be crushed beneath the heel of this majority! Sir, I will die in the Senate Chamber before I will make any compromises with men under such circumstances. It is true, my health is not good, but I cannot be brought to compromise a question of this kind. I tell the Senator from Georgia, you cannot crush me out; you cannot conquer me. You may bring a majority here to outvote me, and you may do it under the rules of the Senate, in the best way you can; but, so help me God, I will neither compromise nor be crushed. This is what I have to say.

Mr. STUART. I wish to say a word or two, not because I think I have been hit at, in any allusions to faction—not at all; but I desire at the proper time, with the leave of the Senate, to review some of the reasons which have been given in favor of this measure, to show wherein I think they are without foundation. That I intend to do; but so far as the present question is concerned, I desire to say to gentlemen, in consequence of what has been remarked by the Senator from Wisconsin, that in any consideration which may grow out of an attempt at an arrangement, (in regard to which, by-the-by, I think the Senator from Mississippi is eminently correct,) they need make no count of me. Let Senators on the other side of the Chamber consult among themselves, as they are the faction that it seems are to be crushed out, or something else done with them. They need not count me at all in the arrangement. I have very great respect for all those gentlemen, not only for their good intentions, but for their ability; and I believe they will consider the subject in the spirit of faith and fairness that they say they will.

Now, sir, I wish to say a single word to the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] In a flow of his unbounded generosity, he said that ultimately—that is a great while, sir—he expected to take care of the honorable Senator from Illinois, my honorable friend from California, and myself. I merely desire to say to him, through the Chair, that when I desire him to do that—that is, when I find myself unable to take care of myself [laughter]—when that time arrives, I know of no gentleman under the pale of whose mighty influence and ability I would sooner seek shelter than the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to say a word in response to the Senator from Mississippi, in vindication of myself. I did state a proposition as he states it; and I am now willing to restate it. It was this: if the Senate choose to adjourn, (although this is a much later hour than that at which the proposition was made,) and give us an opportunity for consultation in the morning, I was willing to consent that, if we could not agree to take the question finally on Monday, I would then notify Senators of that fact; and we should have no complaints to make of them if they insisted upon sitting until the question were disposed of. The Senator inferred, from my saying that I should have no complaints to make, that I would not resort to motions to adjourn, and motions to postpone, and other motions, in order to protract time. I so understood it; that was my intention. I said it, deeming myself authorized to say it by several of my political friends in the Senate. They agreed with me in that course. So far as I am concerned, that being my understanding, I assure gentlemen that if they come to that conclusion, and if we do not agree to take the vote finally on Monday, and so notify them, they shall have no motions to adjourn—I mean mere dilatory motions, factious motions, to adjourn, &c., from me; nor shall my vote be given in support of any such factious movements.

Mr. PUGH. How many more will say that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Ohio

need not ask how many more will say that. If the gentlemen who act with me on this side of the Senate, when they hear me say that that is my understanding, and that for myself I will not be a party to any such thing, do not rise in their places, and say that they disagree with me, I hold, in the ordinary course of proceeding, that they accede to the promise which I have thus publicly offered.

Mr. BROWN. Among gentlemen I so understand it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was my understanding. I need not repeat it. It was stated correctly by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MASON. If I understand the honorable Senator from Maine correctly, his suggestion is, that if the Senate now adjourns, those with whom he acts politically will confer together to-morrow; and that they will not propose to put off the vote on this question later than Monday; and if they find they cannot agree on that, they will so inform us, and leave us to take our own course.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is it exactly.

Mr. MASON. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GREEN. It would be better to postpone the subject until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow before adjourning.

Mr. WILSON. That is the pending motion now.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MASON. I withdraw the motion to adjourn; and move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow morning at half past twelve o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the motion now pending.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have already been ordered.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not wish to be placed in any wrong position here. I want to understand others, and I want them to understand me; and then there will be no disagreement. I said, and I repeat, that I will use my individual efforts to produce the assent of my friends on this side of the Chamber to agree to take this question on Monday next. Give us time to consult; and, when we come together, and learn how many there are who desire to address the Senate, we can tell when the debate will end. My impression is, that we shall fix not later than Monday; but, if we fail to meet that proposition, and to-morrow you undertake to drive us to a vote, I do not mean as a Senator to yield up my constitutional rights here, or rights which I am entitled to by parliamentary laws. I do not wish to be misunderstood.

Mr. PUGH. Then we might as well sit it out to-night.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should not have considered it necessary to say a word, but for a remark which fell from the honorable Senator from Maine. I do not mean to consider myself committed by the remarks of any Senator made upon this floor, unless I state that I concur in them. I shall not yield my assent to them; and when my associates and those with whom I act think proper to state their views and what they will do, it might be understood that those who do not rise to disclaim them are committed by them. I have already said that I did not believe there would be any factious opposition, or any disposition to delay this question unnecessarily; but I would much prefer, I must confess, to see gentlemen acting upon their individual responsibility and honor as to their course in the Senate, rather than to go into arrangements either of their own political friends or to be driven by their political opponents to make their speeches in any given time. I think the assurance given by the individual members of the Senate upon this side of the Chamber ought to have been satisfactory to the other side, for nearly every Senator here has expressed his opinion for himself, and stated for himself, that, so far as he was concerned, he was not disposed, nor would he unnecessarily delay this matter, unless the attempt was made to coerce him unreasonably. I should not have said this much but for the remarks of my very honorable friend from Maine, which might leave a wrong impression not only on the present occasion but on others.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Pugh.

SENATE.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to remark, in order that my friend will understand me, that I speak for myself only.

Mr. PUGH. I am very sorry that within the last five minutes the hopes which I had of an adjournment have passed away; but certainly, although I have no doubt the honorable Senator from Maine would be quite as good as his word, he is not authorized to speak for those who ordinarily act with him. Now what does the assurance which has just been given by the Senator from Illinois and various other Senators amount to? It is a general suggestion that they have no disposition to delay unnecessarily; and they couple that with what is claimed by the Senator from Massachusetts and others on this floor, that every Senator has a right to express his opinions upon this bill; to express them, as they say, at reasonable hours, and at his own length. Why, sir, half a dozen Senators have spoken two days on this question. That was their own length and at hours which they chose. There are sixty-two members of this Senate, and according to this extraordinary proposal, every question should be debated one hundred and twenty-four days.

Now, sir, I want to deliver my views on this question, but if the majority in the Senate are ready to act, they have the right to act without hearing me. I do not understand that the Government of the United States keeps a debating society here for gentlemen to make speeches to the country. I understand that it has sent men here to do the legislation of the country; and when those who are responsible for the legislation are ready to act and have the power to act, whether I am one of the majority or one of the minority, that is not one of my rights. My right is to vote. That right cannot be taken from me.

As to this assertion of the right of Senators to speak for two days on every question—to begin at one o'clock on every day, and speak until four or five o'clock, and then adjourn over—why, sir, no business would be done in this Government, no business can be done with such obstructions as these. There is no such right. I claim none for myself, and I am the peer of any Senator on this floor. I represent as much sovereignty as he does; but on any question where I am in the majority or minority, I do not claim it. I disclaim it, to stand here and talk against time, day after day and week after week, in order that my speeches may be taken down by that gentleman, and distributed throughout the country. If gentlemen want to talk, let them talk to their constituents, and at their own expense. I say I do wish to speak on this question; but if I find the majority of the Senate impatient for the question, and ready to vote on the question, I will give up my speech. If I cannot get a chance to make it some other time this session, I will go and make it to the people of the State of Ohio. Therefore it is, that when gentlemen assert that a great outrage is perpetrated on this or on any other question, it only amounts to this: that in making their speeches they are not allowed to select their own days, their own time, and their own length, and to begin from the very foundation of the world on every subject.

Sir, I have had the honor of a seat in this Senate something more than two years, and I have heard speeches made here this session—twice made—that were made five or six times over during the last Congress. I name no gentleman; but I have heard the same speech over and over and over again. I do not know but what I could make it myself from memory. Sir, it is no debating of the question. We cannot have a question of the present condition of the bill for the admission of Kansas brought up but we must have gentlemen go back to the ordinance of 1787, to the Dred Scott case, to the old black-letter English law, and spread out over any number of hours; and if not allowed to do it, then a great outrage is perpetrated.

Now, sir, I said to-night that I wished to give the Senator from New Hampshire, because he was a new member of this body, the utmost limit that has ever been conferred on any Senator within my memory, and I voted to adjourn two or three times, and several times did not vote. But when I saw those who are the minority, endeavoring not to spend the time which was given in debating the question, but in frivolous motions, made professedly for delay, I was determined that my physical strength should give way before I would submit to it. I will submit to the lawful orders of the majority, (and I am one of the minority,) but I will never submit to the orders of a minority in anything, neither lawful nor unlawful; and whenever the attempt is made by mere repetition of motions, or calls for the yeas and nays, I will sit as long as my colleague will sit here before I submit.

Now that gentlemen on this side say there are to be sixteen speeches made, and gentlemen feel under no obligation of honor, under no obligation with reference to the business of the country, under no obligation to the impatience of the great majority of the Senate to vote, to contract their speeches, if those sixteen speeches are to be three hours or four hours long, apiece, I would as lief hear them now as during the next two weeks. But I have confidence in honorable gentlemen, if they will indicate to me any ultimate time—if they say that this vote shall certainly be taken within ten days, or certainly be taken within two weeks, I am satisfied. What limit have we? Sixteen speeches are to be made, says the Senator from Massachusetts. How long are they to be? The Lord only knows. If that be the case, I had as lief sit here to-night, uncomfortable as it is to me, as to adjourn over in this uncertainty. Therefore, I insist that if no other gentleman will make the very honorable and very fair proposition of the Senator from Maine, for which I am infinitely obliged to him individually—if the rest take refuge under the generalities uttered by the Senator from Illinois, that the majority of this body, anxious to press the public business, will find that the word of promise may be kept to the ear, but broken to the hope—I hope that there will be no adjournment unless we come to better terms.

Mr. MASON. I do not know whether the pending motion to postpone this subject until tomorrow at half past twelve o'clock is mine or another gentleman's; but if it is mine, I withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MASON. I thought I proposed the motion.

Mr. WILSON. But a single word in reply to the Senator from Ohio. The Senator speaks with some degree of feeling. Now, Mr. President, I am free to say that if I was in a majority, and sustaining any measure of public policy here with the responsibility that belongs to a majority, I should feel under obligations to press the matter properly along. I have no complaint to make of that; but, as has been stated to-day, over and over again, there is no disposition on the part of the minority in this body to throw any unnecessary obstructions in the way of the majority. I think the Senator from Ohio, and all other Senators, ought to be willing to take the responsibility, as the majority of this body, to adjourn over and postpone this question until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow, and give us of the minority, who never had any consultations at all upon this question, an opportunity to come together as we have proposed to do, and already indicated to each other.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senator why they did not have a consultation? Does he not remember the notice given a week ago by the Senator from Missouri that an attempt would be made to take the vote to-day? Why have you not consulted?

Mr. WILSON. I will tell the Senator from Ohio why we have not consulted. We held conversations with several gentlemen on the other side, leading men upon that side of the Chamber, and we were told it could not be expected that the vote would be taken to-day; but they thought it could be taken this week. Why, sir, I had a conversation with the distinguished Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] on Friday or Saturday last, in which he said he thought we could take the vote this week, but that it would not be taken to-day. I did not dream of such a thing, and I wrote to my colleague that the vote in all human probability could not be taken until the close of the week, and if he got here on Thursday he would be here in time to vote on the question. I wrote to him this morning.

The Senator from Mississippi has expressed himself here, I think, as being satisfied with our position upon this matter. He says that our request to have an opportunity to meet for consultation to-morrow morning, is a reasonable one. Now, sir, I wish to say another thing. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] it is understood, wants to speak upon this question. For days he has been confined to a sick bed. I learn from him that he cannot possibly speak this week; that it is barely probable that he could speak on the last day of the week, but that he undoubtedly could on Monday next. The Senator from Ohio says that if we can close this debate in eight or ten or twelve days—

Mr. HALE. Two weeks.

Mr. WILSON. He says he does not object if we fix some reasonable time. I have no doubt under heaven that we could close it in six days. I am ready to meet at twelve o'clock daily, and go regularly on with the subject until six o'clock in the evening. The Senator wants to know how long the speeches are to be. I have made inquiries of members of the Senate in regard to the speaking. As I said, I find that fourteen members are preparing to speak in opposition to this measure. Some of them are ready to go on now; others will be ready to do so in one or two days. I suppose those speeches will not average two hours apiece. I think some of them will not exceed one hour, or an hour and a quarter, or an hour and a half. I think the majority here ought to have confidence, after the declarations made that there will be and shall be no factious opposition, if we have a fair opportunity; and all I ask is an opportunity to meet to-morrow morning and consult. We will then give a frank and manly answer.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doollittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—23.

So the Senate refused to postpone the consideration of the question.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BROWN called for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doollittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—22.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I had intended to submit some remarks on the motion to postpone this question until to-morrow, and for the purpose of making them, it will be necessary that I should make a motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock. I make that motion, as I desire to submit some remarks upon it.

Mr. GREEN. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. GREEN. I raise the point of order that this motion has just been voted down, and that an adjournment has been voted down, and that no motion has intervened.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to adjourn intervened.

Mr. GREEN. I know it did; but no proceedings intervened.

Mr. POLK. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I will state that I am inclined to think, if the Senator from New Hampshire is allowed to go on to-night and finish his speech, that the Senate is disposed to adjourn and take the chances.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will you pledge your side to do it?

Several SENATORS. No.

Mr. POLK. I think it would be a good opportunity to take the chances of the gentlemen on the other side being able to-morrow to indicate to the Senate what conclusion they have come to if they come to any conclusion, and I believe they will have come to a conclusion. If they shall not have come to a conclusion then, I think we should sit it out, and several of them have said they would not feel it harsh if the majority then compelled them to sit until the vote was taken on this question. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Wisconsin will not now press his motion, but will withdraw it, and let the Senator from New Hampshire finish his speech, and then the session for to-night can be closed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin made a motion and has the floor.

Mr. STUART. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will adopt the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Missouri, and let the Senator from New Hampshire finish his speech and then we can adjourn, and that side of the Chamber can caucus as they propose to do.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With that suggestion, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I may say to Senators, if I had been permitted to have gone along in my argument I should long since have concluded what I had to say; but I find no fault with any Senator on either side of the Chamber. The sort of by-play that has been carried on, if I may be allowed the expression, has given me a little opportunity to rest, though I am somewhat in the situation of the boy who undertook to hoe a garden, and when he stopped work to go to dinner, he left his hoe standing against a wall and somebody stole it; and when he got back he did not know where to begin. I had gone along through a part of my speech, and did not even set up my hoe, and I shall have to begin as best I may, and as near as I may to where I left off.

I want to say one thing to the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] if he is in the Chamber, in regard to the expression that he uttered here in reference to "crushing out" this side of the House. They tell a story in my country about a gentleman, of whom we have all read, that had a cloven foot; that he once undertook to straighten a nigger's hair, and somebody inquired of him how he got along. He said, it was very busy work, though it was not very hard. I think the honorable Senator from Georgia will find his work both busy and hard. It cannot be done. Twenty honorable Senators, or more, as we have, belonging to the Republican party, cannot be crushed out by any legislative force that can be brought against them.

I do not know but that honorable Senators may be emboldened by the course which is taken by other honorable Senators, and that they suppose, because certain Senators yield to anything they propose, that certain other Senators are going to yield to what they propose. I want to tell that honorable Senator that different men are now coming from the North. We have had enough in the North of those people who bow down and yield. We have got, if I mistake not, not a Senator, but a President, who bows down and yields to exactly what is said. I say to exactly what is said; perhaps I should not put it precisely in that form; but he bows to do what is required of him. We have got certain other Senators who bow down to do what is required of them; but I want the honorable Senator from Georgia to understand that there are certain Senators in this Chamber that are sent now to the Senate, not to bow down, but to stand up. We have had enough of bowing down, and the people in my region have got sick of it. They will stand up, and they cannot be crushed out. The gentleman may put his heel upon their heads or upon their toes or anywhere else he pleases, but still there will be Senators in this Chamber demanding their rights and maintaining their rights; and you may crush and crush, and the more you crush the more those men will stand up.

That is what I have to say upon that point; and if the process had gone on, and God had spared my life, I would have made this speech in the Senate if it took to the day of doom; but now, since there is a manifestation on the part of honorable Senators that when I have concluded this speech the Senate will adjourn, I have no disposition to prolong it. I will meet them half way; but when they show me their foot or their heel, I will show them my foot or my heel, and I will stand in my place, and they cannot drive me from it, nor kick me out of it. Gentlemen may just as well understand that in the beginning as not. It is about time that this talk of crushing out should be stopped. It does not become, in my judgment, honorable Senators, either to utter or to hear it. One thing I am sure of—it is to be a very difficult process. The man who attempts it will find that he has as much as he can do for one generation.

I think, Mr. President, when I was stopped in my remarks, that I was commenting upon the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio. Here is the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, uniting the Minnesota with the Kansas bill. Upon that, at the proper time, I shall have something to say. Here is the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio; and upon that, at another time, I will have something to say. I will defer it now, because I feel I ought not, after the manifestation that has been shown here, to delay the Senate. Here is an amendment which I have indicated that I propose to make; on which, at the same time when I offer it, I shall have something to say; and I have another amendment drawn up, here in my drawer, which I am going to propose. I have not asked to have it printed, because it is well known I am going to move to put on the Kansas bill at the same time the old Missouri restriction, and I am going to endeavor to bring the Senate to vote upon it. I do not mean that the matter shall be passed from before the Senate until all these amendments shall be separately and severally considered, and until we have the distinct action of the Senate upon the whole of them.

I am going to pass them by now. I understand I shall be in order, when those amendments come before the Senate, to debate them. I do not mean to be factious, but I want to debate them fully.

There is another question which I propose to debate now. I was about to go into an argument to show that under the provisions of the Lecompton constitution it was out of the power of the people to alter that constitution until 1864. I know that honorable gentlemen take other positions, and say this State Legislature may alter it at once. I maintain the opposite of that; and say, and I was proposing to go into an argument to show, that it could not be altered, and to show the danger there would be of forcing that upon the people at the present time with the idea that it could be altered. I forbear to do that until some future time, because I am desirous to bring this speech to a close. I shall have an opportunity to debate that legitimately and properly, as I may do, and as I will endeavor to do, under the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio, or under the amendment which I may propose, or to the Missouri restriction. I think it will be germane to either of those amendments to debate it then; but I will forbear now, because I do not wish to keep Senators at this unreasonable hour of the night.

Mr. SEWARD. Not many.

Mr. CLARK. It is said by the gentleman from New York there are not many here. But I have quite as much regard to dismiss those who are here as those who are gone, because they have taken care of themselves. It does not make any difference to me that there are not many Senators to hear me. It does not make any particular difference to me that I speak at this time of the night. I have a duty to discharge, and when I have uttered what I have to say, whether men hear or forbear, whether they go away or stay, I shall have discharged fully my duty to my constituents, to my country, and to my own conscience; and that is all that I have to regard, I think, in this matter. I shall endeavor to do that duty fearlessly. I shall endeavor to do it independently. I do not mean to trespass on any other man's rights or any other man's duties, if I can understand them in the discharge of my duty.

There is, however, Mr. President, another point to which I propose an amendment. I will call the attention of the Senate to it for a moment, and for but a moment, because I mean to debate it by and by. It is a provision of the constitution which is certainly to me a very singular one—that constitution which was "done at Lecompton on the 7th day of November." Since then, it is known that the free-State Legislature of that Territory has been in session. It is known that they have repealed, or attempted to repeal, certain laws there; and yet this Lecompton constitution, by a single provision, reenacts, or attempts to reenact and put in force those laws. It contains a provision that all the laws of the Territory in force on the 7th day of November, 1857, shall be in force when this constitution takes effect. Then, if, in the mean time, the free-State Legislature, or any other Legislature, should repeal part of those laws, by the force of the constitution assuming the powers of legislation, which I contend they have no right to do, they reenact those laws and put them in force. I shall have an opportunity of addressing myself to that amendment by and by. I do not propose to discuss it at length now. I only mention it at this time that I may not seem to have passed it over without any notice, and will give it further attention hereafter.

I had laid down various propositions in my own mind why I would not vote for the admission of Kansas under this Lecompton constitution. One of those reasons was, that it will not give peace and quiet, and may engender civil commotion and war, destroy the confidence of many of our citizens in the Government of the United States, and lead to mischief. I desire to discuss that proposition for a short time, because I may not get another opportunity to do so. Senators on the other side seem to think that Senators on this side want to prolong the debate. I do not desire to do so. I only desire to say fairly, candidly, and clearly what, in my judgment, is proper to the debate, and when I have said that, I shall sit down; but I shall not sit down until I have said it.

You may adopt this Lecompton constitution, and the President says it will give you peace and quiet. In my judgment, I tell you it will give no peace and quiet. Bring peace to whom? Peace to the country? How so? What has been the state of the country ever since you repealed the Missouri compromise? and if you would go back further, I ask what has been the state of the country since you adopted the compromises? Then everything was to be settled. We have heard a very great many times of this peace and quiet. Adopt this measure, and there will be peace and quiet. The dove has come with the olive branch in its mouth, and we have taken the dove into the ark, and yet no peace and quiet have come.

You tell us that peace and quiet will come now. I tell you, in my judgment, this measure will bring you no peace nor quiet. The sentiment of the country is aroused in a way that no admission of Kansas with this constitution will quiet it. Why has it been aroused? Because the country feared that, when you repealed the Missouri compromise, you were going to make Kansas a slave State. That was the watchword. The object was to make Kansas a slave State. The country became alarmed. They said that that was the object. A great many Senators in this Chamber said "no." An honorable Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Badger, said:

"I have no more idea that slavery will go into the Territory of Kansas than that it will go into Massachusetts."

Senators talked about the law of climate; that the law which regulated slave labor effectually prevented its going there. They said slave labor would not, nor could not, flourish in Kansas.

That was the argument. Everywhere I went, on the stump, and elsewhere, I endeavored to controvert it; because I saw, as I thought, that slavery was to go into Kansas. When they said that Kansas was too far north, slavery cannot go there, I replied to them, is Kansas any further north than Missouri? and if slavery is profitable in Missouri it will be in Kansas. That was one reason why I wanted to draw out the Senator from Missouri to-night. I wanted to ask him if he was in favor of abolishing it in Missouri, and he at once said no, that slave labor was profitable there. He told you that in raising hemp and tobacco it was nearly equal to the cotton crop in value, and he did not want to get rid of slavery in Missouri. If slavery is profitable in Missouri, why not in Kansas? Is it not entirely idle, then, to talk about the law of climate, or anything of that kind excluding slavery from Kansas? There is no doubt a large majority of the people of the North—perhaps all of them—desire slavery not to go into Kansas. I do not know but what I may say that some men from the slave States desire it not to go there as a matter of climate, because slave labor crushes out too much land, and countries settled by free labor are the most prosperous countries.

Why, Mr. President, I could join in all that was said of the beautiful country of the South by the gentleman from South Carolina; I could join with him in speaking of the beautiful sea-coast, the winding bays, and harbors; I could join with him in praise of that magnificent river which sweeps all the valley of that country; I could join with him in the fineness and richness of the soil, in the bright sunlight, and everything that makes that country beautiful; but when I join with him in that, the reflection would come to my own mind, if you only cultivated that country as you might a large portion of it—by free labor—I have no doubt you might do so—how much more beautiful would it be than it is now. I agree to the picture which he drew, and then, without taking the brush off, I could add some very beautiful tints to that country. I apply the same thing to Kansas. When you talk to me about slavery making the South prosperous, or making Kansas prosperous, I tell you with free labor it will be infinitely more beautiful and prosperous.

There is another point to which I want to direct the attention of Senators, if they will permit me. Gentlemen of the South complain that if slavery is excluded from Kansas they cannot go and carry their slaves there. Very true. Let me state the other side. If they go and carry their slaves there, free labor cannot go there to any great extent. You have got to exclude one or the other in toto. Which shall be excluded, the one which renders the country more prosperous or least prosperous?

But I pass from that consideration, and come back to the proposition that the admission of Kansas under this constitution will bring you no peace. I ask you to turn your attention to my own State, and see what has been the history of the question there, and then judge of other States like my State, whether you are going to have peace. The State of New Hampshire had been a Democratic State from 1829 to 1846. She had not faltered once. She was as true as the needle to the pole, or the shining of the north star. She was always Democratic. When the great State of New York and other States faltered in 1840, or were swept away by a political whirlwind, New Hampshire was true to the Democracy. She acquired the titles of the "Gibraltar of Democracy," the "back-bone of Democracy," the "un-terrified Democracy," because she was always true. Yet, in 1846, when upon the question of the admission of Texas, they proposed to defeat my colleague here, who had been a member of the other House, for his vote there, New Hampshire, which for seventeen years never had varied in the least, went square about, defeated the Democracy, elected my colleague to the Senate of the United States, and brought him first into this Chamber. That was done upon the slavery question.

The next year the Democratic party passed certain anti-slavery resolutions, showed themselves opposed to slavery, and the State went square back. On those resolutions she stood in 1847, 1848, 1849, and 1850. She reiterated them in 1851 and 1852, and there she stood in 1853. But the very next time you brought up this slavery question, and proposed to repeal the Missouri compromise, in 1854 she went square about again. They had not a majority of the Legislature in 1854 which would elect a Senator; but they defeated the Democratic Senator. The next year she went square about, and, with a majority of one hundred, reelected my colleague and my predecessor, the late Mr. Bell, as Senators here. The next year she stood the same; the next year the same. She has just spoken again; and I want you to hear what is said now in that State.

Mr. President, when you proposed to admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, the Democracy of the State of New Hampshire became a little frightened. They began to take sides with the honorable Senator from Illinois—if you will allow me so to speak—against Lecompton, and to take sides with the President. They passed a resolution approving the course of the Senator from Illinois, or against the Lecompton constitution; and they passed a resolution approving of the President. They prayed good Lord and good devil. They came up to a vote. The Lord would not, or did not, help them; and the devil could not, for the Republicans were too many for him. It turned out that the Republicans carried the State by an increased majority of two thousand votes. We carried it by three thousand before, and three thousand majority in our State is a pretty large majority; but at the present election, which took place last week, on last Tuesday, we increased the majority to five thousand.

Mr. SEWARD. What was the aggregate vote?

Mr. CLARK. The aggregate vote was about sixty-four thousand. We are a very steady and conservative people. New Hampshire was a Democratic State from 1829 to 1846. She then went around and voted for my colleague. She resumed her place in 1847, and went on until 1854. She changes only once in a generation; she is so conservative that when she fixes her point, there she remains. She has fixed herself as a Republican State, and there she will remain. At this election she has increased the majority two thousand votes.

Mr. SEWARD. She will come up.

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir; she will come clear up, if you keep on this warfare, and take in the whole people. But I want to read to you, sir, and to honorable gentlemen who cry "peace, peace; only admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, and you will have peace," an article from the New Hampshire Patriot. That is, and has been, the State paper. Everybody who knows anything about New Hampshire, and Isaac Hill, knows what sort of a paper it has been. It was his paper, and had been from time immemorial his paper. I desire to read a few lines written the day after, or the day but one after, the recent defeat. Here is what it says:

"This defeat of the Democracy is sufficiently overwhelming to satisfy our most bitter opponents; even the latest renegade must feel content with it. At the same time, when the palpable cause of it is considered, it presents no occasion for despondency on the part of true and intelligent Democrats. No one can fail to see the cause; all admit it. The Kansas question has again crushed us!"

That is the "crushing out," sir. "The Kansas question has again crushed us"—us, the Democracy. That is a different crushing from what the Senator from Georgia was going to give us.

Mr. SEWARD. It is a bad rule that will not work both ways.

Mr. CLARK. We know it works both ways. If we put our trust in Providence, and general principles are with us, we need not fear this crushing-out process. This article continues:

"—with its ponderous, blind, unreasoning power. Before the Lecompton constitution question was brought before the country, our prospects for success were highly flattering; our triumph seemed to be certain."

Now mark this:

"That matter, with the course of the Administration upon it"— that is it—

"fell like a wet blanket upon the rising courage and earnest zeal of our friends, and from that day we were doomed; our defeat was certain, and apparent to all well-informed persons."

Let me tell you, Mr. President—and let me tell honorable Senators who think that peace is coming from this measure—that when you have crushed out the majority in Kansas, you have not crushed out the Republicans of New Hampshire, nor the Republicans of the country. What will be the effect of passing this bill? You admit Kansas with this Lecompton constitution. She then comes into the Union under it, just as if you had not amended it or put some condition to it, and what do you get then? Where is Mr. John Calhoun? Here in this good city. Why did he not count the votes before this? Why, he told you he was not going to count them or declare them until Congress admitted the State; when you got that difficulty settled he would count the vote. Oh, yes; you admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; let it come in with slavery in it; then I will count you in a pro-slavery Governor—a pro-slavery Legislature, with all the machinery to move it; and then let us see you get a free State. Then what sort of a difficulty would you have? Have you any idea that the people are going to submit to it? I put it to you—if they have been rebellious, insurrectionary, and insubordinate, while this question has been pending, and under the rule of these Missourians, what do you think they will be when you force upon them a constitution which is obnoxious to them, and against their will?

You send your Governor back if he dares to go. Let him attempt to put that slave-State government into operation. They will drive him out of the Territory. Let the Legislature attempt to go into session. It may be—I do not say, because I do not know; I am only foreshadowing events in giving my own views—that they will assemble, or attempt to assemble. The people drive them out of the Territory. What then? An application by the Legislature and Governor for troops to take care of them. What then? A collision between the troops and the people. What then? Why, peace in the country! Only admit Kansas, and we will all go to bed, and lie down and be peaceable and quiet; and we will not hear anything of this subject again!

I tell you, sir, that when you put this Lecompton constitution into effect, in my judgment you give the people of Kansas the torch of civil war, and tell them to go and light it. I am not certain but what the President desires this. There is evidence here to show that the President of the United States does not want peace. That is a pretty grave charge to make; but I think I can prove it, and I prove it in this way: Mr. Stanton wrote to the President, (and the President sent the document here, or rather repeated in his message what Mr. Stanton had said,) that the only way he could prevent bloodshed in the Territory, as he thought, was to call the Legislature together. He did call the Legislature together. What then? Why, the President turned him out of office for doing the very thing that would prevent bloodshed. Now, Senators know that the reason the President assigned for turning him out of office, was because he called the Legislature together; and then, afterwards, this same President sends here his message, and in that message says that Mr. Stanton said, the only thing to prevent bloodshed was to call that Legislature together; and so it happened.

Mr. President, I could continue for some time longer to show you why you will get no peace in this Territory by passing this measure, but I forbear. I have already occupied more of the time of the Senate than I ought to have done, much more time than I should have done under other circumstances; but, with these hasty remarks, I close with a warning to the Senate, if it becomes me to give the warning, that as you failed in 1850 to get peace on this question, when you thought you would have it by the compromise measures; as you failed to get it in 1854, when you thought you would have it by the repeal of the Missouri compromise; so now, in my judgment, you will fail, signally fail; and I will tell you that the admission of Kansas under this Lecompton constitution, in my judgment, instead of giving peace and quiet to the country, will add but another torch and another brand, which will be fanned into a flame, and which will end we know not where.

Now, Mr. President, I had it in my mind to have said something further in regard to the speech of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] which was delivered on Friday. And, if you will bear with me a moment, I will do so. I dissent entirely from the conclusion of that speech. Though it distinctly shadowed forth what certain gentlemen deemed to be the career of this country, I was compelled to dissent. We were told by the gentleman from Virginia that the eagles were already gathering to the banquet of empire, but that there was one eagle away, watching her nest. He spoke as if it was desirable that that young eagle should be to that banquet of empire. I say, sir, let the young eagle watch her nest; let her take care of her young; let her not go to feed upon the carrion of the Old World. I say more. Let her maintain her dominions here where she is, upon her own soil. If, in a proper and rightful way, she acquires more soil to be used in a proper way, so be it; but I protest against that vision of empire which he shadowed forth when we should have possession of all the southern portion of this continent, marching through Mexico and the States of Central America to the Amazon and the equator, and governing the country by subjecting those nations to the stronger. We might possibly do it; but is it desirable? If we can subject the negro and hold him in slavery, in the same way we will subjugate the Mexicans and the various people in the Central American States. Sir, I protest for my country against any such destiny. I have no objection that she shall be enlarged in her borders, if it can be done justly; but if her borders are to be enlarged in wickedness, in unrighteousness, by force, and by subjecting other nations to her will, to make them slaves, then I protest against it. I ask no such future for my country, because I remember, and it will ever prove true, that "the nation that sinneth shall die."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Biggs in the chair.) The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Unless the Senator from Missouri proposes to make a motion to adjourn, I shall do so. It is now one o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin make a motion?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. GREEN. I object to an adjournment.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Polk, Wade, and Wilson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—21.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock. I certainly supposed that was the understanding of the Senate, after the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Connecticut says that it certainly was the understanding, after the announcement of the Senator from Missouri, that this postponement was to occur. It was distinctly announced on this side that that postponement would not be agreed to under the circumstances of the evening. I, for one, announced it, and half a dozen others did so. I simply want to disabuse the minds of Senators. We agreed to no such thing.

Mr. GREEN. Not a bit of it.

Mr. FOSTER. I say that was my understanding. I appeal to the Senator from Missouri if that was not his understanding?

Mr. POLK. I said that I believed we should get along faster if the Senator from New Hampshire were allowed to close his remarks, and then to adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. That was my understanding.

Mr. POLK. The motion to adjourn was made, and I voted for it, not in regard to the matter of postponement. Nothing was said on the subject. On the contrary, the Senator from Mississippi stated, as he has said, that he did not agree to it. Mr. DOOLITTLE obtained the floor.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield the floor?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I think that this evening we could have come to an understanding, but for a partial withdrawal of what I at least understood to be the declaration of the Senator from Maine. I understood both the Senators from Maine to enunciate distinctly that after consultation to-morrow morning, their party would either agree to take this vote on Monday, or not to-morrow to resort to factious opposition, but to go on and make speeches as long as the majority thought proper to sit. One of the Senators from Maine agreed to that. The other one, very much to my surprise, but doubtless according to his understanding, said he could not conceive that he had gone so far, and upon his withdrawal of that assent, as I understood it, several gentlemen around me said, there is an end of it; there is no use in pressing that point any further.

If I understand the position of our friends, it is this: that if we can get the vote on Monday, we will be satisfied. ["No, no!"] Hold on. I will state my own proposition in my own way. If gentlemen choose to vote it down they can do it. I understand there is an influence here which will force an adjournment at this hour, now, provided we can be assured that we can have a vote on Monday; and if that cannot be done by an agreement from the other side, then, that to-morrow there shall be no resort to technicalities to postpone us longer, but gentlemen can go on and make speeches. As long as a gentleman chooses to occupy the floor, let him occupy it. If he chooses to take the floor at eleven o'clock, to which hour I propose that the Senate adjourn—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not to-morrow, after to-night's session?

Mr. BROWN. Well then, twelve o'clock. I care not when. Let us then meet with the full understanding that we shall have the vote without an adjournment unless it is agreed on all hands to have it on Monday at two o'clock. If that be the understanding I am prepared not only to move an adjournment but to vote for it; otherwise, I am prepared to sit it out now, because I see no use in sitting here after one o'clock to-night and repeating the same thing to-morrow night. Unless there is an agreement, let us go on now.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desired some times since to say a single word upon this question of postponement. The honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. Houston] introduced a resolution to-day, but which, being made, lies over until to-morrow, that our sessions should commence at eleven o'clock. That resolution would doubtless be adopted to-morrow. Certainly it would meet my concurrence that we should commence our sessions at eleven o'clock, and sit here from that time until six o'clock, thus giving seven hours for no other business except the discussion of this question.

Now in relation to the proposition made by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, I beg leave to say a single word, and then the honorable Senator will see the position in which we are placed. It is impossible, as we have not had an opportunity for consultation, for us to give any pledge to-night. We must have an opportunity of meeting together before—

Mr. BROWN. The Senator will allow me to say a word. I certainly have not asked, and do not understand that a portion of our friends on this side—some may—ask gentlemen to enter into pledges without consultation; but that to-morrow, after consultation, we shall understand where they are; that they will then agree to have the vote taken on Monday, or, in default of that agreement being entered into, that we shall enter upon the discussion to-morrow with a determination to go through it, provided the majority determine to force it, and not to resort to technicalities, but to go on with the speaking. If they want to speak, speak ahead.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state a conversation that occurred between the honorable Senator from Mississippi, the Senator from Maine, and myself. We were the only three present. The proposition then made was precisely as the Senator from Mississippi has repeated it, according to my understanding. Upon that proposition I said to him, if you will see whether it will be acceptable to your side of the House, I will go upon my side of the House and see if it be acceptable there. I saw, I think, every member on our side of the House—every member, I think, who was in his seat. The Senate was not very full, and perhaps I did not see one or two; but every member whom I did see, assented to the proposition. I went out into the post office, and while there, the Senator from Mississippi came in and said, "Our folks will not assent to the arrangement." I replied, "Very well; let it go." We could then have come to an understanding in one single minute upon that proposition. I think we can carry it out now.

I cannot answer for anybody but myself. So far as I am concerned, I should be in favor of accepting that proposition, each one pledging himself to use his influence and all he can do to carry out the understanding. Whether it can be carried out or not, I cannot say. It could have been at that time.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GREEN. I request the Senator to yield me the floor for a moment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly; I have no objection. My wish was to state my views in relation to this matter of postponement, and to give the reason why we could not answer the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GREEN. My only purpose is simply to make this remark: that Senators on the other side have had the same opportunity precisely that Senators on this side have had, with the same notice with regard to the termination of the debate. I informed them last Monday week that it was the desire of the friends of the bill to bring this question to a close, and if they have failed to avail themselves of that notice to consult together, we ought not to be held responsible.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to say one word right there, if the Senator will yield.

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I had a conversation with the honorable Senator last Friday, wherein I asked him if he intended to press a vote and choke us down; and he told me no.

Mr. GREEN. That is true. I said, "no, if you do right, and come to an understanding; but in the absence of an understanding, we do intend to do it." That is what I said.

Mr. CHANDLER. You left the understanding on my mind that you would not press it.

Mr. GREEN. I said expressly, "in the absence of an understanding, we do intend to do it; but if we can get an understanding, we will forego a day, perhaps several days."

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; you and I understood each other then.

Mr. GREEN. I think so.

Mr. CHANDLER. Perhaps it was from that mutual understanding that I received my impression. I will not assert positively that it was not so.

Mr. GREEN. Not a step has been taken; and when the last opportunity has occurred, the question comes up here whether we shall procrastinate—under what circumstances? Any assurance that we will come to an agreement? No; but under a promise that they will try and see whether they can agree or not. I cannot accept any such vague terms. I desire this night to perfect the amendment I have proposed; and as soon as this motion is voted down, and I hope it will be, I shall propose the last amendment I have to offer, and then ask for a vote.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish to say that I am tired of this. I have striven all this night to conciliate gentlemen on the other side, and I have striven until I have been disgusted. Who is the gentleman from Missouri, that he should dictate terms to us? Is he anything more than our peer? He is certainly not the commander of this Senate. What right has he to come and say the question shall be taken now, or to-morrow, or any other day? This bill, I believe, came up here on the 18th of February. On the 20th of February his side adjourned the Senate over until Tuesday of the next week, to attend a political pageant in the State of Virginia.

Mr. GREEN. That is not true.

Mr. CAMERON. What is that?

Mr. GREEN. That is not correct.

Mr. CAMERON. Do I understand you to say that I state what is untrue?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly; that is exactly what I say.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I say you have no right to say so, and you are responsible for that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls both of the Senators to order. This discussion is against the rules of order.

Mr. CAMERON. I permit no Senator to say here, and no gentleman will say, that what I say is untrue.

35TH CONG., 1ST SESS

Kansas—Leocompton Constitution—Mr. Cameron.

SENATE.

Mr. GREEN. It is not true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls both Senators to order.

Mr. CAMERON. I repeat again—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the Senator from Pennsylvania to order.

Mr. CAMERON. I mean not to be out of order; and with due deference to the President of the Senate—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must call the Senator to order, and requests the Senator for the moment to resume his seat as the rules require when a gentleman is called to order. The Chair reminds Senators now, that as the organ of the body he will not suffer the cross conversations with each other which inevitably and immediately lead, at such an hour of the night as this, to unpleasant collisions; [Mr. HAMLIN. That is right.] and he therefore desires Senators to address each other through the Chair. The Senator from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. CAMERON. I say again that, on a particular day, the Senate adjourned on a motion of a gentleman on the other side of the House; and that was the avowed object of the adjournment. They adjourned on Friday, I believe, to meet again on Tuesday; and I say it was for the purpose of attending a political pageant. [It was Washington's birthday.] That time was occupied by gentlemen on the other side. They then held their caucus, and decided upon their course of action in regard to this bill. We were told, after the Senate met, what their decision was. They came not as gentlemen ought to come to other gentlemen—"we desire you to do so and so;" but they said you must do so.

Mr. GREEN. That is not correct, either.

Mr. CAMERON. Does the gentleman desire that I should say something harsher than he would like to hear?

Mr. GREEN. So far as I am concerned, I do.

Mr. CAMERON. I say you utter an untruth.

Mr. GREEN. I say you are a liar—that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Both Senators are out of order.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will please to pause for a moment. The Chair regrets that in less than one minute after he called the attention of the Senators to the rules of order, that this scene should have occurred; and he feels it his duty, as the organ of the body, to stop it. Both Senators have violated the rules of order. They have passed the limits of decorum. The Chair says so with great respect to them; but it is his duty to see that the rules are not violated; and he will call any Senator to order who addresses any other person, in speaking, than the Chair.

Mr. CAMERON. I again beg pardon of the Senate; yet I do not believe I did what was wrong. I only repeat to the gentleman over there that I am responsible for all I have said to him; to the Senate I say I am sorry if I have done anything wrong. I say again, that this whole matter has been carried out in a dictatorial and improper manner. I told that gentleman more than once to-night that I, for one, would go into caucus to-morrow with my friends and endeavor to have this question decided at some early day. I thought it could be decided this week, certainly by next Monday. I said so on the floor; I repeated it three or four times; and it has been repeated by half a dozen gentlemen on this side. Now, if he or any other gentleman expects to drive us by sitting it out, they are very much mistaken. To say the least, we belong to the same race, and can endure just as much. I can sit here just as long as any other individual, on this question. They cannot drive us. By treating us with courtesy and decency, we will do almost anything they desire; but they cannot force us to any decision.

Mr. GREEN. I beg leave to make a remark. I do not know what is the motion pending, and I do not know that what I propose to say will be in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the motion to postpone.

Mr. GREEN. Then what I have to say is in order, and the reason why I desire to say it is in justice to myself. The Senator from Pennsylvania intimates that I arrogate to myself a superiority, or a command which does not properly belong to me. I have never done any such thing, and the Senator does me injustice when he insinuates it; and he not only does me that injustice, but he knows it is injustice. He knows it; for I am but the organ of a committee, and the agent of the party, responsible on this question. I am not to arrogate to myself a superiority over any man, but I am to assume to myself an equality with him or any other.

With regard to his intimation that we held a caucus, and then went and dictated terms to him, I say it is not true. I went this morning, as the Senators from Massachusetts and other Senators would bear me witness, if they were in their seats, and said to him, in a playful manner, "I have come to you as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary; what terms do you propose?" Does that bear out the slander that the Senator from Pennsylvania has endeavored to heap upon my head? No; it rivets it upon him; and the Senator from Massachusetts will bear me witness of the truth of what I say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the gentleman from Missouri to order.

Mr. GREEN. I will sit down. I may have used too harsh words. It is a slander, nevertheless.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the Senator from Missouri to order. He considers that language out of order. The Chair has called the Senator to order as required by the rules of the body. It is for the Senate to say whether he shall proceed.

Mr. GREEN. If I used any harsher terms than he used to me, I give in; I submit to the order of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has attempted to arrest it in both Senators.

Mr. BRODERICK. It is evident, Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri was entitled to the floor. He was out of order; but with the general consent of the Senate he will proceed in order.

Mr. GREEN. I was through.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I simply rise for the purpose of stating that I had the floor, and yielded it to Senators.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. I beg leave to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether I did not ask him as to what time he thought would be agreeable to his side to fix for the closing of this debate? and, if I recollect aright, he told me this day three weeks, he thought, would be about the time we could get through. I do not make mistakes on this question. I never make mistakes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In response to the honorable gentleman's question, I will state that the Senator did ask me the question when we would be prepared to take this vote, and I remarked to him that, in my opinion, in two weeks all the members of the Senate could be heard who desired to speak upon this question; and I thought that two weeks would not be an unreasonable time. That is the substance of the conversation.

Mr. GREEN. Now, Mr. President, I beg leave to remark in justice to myself, after having consulted, as I think, in the kindest and most courteous manner imaginable, and requested of Senators on the opposite side to say what time they thought they could be prepared to take a vote, to be characterized, as the Senator from Pennsylvania did, in attempting to dictate terms to them, is enough to harrow up my feelings, for it is not true. I will not use a harsh word; it will be out of order. If I get out of the Senate Chamber, I shall use a harsh word to his teeth, for there no rule of order will correct me; but in this Senate I will not violate the rules of order if I know it. I will simply say that it is not correct; but when once out of this Chamber, I shall use the appropriate epithet which belongs to the West.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, am I expected—

Mr. GREEN. I do not yield the floor. With regard to the adjournment over in order to attend the pageant at Richmond, I will merely remark that this bill had not been made the special order at that time. Since this bill was made the special order, the Senate has never adjourned over from Thursday to Monday by the votes of the majority on this side of the Chamber. I assert that to be the truth, leaving anybody to controvert it who dare.

But enough of this. Why go into these little bickerings? If there is a soul that has a feeling of animosity to settle, outside of this Chamber is the place to settle it. In this Chamber, as he well remarked, we meet as equals, each being responsible to tell the truth, and if we do not do it, to be held up to public opprobrium. I have repeated what I know Senators will bear me witness to, that I never went to that side of the Chamber to dictate the time at which they should take the vote; but went there to ask what time it would be agreeable to them; and when they did not give me an answer, I told them what my instructions were—not dogmatically—not because I, as an individual, assumed the power; but under instruction from the majority, who were responsible to the country—that I, as their agent, would be compelled to press it in the absence of any understanding being given us. Instead of being harsh I thought I was very kind. Whether it be so or not, I leave the public to judge. As to any question of veracity between that Senator and myself, in five minutes after this Senate adjourns, we can settle that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I submit that that is out of order.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say, if that is intended for a threat, it has no effect on me at all.

Mr. GREEN. It is no threat.

Mr. CAMERON. The gentleman says he has not dictated; but yet during the whole evening he has been taking the lead in this matter. It is he who has made all this difficulty. I understood his colleague to say, that after the gentleman from New Hampshire should have finished his speech, that then the Senate would adjourn. It was understood on our side that they would adjourn when that speech was over, as I understood, on the motion of the Senator from Missouri; and Senators have gone home with that understanding. Now, it is not necessary for me to talk to the Senator from Missouri. I am able to take care of myself, and I think I shall do so now and hereafter, too.

I repeat again, and I repeat it upon the expressions which he made this evening, that the minority has had no responsibility; that the responsibility was all upon the majority, and upon this principle I say all this discussion has been postponed by them. They have the majority, and could have prevented an adjournment any day they thought proper, or at any hour on any day; but they did not see proper to do so, and are responsible for it. The majority have adjourned from day to day; they adjourned to go to Richmond; they adjourned over from Thursday to Monday; they did so every week until the last week, and all the time since we have been discussing this question. To-day, he says, he came over here as plenipotentiary for his party, to fix some time on which the vote should be taken. He came here, as I suppose, after a caucus among his people. That would have been all well and fair before the Senate met, but as it occurred, in fact, after the Senate was in session, gentlemen on this side had no opportunity to meet and consult on the course they should take. I repeated, in private conversation, half a dozen times, and I said so publicly, give us an opportunity to meet, and I, for one, would endeavor to get an early day fixed for the decision of this question; if we failed to agree on a reasonable time, agreeable to the majority, that then they should act as they thought proper, and we should act as we think proper. I can speak more freely because it is not necessary that I should remain here. I have agreed to pair off with a gentleman who has been called away, and I might go home. But if it is determined by physical force, I repeat again that this side can stand as much force as any gentlemen on the other side, although I prefer, and I think, for our own sake, and the benefit of the country, and an early decision upon this question, it would be better to adjourn now, meet to-morrow at the usual hour, and then fix a time for taking the vote.

Mr. BRODERICK. It is evident from the debate that the majority on this side of the Chamber have resolved to remain here until the vote is taken upon this question. I hope no overture will be again made from Senators on the other side of the Chamber; for it must be evident to them that the majority have resolved to sit this question out. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] left this Chamber an hour since, with the understanding, I believe, that the Senate would adjourn immediately after the Senator from New Hampshire had concluded his speech. I am very glad that he has gone home, for he will be here early in the morning, if the Senate intend to remain here during the night. It is now morning, I believe. Therefore, I would suggest to Senators upon the other side to resort to the remedy accorded by the rules of the Senate. If they get tired of speaking, move an adjournment or a postponement of the question. Let us hear no more propositions from that side of the Chamber for any compromise. ["Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was upon the floor when this desultory debate sprang up. The question pending before the Senate, and upon which the yeas and nays are ordered, if I have not forgotten, is a motion to postpone this subject until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That means, I suppose, until half past twelve o'clock to-day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was about to reply to the suggestion which was made by the Senator from Mississippi. He said that he either asked of us to state now that we would take the vote on Monday, or that we would to-morrow agree to take the vote on Monday; or that we would agree, if we did not come to that conclusion, that we would waive all right, by parliamentary law or otherwise, to postpone the time of taking the question. Now it is unfair, it seems to me, to press anything of this kind upon us when no opportunity has been allowed us to consult. We could not make the proposition if we would.

Mr. BROWN. Will my friend allow me a moment?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I simply stated that if gentlemen in their individual capacity who had submitted this proposition failed to get their party associates to agree to take the vote on Monday, they, as individual Senators, would not engage in any effort to stave it off by calling the yeas and nays, and resorting to further parliamentary tactics, if he could not commit his friends to vote on Monday; of course not to commit them to any other policy. I only held that some four or five of those gentlemen might enter into an arrangement of that sort. I never understood that the whole party should be committed to anything until they agreed in caucus.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The suggestion of the honorable Senator from Mississippi does not relieve the difficulty at all. As long as gentlemen act in party associations it is not proper, if a party caucus is to be called, for them in advance to pledge what they will do, or may not do; for when the matter comes to be consulted on it may be thought prudent, on consultation, that a certain course should be pursued; and in duty to the party obligations which they are under, gentlemen would not give a pledge of that kind in advance. We have had no opportunity to consult.

But again, Mr. President, this matter of delay in the discussion of this question is not to be charged upon our side of the Chamber altogether. It is true there was a good deal of discussion upon the President's message, but it was suggested by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and other Senators on this floor, that it was irregular; that the whole debate upon the merits of the Lecompton constitution was irregular and out of order, and ought not to be proceeded with by the Senate; and therefore it was urged upon those who desired to speak to wait until the committee had made their report, and the question came before the Senate in a practical shape, and the direct proposition was before the Senate for the time in its legislative capacity, and then it would be a proper matter for discussion.

Upon that suggestion I know that very many Senators on this side of the Chamber refrained altogether from preparing themselves for debate, or from taking any part in the discussion, until the Lecompton constitution should be presented. The very vote on that constitution in the Territory of Kansas did not take place until the 21st of December. The Legislature of the Territory passed a law on the 17th of December, that that constitution should be submitted to a vote of the people on the 4th of January. An election was held, in fact, on the 4th of January, whether that constitution should be accepted or rejected by the people of Kansas; and it was but just to wait until these events should transpire before entering into a full discussion of this question. For myself, I believe I have maintained, and I do now maintain, that the vote which was taken by the people of Kansas, on the 4th of January, under a law of the Legislature of that Territory, by which they rejected the constitution by over ten thousand majority, is a vote which is binding in good faith upon that people, and binding in good faith upon this Senate, the Congress, and the country. That matter, of course, could not have been discussed until it transpired. It took several days before it was known and understood here what that vote was—what the result of it was; and the subject was not fairly presented until brought into the Senate upon the report of the committee. Since it has come into the Senate on the report of the committee, there has been but about one month, and only one month, for the discussion of this question. Having myself occupied some considerable time of the Senate, I feel it but just to other Senators that they should have a fair opportunity to speak on this question; and so far as any influence that I can exert, or any vote that I can give, will allow them that fair opportunity, I am disposed to do it.

I did state to the honorable gentleman from Missouri, that if this matter could be continued for two weeks longer there would be a fair opportunity for all to be heard, if upon that side of the Chamber they did not occupy more than a fair portion of the time; but I believed that at least that time would be required to present this case properly, or give Senators here a fair opportunity to present their views upon it. Still, as there is such a strong disposition to have the vote taken, I am not quite certain but what we might agree that the vote should be taken at an earlier day than two weeks from to-day, when the vote should be taken; but I am not prepared now to pledge myself that it shall be taken at an earlier day than two weeks from to-day. The honorable gentleman from Ohio suggested, in the course of his remarks not long since, that if a day were fixed within two weeks it would be satisfactory to him.

What great reason is there, Mr. President, why this matter should be pressed? What great difference would two, three, or four days, or even a week, make? It is said on the one hand, if the Lecompton constitution is to pass, that it necessarily involves a civil war in Kansas. On the other side, it is insisted or threatened by some on this floor that, if Kansas be rejected under the Lecompton constitution, the Union is to be dissolved. Well, sir, I do not anticipate either event. I do not want a war in Kansas; I do not want a dissolution of the Union; and the longer you postpone the matter, the longer you postpone the evil day which seems to be anticipated on the one side or the other. If, as has been earnestly said here by honorable Senators, based upon the information which they derive from Kansas, there is any truth in the resolutions of that Territory that the passage of the Lecompton constitution shall be regarded as a declaration of war upon that people, and that they will resist it unto the last extremity, that it will light the torch of civil war—if there is any truth in this, it is a matter well to be considered. So, too, if there is any shadow of foundation for this intimation thrown out that the union of the States is to be broken up, if Kansas is not to be admitted under this Lecompton constitution, that is a direful calamity. For myself, sir, I am not prepared for either calamity. I would not hasten on the hour when either calamity could possibly ensue.

Now, I ask Senators, what difference is it whether the vote is taken one day or six days later? within one week, or within two weeks? What difference is it to the interests of the country? We see, Mr. President—we have evidence in what has transpired upon this floor—what results from these night sessions, and from this attempt on one side to press the Senate to a vote on this question. The order of the Senate is broken down; the dignity the decorum of the Senate is destroyed, to a certain extent. Ill-feeling is engendered between Senators on this floor in consequence of it. I submit that the proposition of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. HOUSTON,] that the Senate commence its sessions at eleven o'clock, instead of at twelve o'clock—that all other business be laid aside for the purpose of debating this question, and for no other purpose, and thus give a fair opportunity for all to express their views, and then come to a vote—is a fair one, and ought to be adopted. There is no doubt that in this Senate there is a majority in favor of the passage of this bill in some shape. We expect that the majority will come to a vote at the proper time. We do not intend to resist it factiously. What has transpired to-night should not be taken as a factious opposition; for I protest to gentlemen that it has been understood upon our side of the Chamber—not that we will say there was a positive agreement to that effect, but it has been understood on this side of the Chamber, and such has been the understanding of every Senator with whom I have conversed, that this matter was not to be pressed to a vote on Monday; that, at all events, if we came to a vote any time during the present week, it would be all that was expected; and this effort to press it to a vote to-night has taken us by surprise. We have, therefore, been thrown upon the exercise of our parliamentary rights, upon motions to adjourn, and motions to postpone, for the purpose of enabling those who have prepared themselves, or are nearly prepared to deliver their views on this question, to have an opportunity to do so to-morrow.

Now, Mr. President, I have not said, I do not know that any gentleman upon this side of the Chamber has said, when this vote will be taken, nor have they indicated a period in which it shall not be taken. I hope the honorable Senators upon the other side will not undertake to press us to the point when we must take a resolution to make any delay for the purpose of delay. We have not desired to do it. We do not desire to do it. We desire only to afford an opportunity to every Senator who desires to express his views on this question to do so. We have no desire to make delay for the purpose of delay—none whatever. I hope the Senate will pass the resolution offered by the Senator from Texas, and then to postpone the further consideration of this question until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow, or to-day, rather.

Mr. HALE. To-morrow.

Mr. BROWN. To-day is to-morrow, legislatively speaking.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senate consent to let that resolution to meet at eleven o'clock be taken up and passed, I have no objection to have our sessions commence at eleven instead of twelve o'clock, and to postpone all other business, and discuss this question, and nothing else. We can then give gentlemen an opportunity to speak. Now, I am informed (I do not know whether correctly or not) that the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] and the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. HOUSTON,] desire to speak on this question. The honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] it is known, desires to speak on this question. For the last week he has been confined to his bed by sickness, and is unable to speak now, and I submit it is not right on the part of the majority, under these circumstances, to press it to a vote to-night. I undertake, further, to say that it is not right on the part of the majority to press us to the point of saying that the vote cannot be taken to-night and shall not be taken to-night, nor for a week to come. We do not desire to be pressed to take that resolution on any question. We know that the majority have power in the Senate; we simply appeal to their sense of justice in this matter to postpone it until to-morrow. Pass, if you please, a resolution to commence the session at eleven o'clock daily, and allow time for gentlemen to speak. I do not speak for myself. I speak for my friends. I have myself trespassed so long upon the time of the Senate that I feel as if I ought to speak for my friends, and ask an opportunity that they should be heard. I fear, if it shall not be allowed, I shall feel I have trespassed upon time when they ought to have been heard instead of myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER,] to postpone the further consideration of this bill until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9; nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Polk, and Wilson—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—20.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. GREEN. I move that the absentees be called.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the absentees to attend. It is now early in the morning, and I make that motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request them to attend to their senatorial duties.

Mr. HALE. I do not know what the circumstances are that require that motion now, when it was considered so improper a little while ago. I made that motion when I first came into the Chamber.

Mr. JONES. There was a quorum then, and there is not now.

Mr. HALE. I am speaking to the Chair. I want that rule in regard to speaking across the Chamber enforced. The obligation is upon Senators to attend here as much when there is a quorum as when there is not. I want to say a single word on a suggestion thrown out upon this subject by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON.] He seemed to infer that because the Constitution and the rule of the Senate said that a less number than a majority might compel the attendance of absent members, that that precluded the idea that a majority could do it; that as the express power was given to a less number than a majority to compel the attendance of absent members, a majority could not do it. That was the argument. Now, sir, if that honorable Senator will look into it he will see that that same provision of the Constitution and the rule which gives to the Senate, or gives to a less number than a majority, the right to call for the attendance of absent members, also gives the same power to a less number than a majority to adjourn, and if the adjournment be good—

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question of order before the body. There is no quorum present and the Chair does not think it proper for the Senator to make a speech on a question of order when there is no question of order before the body, and no quorum present. The Senate can adjourn or obtain a quorum for action on business.

Mr. HALE. I beg pardon of the Chair. Of course I submit to what the Chair says with great deference; but I contend that if the Constitution gives us power, being less than a minority, to entertain a motion, we have a right to discuss it. The Chair was about to put a motion to the Senate, and that was whether the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent members.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question of order before the Senate. The Chair cannot see what question the Senator is speaking to. The Chair entertained a motion—

Mr. HALE. I am addressing myself to that motion. I am against that motion, and I was arguing that motion. My point of order is this: that if the Senate can entertain it, it can be argued. If I have got to vote for it, I have a right to give the reasons why I vote. The Chair entertains the motion—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, of course, will hear any suggestions, but it occurs to him that it is hardly a debatable proposition.

When the Senate finds itself without a quorum, the Senate can take measures to enforce the attendance of a quorum or majority.

Mr. HALE. The Constitution confers on us power to entertain this motion. A majority of that minority may be against it, and does the Chair decide that this motion which the Constitution gives us the power to entertain, may not be debated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has given no decision. He has expressed his impression on that subject.

Mr. HALE. The Chair knows the rules of order so much better than I do, that I should consider a suggestion of the Chair of more weight than my own conviction; but I move that the Senate adjourn. That is in order.

Mr. SLIDELL. If the Senate should now adjourn, I would ask if this subject goes over as the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. SLIDELL. I do not know whether it would be strictly in order to speak of what has passed elsewhere; but I came here to-night, as most gentlemen associated with me in politics did, not with the expectation of getting a vote, but in the hope that gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber would, until a very late hour of the evening, address the Chair, and go far towards exhausting the argument on this subject. I am satisfied now that nothing is to be gained by remaining at this hour of the night longer. I think we shall economize our time by an adjournment, and, although I am a very strict disciplinarian, I think I am bound to look at the circumstances in the case. I shall vote for the adjournment, satisfied that we are losing our time, and probably producing unpleasant feeling, and not attaining any good results.

Mr. TOOMBS. As the gentleman has said a word, I hope I shall be allowed to say something too. I think the order which has been taken by the majority of the Senate, who are responsible for the public business, ought to be observed by those who participated in passing it, or who hold themselves bound by its action. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to make a single statement.

Mr. PUGH. I object. Let us stick to the rules of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. I only want to say, that if the suggestion of the Senator from Louisiana be carried out, it will lead to an amicable adjustment of the matter.

The Secretary proceeded and called the roll.

Mr. SLIDELL. I wish to change my vote. I did not expect to find myself in the same company in which I am. [Laughter.] I therefore change my vote. I vote "nay."

The result was then announced—yeas 15, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Polk, Sevard, Wade, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—20.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BRODERICK. I move that the Senate take a recess until twelve to-morrow, or to-day, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FITCH. I submit that the motion is not in order; because it is a motion to take a recess to the same time at which the Senate meet.

Mr. BRODERICK. Then I will make it a motion to take a recess until half past eleven o'clock to-morrow; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, and Wilson—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—21.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. It is perfectly evident that we cannot get through with this bill to-night. It is now past two o'clock.

Mr. PUGH. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Foster, Harlan, and Wilson—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—21.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. PUGH. I suppose the motion of the Senator from Georgia is now in order.

Mr. TOOMBS. I renew my motion, as it is now in order, that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of the absent members.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move, as an amendment, that he be ordered to bring in every absentee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to direct them all to appear in the Senate Chamber.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Doolittle, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, and Wilson—7.

So the motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will direct the order of the Senate to be executed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that there be a recess until eleven o'clock, in order to allow him an opportunity to bring in the absentees.

Mr. PUGH. I would like to know whether that motion is in order? Our power, as a minority, is to adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of absent members; but we cannot take a recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair doubts whether it is in order, for another reason. There is a motion to postpone the consideration of this subject pending, upon which no quorum voted, and that will be the question properly before the Senate when there is a quorum.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. A motion to adjourn would be in order. I simply ask for a recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to adjourn would be in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, and Wilson—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—19.

Mr. TOOMBS. I believe nothing would be in order now until the Sergeant-at-Arms has executed the order of the Senate; but I suppose a little speaking would be in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No business can be transacted in the absence of a quorum; but the Chair will not interrupt any one in making a speech.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then it will be in order for my friend from Pennsylvania to make his speech.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President, whilst the Sergeant-at-Arms is bringing in the absentees, if there be no objection, I will speak to the main question. ["No objection." "Go on."]

Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss this subject further, and I do not now intend to do so at any considerable length. My object is to make myself understood on a few practical points; to make a record of a few additional ideas for my own use hereafter. At an early date in the session I pursued this vexed controversy at some length, and I need not now repeat its general history. First, then, as to the legality and regularity of the proceedings for the organization of Kansas as a State: I think, as to these, there can no longer be reasonable doubt. The history of the organization of the several States fully vindicates Kansas on these points, showing that the proceedings in her case were not only more regular, legal, and binding, than in most cases, but that in these particulars she is an exception to the general practice. Some States have been prepared without any act of Congress, territorial or otherwise; some by enabling acts; some under the direct propositions of Congress; some by action of the Territorial Legislature, without first consulting the people. Some of the constitutions have been submitted to the popular sanction, and others have not. But in Kansas the movement commenced at the very fountain of political power. The people, at the regular election of 1855, were consulted as to their desire to change their form of government from a territorial to a State, and they decided to have a State government.

It is true that the Topeka party did not vote; but they had been clamorous for a State government from the beginning. A law was passed, accordingly, providing for a convention of delegates of the people to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to admission into the Union. This law, it is conceded, was well adapted to the end in view. It has been pronounced "right and just in all its objects and purposes." It was modeled, mainly, after a bill which this branch of Congress had passed to accomplish the same end. It was well designed to protect the purity of the ballot-box, and at the same time extend to each citizen a fair opportunity to exercise the high function of an independent elector. The opportunity to vote for delegates it is not pretended was universal or unexceptionable, but it certainly was fair, considering the character of the country. The registry of voters only was liable to reasonable complaint; but no candid man will pretend that it was so imperfect as to impair the legality or authority of the election for delegates. Whilst all were not registered, it will not be pretended that those who were had not the proper authority to make a constitution; for, according to the most conclusive authority, seven out of eight of the legal voters were registered, and had the right to vote.

The facts exhibited by the Senator from Missouri the other day, has completely put to rest the allegation that nineteen counties had been disfranchised—I need not repeat these details. There is enough to satisfy any reasonable man in a few general facts. Nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one names were registered in May; a clamor was immediately raised that the Republican party ought not to vote for delegates because the registry was so exceedingly defective; and yet at the October election, at the end of a violent partisan contest, each party charging the other with polling illegal votes, only eleven thousand seven hundred and eighty were cast for the Delegate in Congress. Here is conclusive evidence that the disfranchised vote as it is termed must have been very meager. But the fact, as exhibited in the returns, that the entire vote in the whole of the nineteen counties, at the January election, when there was no registry and no qualification except the age of twenty-one years, was less than fourteen hundred votes, is perfectly conclusive. If these counties contained but fourteen hundred votes in January, what number did they contain when the registry was taken in the preceding month of April, before the spring emigration could have reached the back counties? In my judgment, and I have repeatedly expressed the opinion before, those counties could not, at that time, have contained more than six or eight hundred voters. This was the only vital point ever presented against the authority of the Lecompton convention, and certainly this has been completely removed by the facts I have stated. The opportunity to vote was sufficient. The authority of the convention was therefore perfect, and its proceedings were regular.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question on that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield the floor?

Mr. BIGLER. It is a very bad time of the night to be asking or answering questions; but let us hear the question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question which I desire to put to the Senator is this: whether more voters did not reside in the counties which had no register at all than all the voters that voted for the delegates to the Lecompton convention?

Mr. BIGLER. Certainly not, Mr. President.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Did not Governor Walker so state?

Mr. BIGLER. Governor Walker did substantially so state. Governor Walker made other statements in reference to this question in which I cannot concur. Sir, the evidence is conclusive against the objection presented by the Senator from Wisconsin. In January, when there was no registry, and no qualification except the age of twenty-one, only one thousand four hundred votes were cast in all the non-registered counties.

Now, sir, I repeat, the opinion expressed heretofore, from what I saw in the Territory early in the season, that at the time that registry was made in April, before the spring immigration could have passed to the back part of the Territory, there were not more than six to eight hundred votes in the whole of those counties. That is the answer to the question which the Senator propounded; and I trust I have convinced him that the defects in the registry could not have been sufficient to impair the legal or moral effect of the election for delegates.

But it is said that but a meager vote was cast for delegates, and that is true; but that does not impair the force or effect of the election. Governor Walker gave the discontents full notice on this point. He told them that they would be responsible whether they voted or not. That any other doctrine would lead to anarchy. And there never was a truer sentiment. We must either accept or reject this doctrine; if we reject it, and hold that it requires an active agency on the part of the elector to give consent, then we lay down a doctrine that would lead to anarchy in probably every State in this Union. In my own State, on this principle, the fundamental law could be repudiated any day. That State contains five hundred thousand voters; at the last election certain amendments were adopted to the constitution, and the whole vote for and against did not exceed one hundred and thirty-eight thousand votes; and the highest affirmative vote reached only one hundred and seventeen thousand; who thinks of doubting the authority of those amendments? On this principle—and none other can be countenanced—the Lecompton convention had a more complete authority, I venture to say, than any other similar body which ever preceded it.

Now, sir, as to the action of the convention. The only objection raised worthy of note is that it did not submit the entire constitution to a vote of the people. I have said heretofore that, at the time, I preferred they should do so; but I never regarded the mode of making the constitution as a reason why the Territory should or should not come into the Union as a State. It was more important to know that what the people did was right in itself than to inquire into the way in which that right thing had been done. They had full authority to do it in "their own way." The right of the people in convention, by delegates, to make and adopt a constitution, was conceded by even Governor Walker. This was one of his special reasons for urging the people to vote for delegates. I think adoption by popular vote a good mode of making a constitution. I certainly do not think it the only good way. It is not the way in which the constitutions of nearly all the original States of this happy Confederacy were made in the earlier and purer days of the Republic. My own cherished State, than whom there is not a happier or greater in the Union, did not make her fundamental law in this way prior to the year 1838, when amendments to that instrument were submitted to a vote of the people, and adopted by a minority of the voters of the State.

I did hold, Mr. President, that the spirit of the compromises of 1850, and the organic act for this Territory, looked to the decision of the question of slavery by some direct action of the people; that there was a general understanding throughout the country that the question of slavery should not come back to Congress unaccompanied by an expression of popular will. I did, therefore, regard the Lecompton convention as under special obligations to submit the question of slavery to a vote of the people. But I never thought we outsiders had the power to dictate on even that point, and there never was a time when I would not have said the submission of the vexed question of slavery is all that the people of other States had any right even to inquire into; much less have they right to dictate a mode of making a constitution as a condition on which the people who are to live under it may become a State. Yet, this high-handed dictation has been attempted by those who call themselves non-interventionists. That vexed question was presented: that question was voted upon. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Upon that point will the honorable Senator allow me to put a question?

Mr. BIGLER. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Was the slavery question in fact submitted to the people of Kansas?

Mr. BIGLER. Undoubtedly it was. I hold, Mr. President, that if the majority of the people had voted down the slavery article, that, in its own language, in the language of the schedule, "thereafter slavery shall not exist in the new State of Kansas," the institution would have been abolished, and there would have been complete authority in the Legislature to have wiped out the remnant of slavery that had previously been planted in the Territory.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to ask the Senator, does not the schedule expressly establish that property in slaves in the Territory shall not be interfered with?

Mr. BIGLER. The property value in slaves is protected. I never heard anybody even in Kansas object to that. But the Senator is certainly aware that there is another provision in that constitution, which says that the Legislature shall not emancipate the slaves without remuneration to the owners; they shall not interdict the immigration of slaves into the Territory so long as similar persons are held in bondage in the Territory.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is in the slavery article.

Mr. BIGLER. But they can, by making compensation, emancipate the slaves. The Legislature has that power. The Senator did not fail to see that the Senator from Virginia, on Friday last, in his able and eloquent speech, pointed out clearly the power in the Legislature to get clear of slavery in that Territory without any amendment of the constitution whatever. Therefore I answer that, so far as regards the question of slavery, taking these clauses together, the power is complete in the Legislature as it now stands.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let me understand the Senator. Is it complete with the slavery article in or with it out?

Mr. BIGLER. I said if the slavery article had been voted out.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Well, what then?

Mr. BIGLER. Then slavery would have been completely abolished in the Territory by the people. That is what I said. I knew what the Senator had in view, that, because the schedule protected the property value in slaves, he would hold that the posterity of the slaves were to remain in bondage; that there was no power in the Legislature to wipe out that remnant or root of the institution. That is where he is mistaken. Now, sir, I want to notice another point.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish to put one further question to the honorable Senator, with his leave.

Mr. BIGLER. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I wish to proceed to another point in the case.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is on this point.

Mr. BIGLER. It is now nearly three o'clock in the morning, and I have several points to make before that hour. [Laughter.]

Now, I wish to notice the extraordinary course and policy which has from time to time marked the conduct of the anti-slavery party in Kansas. I do not intend to review their acts of folly and insubordination, in standing out against the laws; nor their constant and persistent efforts to produce violence, rebellion, and civil war. Governor Walker's dispatches are full and complete on this point. He describes the Republican party as in open rebellion to the laws during nearly all his service, and as plotting for the overthrow of the Government. Against the other party, the Lecompton party, he made no complaints prior to his departure from the Territory. But I wish to look for the evidence in the career of the Republican party in Kansas that they ever desired to settle the question of slavery. I can find no evidence that they did so desire; but much that they did not. In the language of a distinguished New York politician, (John Van Buren,) I do not understand "this free-State party in Kansas, who are all the while trying to make Kansas a slave State." The remark is witty and true. The free-State party in Kansas have never exercised their power when they could touch the question of slavery. In June last, when they had the opportunity of voting for delegates to make a free State, and when they daily boasted of being three or five to one of the population, they would not vote. Different pretexts were set up in different parts of the Territory, as I know of my personal knowledge. Some said, "we will not vote, because the laws under which this convention is to assemble are 'bogus laws.'" Others said, "none shall vote, because all were not registered."

I am sorry that I do not see my friend from Massachusetts in his seat; for as he took the liberty, the other day, of asking me a question relating to my experience in Kansas, he would not take it unkind if I asked him one touching his career in that noted country. I heard it said on more occasions than one that during that honorable Senator's tour in the Territory he had advised the free-State party in Kansas not to vote; and that he also concurred in the policy of attempting to make Kansas a free State by allowing the pro-slavery party to elect all the delegates to make the constitution. I know not whether the rumor be correct or not. It is not important to my purpose. But it is a significant fact that the Republican, or free-State party, did not vote in June when the fate of slavery was involved; and that in October, when nothing was at stake but offices and a Delegate in Congress, they did vote—they did rush to the polls and carry the election, regardless of the humiliation implied in the recognition of the "bogus laws." Then, again, in December following, on the direct question of whether slavery should or should not exist in the new State of Kansas, these anti-slavery men did not vote. The "bogus laws" and the "bogus convention" forbid that they should condescend to vote against slavery, and they did not vote. But less than a month afterwards, when the question of slavery was not involved, when office and honor and emoluments were at stake, they readily got over their scruples of conscience against the Lecompton usurpation and rallied to the polls and secured all the offices under, what they term, the "Lecompton swindle." Comment cannot add to the strength of this history. It is painfully significant. When it was necessary to get office, the "bogus laws" were promptly recognized; when slavery was at stake they were shrunk from as from the touch of death. Constantly boasting their power and determination to make Kansas a free State, these anti-slavery men carefully refrained from dealing the blow, when the institution came within their reach. They boasted of the power, but would not do the deed. The country is agitated from one extremity to the other about an alleged design to force slavery into Kansas; and yet, sir, within the last nine months, the party claiming to have the absolute power, and the will to do the deed, have had two opportunities of abolishing and forever interdicting the institution; but they would not. How many opportunities must they have? How long is the country to be harassed by the complaints of men who will not avail themselves of their prerogatives as freemen? They cannot be made to vote against slavery, and how can they be counted against it until they do vote?

But, Mr. President, I do not understand how honorable Senators on the other side can feel so free to interpose mere formal objections to the admission of Kansas as a State—how they can talk about informalities, or irregularities, or usurpations and frauds. They have claimed admission for Kansas on the Topeka constitution—a movement commenced without the authority of any law, territorial or congressional, and in derogation of the authority of the United States. It was conceived in avowed rebellion, and prosecuted in menace of the Federal authority. Nor was it sustained by the popular will. It had its origin in a mass meeting of one political party, and had the sanction, its advocates say, of seventeen hundred votes at the polls; whilst its enemies say it did not receive exceeding seven hundred votes in all. In no particular, then, does it stand so well as the Lecompton movement, either as to regularity or authority. Nor will the historian be able to understand how a majority of five to one have been so constantly oppressed in that unhappy Territory—how one man has usurped the rights and powers of five or six or ten, as we are told. In one breath it is asserted that the free-State party are as five to one, or ten to one; and in the next, that they have been hunted down, driven from their property, and deprived of their political rights. Some logicians have a convenient mode of making out a proposition; but this is a little too sharp. I have noticed, in the discussion, that Governor Walker is given, by Senators on the other side, as conclusive authority as to the nineteen disfranchised counties; as to the great strength of the free-State party, and the malpractices of the other party; but when he testified officially as to the rebellious movements and the mischievous designs of the Topekaites, his views are promptly discarded and denounced. This is not fair to him, or to the country. The Governor has made up an issue against this party, and it should be met and answered.

But, Mr. President, holding, as I do, that the application of the people of Kansas for admission as a State has been made in due form—that their appearance at the doors of Congress with a constitution and State government is the legal and conclusive evidence of their application for admission, I conclude that an allowable opportunity is presented to admit them as a State; and it is to the alternatives thus presented that I wish to turn my thoughts for a few minutes.

Mr. HARLAN. I rise to a question of order. It is very evident there is not a quorum of Senators present, and I object to any Senator proceeding with the discussion of questions involved in the bill before the Senate.

Mr. BIGLER. I shall be done in a few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. SLIDELL in the chair.) It is the impression of the Chair that the Senator from Pennsylvania was allowed to proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. BIGLER. I yielded the floor to the Senator to explain, not to make objections. I have the floor. I got unanimous consent, and therefore I shall proceed.

Mr. HARLAN. Of course, then, I shall have no further objection.

Mr. BIGLER. I must be allowed to flatter myself with this interruption. I take it the Senator does not like my speech.

Mr. HARLAN. Allow me to explain. I supposed the remarks of the honorable Senator, judging from their applicability, would be better delivered to the Senate than to vacant seats.

Mr. BIGLER. I have no idea that I can say anything that will influence gentlemen of the Senate. They know as much about the subject as do I.

Well, sir, I have held that the application is legal and proper, and that I may vote for the admission of Kansas as a State, if I deem it wise to do so.

On the great question of admission or rejection, I have reflected long and seriously, and am a firm believer in the policy of admission. I think it best for Kansas, and for the whole family of States. And I believe, in addition, sir, that so soon as the popular mind is turned from the unpleasant strife in Kansas—from that war of crimination and recrimination—of alleged fraud and usurpations on the one hand, and persistent rebellion and violence on the other, to contemplate and count the consequences of admission against those of rejection, the measure will encounter much less opposition from the people. What great wrong can flow from admission? What interest or right of the people is to be damaged? Our ears are daily assaulted with graphic descriptions of the great wrong of forcing a government upon the people of Kansas. Yet no one proposes to do this. We make no government for them. They make it for themselves. If they do not like it, after they get into the Union they can abolish it and adopt other forms. No power on the face of the earth, outside of the Territory, will dare to dispute their right to do this. That there is nothing in the constitution to interfere with this right for a single day, has been made so clear by the President, and by Senators, that I shall not discuss it again. It is a little singular, however, that this allegation of the want of power in the people by virtue of their "inalienable and indefeasible right" to alter, amend, or supersede their form of government at pleasure, should come from the advocates, par excellence, of popular sovereignty. Not only in this particular; but as to the right of the people to make a State constitution through the agency of delegates, have these expounders of popular sovereignty sought to impose serious restrictions upon the rights of the people. They would persuade the people that they are on the side of popular rights, whilst in fact their doctrines are the reverse.

But, sir, who can foretell the consequences of the rejection of the State? How will the act be interpreted by the people of the southern States? Will they believe that it was the consequence of the informalities or the want of popular sanction of the constitution, or will they believe that it was the consequence of nominal slavery in the State, and that they are bound to treat it as practical and positive evidence that no more slave States are to be admitted into the Union; that the faith of the compromises of 1850 is not to be carried out? It does not become me to say what they should believe, or what they should do if they believe the worst. I should, for one, hope for the best, and struggle to the end to maintain those fraternal relations between the States under which we have so long grown and prospered as a nation. The State I represent will contend for the just rights of all the States, North or South. She will stand by the Union with the Constitution, and resist the waves of sectionalism, come whence they may. But, sir, it is no difficult task to discover that the rejection of Kansas would tend to the perpetuity and aggravation of this fruitless strife about slavery—this bitter feud, which is so rapidly estranging the feelings of one section of our country from the other, rapidly exhausting those sources of fraternal affection without which your Federal ties would be a rope of sand. I believe in the cultivation of good feeling and affection amongst the people as the greatest agency in maintaining the family of States. That can only be done by dealing justly to all, especially toward the weak. The Constitution must be our bond and our guide. Let the two States of Kansas and Minnesota come in, one slave and one free, as an exemplification of the compromises of 1850, and the beauties of the Democratic faith. This will be wiser than the perpetuity of the war of crimination and recrimination, of assault on the one hand, repulse on the other. But if Kansas be rejected, what will be the truth of history on the subject? Will it be that the State was rejected because the mode of getting it up was not satisfactory, or because the constitution recognized slavery? I am confident some northern members of Congress are going against the admission of the State, who would not do so were the proceedings in Kansas satisfactory to them; but I am still more confident that but for the slavery article the opposition to the admission would scarce have amounted to respectability. On the stand as a witness I could give no other testimony. There may be those who would differ with me in this opinion; but, sir, it is too clear that whilst it is conceded on all hands that Kansas is to be a free State, the shadow of slavery that appears in the constitution is the real cause of hostility to the admission on the Republican side.

Then, again, sir, what would follow in Kansas were she rejected on her present application? Let her be turned over to the tender mercies of General Lane and his followers, and what will they do? Who will guaranty that they will make a constitution that could be accepted by Congress? What reason have we to believe that we should not have a repetition of the scenes of violence and excess that have so far marked the progress of that distracted people? Who believes that Lane and his party would exercise power with moderation? The conduct of the recent Republican Legislature is suggestive on this point. I should be disappointed—agreeably disappointed, sir—if the rejection did not renew and heighten the strife and complications in the Territory. If the one party proceeded to make a State, the other would abstain from all agency in the work. Indeed, one party in the Territory are at this time engaged in electing delegates to another convention, to make another constitution. The other party refuse to participate, and allege that the election is being held without the authority of any law, the Governor having refused to sanction it; so we are to have a new complication. This new convention will be violently anti-slavery; and I shall be amazed if they do not incorporate some extreme anti-slavery feature, having the effect to keep the State out of the Union. They may interrupt the execution of the fugitive-slave law, or confiscate the property in the slaves that are now in the Territory. It is evident that even the Senator from Wisconsin does not like the constitution now before the Senate because it protects the property-value in the slaves now in the Territory. Is this to be the policy? Is this to be an issue? Is it to be held that, under the doctrines of the compromises guarantying to the Territories admission with or without slavery, slave-owners are liable to lose the property-value in slaves whenever a decision is made against the institution? When the people of all the States go to the Territories, carrying with them their property, of whatsoever kind, in case the Territory should become a free State, are the owners of slaves to lose the property-value in such slaves? That has not been my understanding of the policy of the Government. These complications and new issues could scarcely fail to perpetuate this bitter controversy, which is so rapidly uprooting fraternity and confidence between the northern and southern States, and even poisoning the very channels of communication between the people of the several States.

On the other hand, as I have inquired, what evil consequences are to flow from the admission of the State? As was so forcibly remarked the other day by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] what possible wrong do we inflict on the people of Kansas by conferring upon them the rights and dignities of a sovereign State? We hear much about forcing a government upon Kansas; whilst the truth is, she has proposed to come in, and Congress is about to accept her proposition. That is all. It is said the constitution is not acceptable to the will of the majority. Well, sir, that is their business, not ours. If they do not like their fundamental law, they can change it. Some gentlemen talk about this constitution as though it was to be, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unalterable. But so far from this, the question of slavery, like every other feature of the instrument, will be forever subject to the will of the majority. When this issue first came up, in December last, it was a question between admission under the Lecompton constitution on the one hand, and an enabling act on the other. An enabling act—what for? Why, to enable the people to make a State government to suit themselves, the answer is, why not do this under the auspices of a State constitution? I said then, as I say now, the constitution is the best enabling act that the wit of man can devise. It has all the good qualities of an enabling act, without its bad ones. It would terminate, instead of extend, the strife.

Then again, if, as alleged, the popular will has been smothered by this Lecompton party, admission is the most direct mode of complete vindication. It is under a State constitution that popular sovereignty is to have unrestrained sway. It is in this way that it rises to the complete majesty of its power. Those claiming and having that power, can have no well-founded objection to the remedy. Now, the power of the people of Kansas is not equal to the abolition of slavery. Slaves are now in that Territory; slaves can go there and be held there. Congress cannot prevent it. The people, or the majority, cannot prevent it, so long as they remain a Territory. But, when clothed with the sovereignty of a State, they will become equal to the task. I am for admission. I am for giving the people that power. Senators on the other side, whilst claiming a large majority for the free-State party, object to admission; object to giving the people the power to immediately abolish slavery; and yet they will tell me that I am for slavery and they are against it. I seek to confer upon the people the power to abolish slavery. They object, and yet attempt to make the world believe that they are the peculiar friends of a free State. That is much after the plan that their friends in Kansas have used to abolish slavery. They would always vote when they could not vote against slavery. They would not vote for delegates, for their delegates might have rejected slavery. They would not go to the election on the 21st December, because they could have rejected slavery.

Now, sir, a few words more as to popular sovereignty. There are those who hold that, because the constitution was not submitted to a popular vote as an entirety, the process of making it was in violation of popular sovereignty, as recognized in the creed of the Democratic party. That is a fallacious view, unless our representative system be abolished and a common democracy be embraced as the system we prefer. Recognizing the representative system, it is perfectly competent for the people to delegate their sovereign power and authority to a convention to make and adopt a constitution and State government. My State did this; more than half the original States did it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator permit me to utter a paragraph or two more?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I shall want to adjourn then.

Mr. BIGLER. That is another compliment. The Senator does not like my speech.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, I do; I am enjoying it very much.

Mr. BIGLER. It is near three and a half o'clock in the morning, and I have but a few words more.

The doctrine of non-intervention seems to have confused and confounded some people lately. They talk as though Congress had guaranteed that men should not cheat each other in Kansas; as though one political party should not take the advantage of the other; as though representatives should not deceive their constituents. This is more than was bargained for. Congress agreed that they would not interfere with the domestic affairs of the Territories, and that the States, as such, should not interfere; but that was all. It never was pretended that the Federal Government could interfere between the people and their proper local representatives. Nor did Congress guaranty that those who do not vote should carry the election; nor yet that the majority should rule, if they did not do so through the agency of the law. It is the right of the law to rule, and the right of the majority to make the law; but the majority is as much bound by the law, whilst it is such, as is the minority.

I intend to vote for the admission of Kansas as a State; and in doing this I do not wish so much to signify my approval of the manner of getting up the State, and the circumstances surrounding the application, as I do to declare my conviction that admission, prompt admission, is the best and wisest of the alternatives that are before us. There is much in the details of the proceedings in Kansas that is unpleasant and distasteful—partaking of evident abuse of the elective franchise on the one hand, and the attempt to supersede its lawful use by violence and faction on the other. Kansas should not be an example for future States; and I trust our country may never be required to witness such scenes again. But, sir, whatever may be the defects on the Lecompton side, on the other is matured, persistent, and avowed insubordination to the laws, if not rebellion to the Government. Between these, I prefer the former side.

The addition of two members to the family of States should be cause of general joy, as an event bringing fraternal affection, energy, power, stability, progress, and general prosperity, to the family of States and to our common country. That these blessings are to follow the admission of the two States now on the threshold of the Union, I hope and believe.

Now, sir, I have done for the present; and as it is after three o'clock, I think we should vote. [Laughter.] As I have said nothing for a long time, I may claim to close the debate.

Mr. BIGGS. I desire to make a few remarks on this question, and a favorable opportunity being now offered, I avail myself of it.

I at one time expected to participate in the debate at large; but the subject is exhausted by argument, and the country is demanding and expecting prompt action. I had hoped that my respected colleague [Mr. RAN] would have been here before this; and to him I looked to express the voice of North Carolina on this exciting question. But the dispensations of an inscrutable Providence have ordered it otherwise, as he is now confined by a protracted illness at Richmond, Virginia, at which place he was arrested on his way here in the early part of January. He desires me to say that he would cheerfully vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

And, now, Mr. President, what is the state of the question? A constitution is sent to us by the President, adopted under all the forms of law requisite to secure and ascertain the will of the people; a constitution republican in its form; and, although the population of the proposed State is not so large as I would desire, yet it is manifest its admission is the surest and most expeditious mode to preserve peace and quiet, and withdraw from the political arena the source of agitation and discord which threatens a serious disruption of that bond by which we are linked together as a Confederacy—that Confederacy which is the hope and joy of the whole earth, and of all who cherish the love of liberty and the success of free institutions.

My course, therefore, is a plain one. I vote for the admission.

I do not see how the frauds, to which allusion has been made, can affect the question, as now presented. Admit all that has been charged, and deduct such votes from the calculation, and still there is an overwhelming legal majority of the people voting for the constitution. I disclaim the least sympathy for any frauds, or the perpetrators of them. They deserve the emphatic condemnation of all honest men. I frankly confess that, from many circumstances, I have misgivings whether the people of Kansas are of that character from which we may hope for an enlightened self-government; but, upon the whole, it is evident that this measure is the only hope of peace. It is now a contest between law and rebellion; between the supporters of the constitution and the constitutional rights of all the States, and those who, in principle and practice, are opponents of the constitution.

Again: it cannot be denied that the objection that this constitution has not been submitted to a popular vote, is not the true reason that influences the action of the Opposition. The convention that formed this constitution was called by the voice of the people. The convention represented their wishes, and being thus clothed with authority, had a right to submit the result of their labors to a popular vote or not. It is well known that in no case in the formation of a new State, until the case of Minnesota, was its constitution required to be submitted to a popular vote; but a complete answer to this objection is that we have no right to compel this submission. To do so, would violate the great doctrine of non-intervention by Congress.

But to allude to the great objection—this constitution tolerates slavery. It has been distinctly avowed by Senators here—by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] and the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] upon my inquiry—that, if all other objections were removed, this is a sufficient objection.

Now, it will be remembered that at the formation of the Constitution of the United States, slavery was not only recognized and protected in the States, but slavery formed a portion of the domestic policy of every one of the original States; certainly all, with one exception.

Now, I do not propose to discuss the morality of slavery. If it is immoral, upon us rests the responsibility. To those who profess to be over-righteous it is sufficient to say, to your own master will you stand or fall. I am alluding to the political aspect of the question. We formed the Constitution of the United States, all the States being considered and treated as equals, notwithstanding the institution of slavery.

Now, to adopt the principle that you consider a State unworthy of association with you in this Union because it tolerates slavery, raises an issue which, if practically enforced, necessarily works a dissolution of the Union, because it changes the ground upon which the Union was formed, and my purpose now is, briefly but emphatically, to say in behalf of the State I have the honor to represent, that such a conclusion cannot, will not, be submitted to.

I beg gentlemen to recollect that North Carolina never has manifested the least disposition to take an extreme position, which had any tendency to widen the breach between the sections of this Union. In this feeling, as is well known, I fully concur. I do not sympathize with those who desire a dissolution of this Union. I would resort to every honorable means to avoid such a direful calamity; but it is due to candor and frankness to state that the most conciliatory in the South, in my opinion, could not, without a surrender of every honorable instinct, submit, in the practical administration of this Government, to the doctrine that the slaveholding States, or the slaveholders of the States, are inferior and unequal to others, because of their recognition of the institution of slavery. And this alternative is distinctly presented to them when they are told that we are unfit for political association in this Union.

It is evident the extremes are widening. The most prudent and moderate are compelled to look at the question calmly, and examine the tendency of things, if we wish to avoid the catastrophe which we so seriously deprecate. I would, therefore, invoke the moderate and patriotic of all sections never to make such an issue, which it is idle and criminal to suppose can lead to any other result than a dissolution of the Union.

I speak not in the spirit of idle alarm. To those who knew my public course, when I thus speak, I feel sure my convictions and conclusions will be fully appreciated; but I will assure those who do not know that course, speaking, as far as I am authorized, as one of the representatives of North Carolina, that she will never—never! submit to such a degradation, that would humiliate her in her own estimation, and disgrace her in the eyes of the world.

I do not propose to argue the question. I repeat, argument is exhausted. I thought it due to my State, in the absence of my colleague, thus briefly to define my position, and, as I believe, the position of my State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. SLIDELL in the chair.) I will state to the Senator from Maine, that what is equivalent to a call of the House is in process of being enforced by the Sergeant-at-Arms; and I do not consider that a motion to adjourn is now in order.

Mr. HAMLIN. The practice has been the other way always.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I understand that the Sergeant-at-Arms has now sent for various absent members of the Senate, and is expecting their presence here. Although quite inexperienced in these matters, my opinion is that under such circumstances a motion to adjourn is not in order. Having that conviction, I shall not entertain the motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be entertained, as a matter of course.

Mr. PUGH. A motion to adjourn was the last motion made, and therefore this motion is not in order.

Mr. HAMLIN. We have had a speech since.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] has moved that the Senate adjourn. The Chair has given as a reason for not entertaining that motion, that the Sergeant-at-Arms, in the absence of a quorum of the Senate, has been directed under a rule of the body to notify absent members to attend. While he is in the performance of that duty, while Senators are being summoned here for the purpose of making a quorum, the Chair, submitting his views with great deference, because he does not pretend to be at all conversant with the rules, decides that the motion is not in order. From that decision of the Chair the Senator from Maine appeals. The question is now on the appeal.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the appeal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move to lay the appeal on the table. It is altogether wrong. I suppose the object is merely by dilatory motions to take up the valuable time of the Senate. This is a dilatory motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; it is a motion to adjourn. It is not a dilatory motion.

Mr. TOOMBS. I said the appeal was.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; but I want to overrule the decision of the Chair in order to adjourn, so as to advance the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on laying the appeal on the table.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Poik, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, and Wilson—9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal of the Senator from Maine is laid on the table.

Messrs. HAMLIN and FESSENDEN. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. PUGH. This is an appeal taken when no quorum was voting.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But how can you lay it on the table without a quorum?

Mr. TOOMBS. A motion to adjourn, and all motions growing out of that are always in order, and do not require a quorum to decide them.

Mr. HAMLIN. You have just decided a motion to adjourn to be out of order.

Mr. TOOMBS. I say a motion to adjourn by the minority of the Senate, less than a quorum, is not in order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does not appear until you take the vote that there is not a quorum.

Mr. TOOMBS. We have already decided that. Inasmuch as there has been no intervening business since the last motion to adjourn, the Chair decided rightfully, and the Senate affirmed the decision by a very magnificent majority. It is the law of Parliament from this out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Since the original proceedings were taken, members may have come in, and there may be a quorum; and it cannot appear that there is not a quorum until a vote is taken. The vote having been taken by yeas and nays, it appears that there is not a quorum here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair considers that the appeal is merely collateral to the question of adjournment, which the Chair decided could not be entertained in the absence of a quorum. It is a mere consequence of that question. I state again, as I stated before, that I pretend to no familiarity with the rules, but it appears to me to be the dictate of common sense; and I consider the point of order as well taken. I should, however, be much better pleased if the Vice President would take the chair, and relieve the present occupant.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not think there is any necessity for that. The law of Parliament was well laid down by the Chair, and his decision has been sustained by the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does the Chair assume that there is no quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that, in the absence of a quorum of the Senate, the Sergeant-at-Arms having been directed to summon the absent members and request their attendance, no motion for adjournment can be entertained.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then no business can be done, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair considers the appeal dependent on the question of adjournment; and the same number of members who could decide the one question can decide the other.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the Senate will take a recess until half past ten o'clock.

Mr. PUGH. That is not in order.

Mr. BRODERICK. What is in order?

Mr. PUGH. Nothing.

Mr. TOOMBS. Nothing, until we bring in the absent members.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to ask the Chair if a motion to suspend further proceedings under the call of the Senate would be in order?

Mr. TOOMBS. That is not in order, I undertake to say, because all we can do now is to wait for those members who are absent, and let those who are here speak if they choose. That is all that is in order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose we do not want to speak?

Mr. TOOMBS. We can sit and quietly take a doze.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that is the best thing we can do.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire the opinion of the Chair on the question I have asked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that, pending the execution of the order of the Senate to request the attendance of absent Senators, no motion is in order. Gentlemen have been allowed to address the Senate by common consent. If any one member of the Senate had objected, of course that objection would have been valid; but they have thrown themselves upon the courtesy of the Senate, and they have been allowed to speak. If any other gentleman is disposed to speak now, the Chair will, with the unanimous consent of the Senate, permit him to do so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With reference to that, I should like to ask the Chair, by way of conversation, as there is nothing going on, what will be done in a given case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will decide the given case when it arises?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The rule provides that if, when the Senate convene, less than a quorum be present, they may send for absent members. If those absent members are at their several homes at a convenient distance, according to the decision of the Chair, those who have sent for them must wait until they can be brought here, and we cannot adjourn in the mean time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We must sit here day and night until they are gathered from the different parts of the Union. Is that the opinion of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A most admirable decision! It commends itself to the good sense of everybody, I think! I commend the President's courage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And now the Chair would be very happy to be relieved from his arduous duties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Chair performs his duties so well that there is no necessity for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If any gentleman will take the Chair, and it be the pleasure of the Senate, I may as well say now a few words I have to say on the main question.

Mr. GWIN took the chair.

Mr. SLIDELL. The protracted debate on this exciting question is now drawing to a close, and I hope that we shall very soon come to the final vote. The discussion has been so generally participated in by Senators; every point, material or immaterial, has been so thoroughly investigated, that were I disposed to offer an elaborate argument I could not hope to say anything that has not been anticipated by those with whom I concur, if not in all their premises, at least in the conclusions at which they arrive. But I owe it to myself, if not to the State which sent me here, to give, as I shall do very briefly, the reasons that will control my vote. I shall enter into no details, if for no other motive, because I have not the presumption to suppose that at this late hour I could command the attention of a wearied Senate.

I voted reluctantly for the bill that passed this body in July, 1856, by the vote of every Democratic Senator, not that I did not heartily approve the principle on which it was based, but because I was opposed to admitting any new State until

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Slidell.

SENATE.

it had attained at least a population which is established as the basis of representation in the other House. I yielded that point, as I am always prepared to yield on any question of expediency, to the opinions and wishes of the majority of those with whom I am politically associated, and especially to the judgment of the Senator from Illinois, whom we were all then proud to recognize as our leader and champion.

I shall vote for the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, not that I now have, or ever have had, any strong hope that slavery will be permanently established there; but because I feel myself bound to discharge in good faith the obligations which I assumed in 1854 and 1856, and because, should she now be refused admission, I know that, whatever may be the pretext, the real motive is that she has presented to us a constitution recognizing slavery. Some rare exceptions in either House may be found of members honestly casting their votes against her admission on other grounds; but if that admission be now refused, the existence of slavery will be the determining cause, and such will be the unanimous interpretation of the South. We of the slaveholding States can have no reliance for safety in the future but on stern, uncompromising adherence to the absolute, unqualified principle of non-intervention on the part of Congress in the question of slavery. In this case we are the more imperatively called upon to insist upon the application of this doctrine, because we are contending only for the abstract principle, while our opponents will probably enjoy all the immediate party advantages resulting from the admission. It is this circumstance which makes the course of our opponents more offensive to us; with us it is a point of honor—we are struggling for the maintenance of a principle, barren, it is true, of present practical fruits, but indispensable for our future protection—one which we are determined never to yield. You are not willing even that Kansas shall become a free State unless you can at the same time inflict a gratuitous insult on the South. In this I am assuming to be correct the assertion so repeatedly and confidently made, and which in fact forms the staple of nearly all the argument and declamation which we have heard almost daily since the meeting of Congress, that a vast majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to the existence of slavery within her limits. If, then, she be refused admission because it nominally and temporarily exists there, what may we expect when application shall be made by a State of which it will be a real and enduring institution? The scale of political preponderance is constantly gravitating with increased rapidity in favor of the free States. If even now they are disposed to treat us with contumely and injustice, what may we expect when we shall be comparatively weak and defenseless? As yet we have abundant means to protect ourselves from aggression; and if the issue is to be made in our day or that of our children, it is wiser and safer for us to make it now. But we are assured that there is no reason for our apprehensions; that there is no considerable party at the North disposed to interfere with slavery in the States. No one who has observed the course of things here will place the least confidence in these asseverations. They are constantly falsified by the votes of Senators; and, as they gather courage from success, by their deliberate declarations, they now throw off the mask which has heretofore disguised their purposes. I will cite a very recent instance: A bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations to pay from an unexpended balance in the Treasury a sum of money to certain persons for whom it had been received in trust, under a provision of the treaty of Ghent, for slaves carried off by the enemy in the last war with Great Britain. On what ground was it opposed by the senior Senator from New York? On the ground that the proof of loss and ownership was defective, or that the fund was exhausted? No; on the broad, naked ground that the Senator would never by his vote recognize the right of ownership of man in man. His name is consequently found recorded in the negative with those of every Senator of his party present, with the single exception of the Senator from Wisconsin, who sits furthest from me, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.] The same

Senator from New York still more recently said: "I expect to see this Union stand until there shall not be the footprint of a slave impressed upon the soil that it protects." Now, without being disposed to make indiscreet inquiries as to the age of that Senator, I may fairly infer, from the large space he has so long filled in the public eye, that he cannot want more than ten to fifteen years to attain that term which the inspired Psalmist has given as the ordinarily allotted period of human life—threescore and ten. The Senator expects to live to see slavery totally abolished in every State and Territory of the Union—that is, within fifteen years. He, of course, will not pretend to say that the slaves will be voluntarily emancipated in that brief interval. Congressional legislation and the strong arm of executive power must be brought to bear to effect such results; and I presume that the Senator only awaits the admission of a few more free States to initiate his plan of operations. Had these declarations been made by any other Senator, I should have paid but little attention to them; but, coming from his lips, they are peculiarly significant. He is "facile princeps," emphatically the chief of the Abolition party, or, as they please to call themselves, the Republican party. He always weighs well his words, and knows the full import of them; is invariably courteous and respectful in his language and deportment, and carefully abstains from saying anything personally offensive to southern men. It is this very moderation of manner that renders him the more dangerous enemy. What he says, he will act up to should his party obtain the ascendancy. Let us hear no more, then, of our rights being respected by that Senator and his associates, if ever they shall find themselves in a majority in both branches of Congress, with a President of their choice.

The State which I have the honor in part to represent is, from the character of her population, her peculiar geographical position, eminently conservative; the Union has on this floor no more devoted adherent than I am; in this, I obey not only the dictates of my individual judgment and feelings, but faithfully reflect the sentiments of a vast majority of the people of Louisiana. But it is the Union of the Constitution, the union of States having equal rights and privileges—that is the Union to which my allegiance is due, which I have sworn to support, and to which I shall ever be found faithful. I have not belonged to the ultra school of politics. Some, indeed, of my constituents, if asked, would perhaps be disposed to question the entire orthodoxy of my State-rights principles, as not being quite as advanced as theirs. This, however, we will not dispute about. I am willing to be judged by my acts, if unfortunately the time for action shall arrive. But let me tell Senators on the other side, be the shades of opinion among us what they may, that in whatever may touch the rights or honor of the South she will present an undivided front to resist encroachment, be the consequences what they may. As to the slang phrases with which our ears are constantly regaled here, of slave-drivers, slave-breeders, traffickers in human flesh, &c., &c., they excite in us no other feeling than contempt; they are only worthy of consideration inasmuch as they may be supposed to express the feelings and pandering to the passions of a majority of the constituents of those who employ them. A mere looker-on would observe no excitement here or among our people at home; he would perhaps be surprised to find that there were no popular meetings, no indignant speeches, no menacing resolutions. You misconstrue our calmness. The time was when declarations such as I have cited from the Senator from New York would have caused a general cry of angry defiance. We now listen to them with an apparent apathy, which you, perhaps, mistake for indifference. It is this very coolness which, if it were understood, would most alarm that portion of our northern brethren who really love the Union. It is the quiet, fixed, determined purpose, not wasting itself in idle words, infinitely more portentous of evil than the most clamorous demonstrations. Admit Kansas by this bill, and all agitation will cease. In a few short weeks the people of the North will marvel at the excitement produced by a question which to them has really no practical importance. How can it in any way affect their interests, that a few hundred slaves shall be held by their masters in Kansas or in Missouri? The abolition of slavery in Kansas would not give freedom to a solitary being.

And, in this connection, it will be an economy of time for me to say now, that I fully recognize the right of a State Legislature, at all times, to call a convention of delegates of the people for the amendment or total change of an existing constitution, even although that constitution may contain provisions forbidding its amendment for a certain period, and establishing certain formalities and limitations for the exercise of the right. This right of the people of a State to be exercised through the majority of their Legislature is, in my opinion, absolute and inalienable; but were it not so at all times and under all circumstances, it is expressly guaranteed to the people of Kansas by the second article of their bill of rights; besides, I think that, general principles and the bill of rights apart, by the very terms of the constitution it may be amended at pleasure until the last day of December, 1864. Entertaining these views, I am prepared to vote, with a mere verbal correction, for the amendment of the junior Senator from Ohio, or for any other amendment of a similar character—not that I consider it in any degree necessary to guaranty the right of the people of Kansas to alter and amend their constitution in their own time and in their own way, but because it may remove doubts and scruples on the part of others which I do not share. The amendment will not be in any sense a congressional interpretation of the constitution of Kansas, but a mere declaration that it is not our purpose, even by implication, to impair or limit the rights of the people of that State, whatever they may be—a surplussage dictated by an abundant caution, and to which no reasonable objection can be made.

It has been suggested that this may be considered as a compromise. If I thought it in any degree, however slight, the compromise of a principle, it would not receive my assent; but I will not, from the fear of being charged with a disposition to compromise, withhold my vote from an amendment which some of our friends from the free States desire to see incorporated in the bill. They have, in despite of popular clamor and partisan denunciation, stood nobly by us in support of our constitutional rights, and are entitled at our hands to every concession, short of a surrender of principle, which they may ask of us. If we reject this bill, the agitation gotten up by plotting and unscrupulous politicians, operating upon the passions and prejudices of the people of the free States, will be prolonged and aggravated until a peaceful solution of this vital question of slavery will become impossible. We have every reason, so far as material interests are concerned, to be a united and harmonious people; but we cannot shut our eyes to the melancholy fact that at this day there prevails between the masses of the people of the eastern and southern States as deep a feeling of alienation—I might say of animosity—as ever existed between England and France. The fate of this measure will probably decide whether this feeling shall be kept alive and embittered until longer continuance of a connection so distasteful and repulsive to both parties shall be intolerable, or whether we shall strive by a generous emulation in the interchange of good offices, by an abandonment of all irritating subjects of discussion, to become once more what we were in the infancy of the Republic—States sisters in feeling as in name. What I have said of the consequences of the rejection of this bill is in no spirit of bravado or menace; it is uttered more in sorrow than in anger and with a full sense of the responsibility which attaches to it. I anticipate the old clamor of treason and revolution against all who venture to speak the truth on this question; but if it were not told now, it might be too late to avert the danger that threatens the existence of a Union which in better days I was wont to believe would be perpetual.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move that such of the absentees as have presented themselves be called upon for their excuses. I move that the Clerk call the names of such as are present, and that they give their excuses for their absence.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does it require a quorum of the Senate to act on that matter?

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Toombs.

SENATE.

Mr. TOOMBS. Non constat that we have not got a quorum until we vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is precisely what I contended for a short time ago.

Mr. TOOMBS. You were wrong then, and I am right now. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. As the Vice President is in the chair now, perhaps it would not turn out so.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move that the absentees who are present be called upon for their excuse for neglecting the business of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I raise the point that it must first be ascertained that there is a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know that there is a quorum.

Mr. TOOMBS. I wish the Chair would count.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will do it. There are Senators within the walls of the Chamber who are not visible to the Chair.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that we adjourn.

Mr. TOOMBS. That has been decided out of order, and so ruled by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The appeal was laid on the table; there was no decision upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin move that the Senate adjourn?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels obliged to entertain that motion.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not wish to appeal from the Chair's decision; but he has overruled an express decision made a few moments ago, which was confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken. It was not so decided by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I was not in the chair when that question was raised. I understand that a motion to adjourn was made, and was decided to be out of order. An appeal was taken from that decision, and the question was disposed of by the appeal being laid upon the table. The Senate declined to consider it at that time, and laid the appeal on the table. The Chair must entertain the motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—22.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This vote shows the presence of a quorum. When the Senate lost its quorum, the question was on a motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow, which now recurs.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of privilege. I staid here serving the country pretty faithfully until about three o'clock, and then went away, having honestly paired off with a gentleman. I am here again on invitation, and I see the Sergeant-at-Arms here. I want to know if he is executing the order of the Senate on the rest of those who are unfortunately absent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can state to the Senator that he is informed by the Sergeant-at-Arms that he has sent the request which was passed upon motion by the Senate to all the absent members.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think the question of privilege I moved is proper, that we should call on the absentees in their order for their excuses. My friend from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH,] however, suggests that we can probably get a vote on the bill. I withdraw my motion, for the purpose of expediting the business of the Senate, and getting an early vote.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of this question be postponed until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That proposition is already pending.

Mr. WILSON. Well, sir, I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—22.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER, when his name was called, said: I have paired off with the Senator from Texas [Mr. HENDERSON] for to-night. Whether that extends to a matter of this kind I do not know, but I prefer not to vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. [At four o'clock, a. m.] As it is now somewhat early, and we shall have just about time to change our dress, and put ourselves in proper order before breakfast, I move that we take a recess for six hours; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Foster, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—22.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe a motion was submitted by the honorable Senator from Georgia, that the absentees who are now in attendance should render their excuses. I am one of the absentees, and I should like to know what excuse the Senate has to render to me for disturbing me in my peaceful bed, at this hour. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no motion before the Senate on that subject. The Senator from Georgia withdrew his motion. Is the Senate ready for the question? ["Question," "question."]

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—20.

So the Senate (at ten minutes past four o'clock, a. m.) refused to adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate proceed now to hear the excuses of the absentees. I should like to render mine if I can be compelled to do so. I was sent for on the request of the Senate.

Mr. BIGLER. Let me suggest to the Senator that I should like exceedingly to hear a speech on the main question from that side of the House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make my motion, and at the same time I raise the question that the Senate had no authority to request the attendance of, or to send for, absent members.

Mr. PUGH. Is there a quorum of the Senate present?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. Then I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call. I think that is a motion which supersedes the other.

Mr. SEWARD. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think my motion has precedence.

Mr. PUGH. My motion is the previous one, because it supersedes the necessity for that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair may as well give his opinion on this question now as at any other time; and with the leave of the Senate, he will do so, as briefly as he can. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to hear the excuses of the absentees who have come in. There is a clause in the Constitution of the United States, and one of the rules of the Senate bearing on the question, which the Chair will read to the Senate. The Constitution provides that "a majority of each" House "shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide." It will be observed that the Constitution authorizes a minority of each House to compel the attendance of absent members, under such rules as the House may provide; which remits us to the rules of the Senate for the authority. The only rule bearing on the question is the eighth rule, which the Chair will read:

"No member shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. And in case a less number than a quorum of the Senate shall convene, they are hereby authorized to send the Sergeant-at-Arms, or any other person or persons by them authorized, for any or all absent members, as the majority of such members present shall agree, at the expense of such absent members respectively, unless such excuse for non-attendance shall be made as the Senate, when a quorum is convened, shall judge sufficient; and in that case the expense shall be paid out of the contingent fund. And this rule shall apply as well to the first convention of the Senate at the legal time of meeting, as to each day of the session, after the hour has arrived to which the Senate stood adjourned."

It will be observed that this rule of the Senate refers to the convening of the body, which means the coming together, the assembling of the body. The rule does not say that a less number than a quorum are authorized to send the Sergeant-at-Arms for all absent members at any time the Senate may find itself without a quorum, or may happen to be without a quorum; but when the Senate shall convene, less than a quorum may send for absent members. The rule appears to the Chair to be express upon that point; and it goes on to provide that it shall apply as well to the first convention of the Senate, at the legal time of meeting—that is, to the meeting of the Senate at the first day of a session—as to every other convention or coming together of the Senate, as the Chair understands, after or when the hour has arrived to which the Senate stood adjourned.

The Chair does not undertake to do more than to construe the rule to the best of his judgment. He has looked at it with a good deal of care, and this is the construction he feels obliged to put upon it. He does not suppose that if the Senate finds itself with less than a quorum at any time during the progress of a daily session, that the minority of the Senate have the right to send the Sergeant-at-Arms for Senators, at their own expense, unless their excuses are sufficient; but that the rule refers to the assembling, convening, or coming together of the Senate. It may be said that it is an omission, a great lapse; but the Chair can construe the rule in no other way; and he is strengthened in his construction by a very careful review of his own opinion, and the first construction he had given to it. The first clause of the rule says:

"No member shall absent himself from the service of the Senate, without leave of the Senate first obtained."

Undoubtedly, the Senators in question did absent themselves, without leave of the Senate first obtained. They were requested by the Senate to make their appearance; they have done so, and the Chair sees no objection to the Senate requiring those Senators to explain why they absented themselves from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. They are here, and in that view of the case, the Chair will put the motion.

Mr. TOOMBS. The first part of the decision does not come up; if it did, I should take an appeal from it. I hold that not only under this rule, but under all parliamentary law, the body has a right to compel the attendance of its own members. It is a power inherent in every parliamentary body. On the construction of the rule, I differ from the Chair. I think he applies too stringent a construction to the word "convene." The latter part of the rule expressly declares that it applies as well to the first meeting at each session under the Constitution, the first Monday in December, as to the meeting of the Senate on every other day. To hold that that rule was intended merely to apply to our first meeting at twelve o'clock each day, is to give an absurd construction to the rule, to make it inoperative for all intents and purposes; because the moment after you convene each day, the question would not be ascertainable. There is no calling of the roll when the Senate comes to order every morning, to determine who are here.

Independently of that, I say it is a fundamental principle, and the power must inherently belong to every body to compel the attendance of its own members. It is so laid down in Mr. Jefferson's Manual. Besides, the Constitution specially provides that less than a majority can send for absentees. That a majority can prevent it is clear. The whole rule is to be taken together. According to the first portion of it, a member cannot absent himself without leave of the Senate. I do not see any necessity for the first portion of the Chair's decision in regard to the power to send for absentees, but if that is to be held to be the law of Parliament, I wish to enter my protest against it; and I would take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but for the fact that the decision does not prevent the putting of the motion, and, therefore, it does not properly come up here. I wish to enter this protest now against such a construction of the rule. Even, however, if the rule had no wider construction than the Chair gives to it, the law of Parliament would stand, for that is to be our guide whenever our rules do not meet the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair arrives at his conclusion by simply construing the Constitution and the rules, from which he supposes the only authority for this proceeding to be derived. The Chair will put the question.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair perhaps did not distinctly understand the motion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] and may have gone further in expressing his opinion than was absolutely necessary on the motion raised. He thought, however, that his response was pertinent to the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I made a motion, and at the same time questioned the authority of the Senate to order the attendance of members, and requested the opinion of the Chair on that subject. The Chair has given it. His opinion being, as I understand, that the Senate has no authority under the rules to do so, I withdraw the motion I made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires the Senate to understand what he has said. The first part of the eighth rule provides that no member shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained; and he supposes it is in the power of the Senate, there being now a quorum present, to hear from those Senators why they left without leave of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I understand the Chair, there being no power under that rule to enforce the attendance of members, no excuses are necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair held that, during the progress of the day's session, a minority, less number than a quorum, could not, through the Sergeant-at-Arms, compel the attendance of members until the regular period of convening; but certain Senators absented themselves from the Senate without leave of the body. There is a quorum now present, and it is in the power of the Senate, if it chooses, to hear explanations from those Senators on that point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no penalty provided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see any penalty provided.

Mr. HALE. I was one of those who came back upon an invitation or a suggestion; and, if it was the pleasure of the Senate to hear me, I could give, I think, a very satisfactory reason. As this is a voluntary matter, however, I think that those who have invited us to make this explanation ought to begin and make a clean breast of it themselves. Above all, I should like to hear the Senator from Georgia, who made this motion, explain why he has been absent heretofore. If I remember aright, he was absent at the commencement of this session for several days. I would not insist that there was any power to compel him to be here; but, as I am now here on invitation, I should like to have him explain his absence heretofore, before I explain mine now.

Mr. TOOMBS. No such fact appears by the record.

Mr. HALE. It is the fact, though.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is a question in pais; it is an issuable matter. I by no means concede your allegation.

Mr. COLLAMER and Mr. HAMLIN. The first appearance of a Senator is on the record.

Mr. SEWARD. It will appear by the record that the Senator from Georgia—I do not mean to censure him for his absence—was not in attendance on the Senate for a period of about a month.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The public business was suffering very much on account of it.

Mr. SEWARD. There was great inquiry where the Senator was. I think the record shows the fact I have stated, and I should be very glad to know that there was a reasonable excuse for the Senator from Georgia absenting himself from the Senate without leave.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have not been sent for; nor has it been made to appear that I have been absent without leave. I do not respond in the Senate to any improper questions by members of the body. I will respond to the body when a question is put to me by its authority; but if these gentlemen want to inquire about any of my private affairs, they must do it out of doors, and I shall be ready at all times to respond to them with pleasure. I am responsible out of doors for anything I do out of doors. I shall respond to the Senate on any call they may make on me, but not to individual members in this body.

Mr. HALE. I propose to amend the motion so as to make it so broad as to cover all those who have been absent at any time during this session without leave of the Senate first had and obtained.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am willing to give my excuse for having been absent.

Mr. SEWARD. I think the honorable Senator is out of order in giving an excuse for his absence.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to tell the truth, and I may as well tell it now as at any time.

Mr. SEWARD. It is not in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is out of order I will take my seat.

Mr. PUGH. I move to lay the motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the motion to the Senate, but it is obvious that the essence of this question rests on the first decision the Chair made.

Mr. FITCH. Is that decision matter of record?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator from Ohio moves to lay the motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was moved and seconded that the Senate proceed to hear the excuses of the absent members who have come in upon the invitation of the Senate, to which an amendment was offered to include all Senators who have been absent without the leave of the body during the session. The Chair believes that was the motion. The Senator from Ohio moves to lay the motion and the amendment on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President—

Mr. PUGH. I object to any debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Vermont, not knowing what he desires to say.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to raise a question of order. I do not know that the authority of the Senator from Ohio is imperative on me to keep silent. He speaks, however, as if it was ex cathedra.

Mr. PUGH. No, sir; but I object to any debate on the motion. It is not debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont gave notice to the Chair that he was rising to a question of order. The Chair must hear it.

Mr. PUGH. If he rises to a question of order, I do not object.

Mr. COLLAMER. Is it possible you do not object to that?

Mr. PUGH. The Senator need not take on so. I have a right to object until the Senator says that he rises to a question of order; and I am not to be deterred from my right by any expression, either of manner or language, from the Senator, or any one else.

Mr. COLLAMER. I guess you are as much deterred as I am.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The colloquy between the Senators is irregular.

Mr. COLLAMER. The question I wish to raise is this: a rule of the Senate provides that Senators shall not absent themselves without the consent of the Senate first obtained; and I wish to know whether in this manner that rule can be complied with by calling in members and receiving their excuses? Those of us who have come here, have come here by mere invitation.

Mr. GREEN. That is not a question of order.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish gentlemen to hear me until the question arises. I insist as a question of order, if I must state it to begin with, that, when proceedings are to be taken against a Senator for absenting himself without consent of the Senate, it must be by some regular proceeding against him; and it cannot be taken in this manner, as you render excuses in the case of a call. If a Senator is voluntarily absent and voluntarily comes in, I take it, as a point of order, that he cannot be called on to give an excuse in this way. It must be by a regular proceeding for the purpose.

Mr. GREEN. That is not a question of order. The motion is to lay the whole matter on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will let the Senate decide that question of order by their votes. If the Senate think the mode is unsuitable, they will vote it down. It is a mode that the Chair takes of submitting the question of order to the Senate. The question is on laying the motion and amendment on the table.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Fessenden, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Silldell, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, Wilson, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Dixon, and Simmons—3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, the proceedings which are now taking place before the Senate, appear to be of a character that require some slight exposition, so that they may go before the country. I consider that a revolution has commenced, and commenced in this Hall—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I call the Senator to order. There is no question before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. There is no Senate here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am going to address the President and the members present, on the very subject of the absence of a quorum. That is exactly what I am about.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is no question.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have a right to call the attention of the Senate to the facts, and suggest a remedy to get a quorum together.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I submit that the Senator has no right to speak, unless on some motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes, if Senators insist on it, that but two courses are left—one to adjourn, and the other to request the attendance of absent members.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I shall move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be sent to request the presence of the absent members, and on that motion I proceed to make the remarks I intended to make. I say, sir, that, in my judgment, it is necessary that a correct understanding of the position in which the public business of the country is arrested by this incipient revolution, should be known to the people.

Mr. President, this is no ordinary condition of things. A public measure is before the Senate. It is before us for action. The majority of the Senate is ready to act upon it. The minority say, in point of fact, in substance and essence, to the majority, "this business shall not be acted upon at all; we do not complain that we are not allowed to speak on the question before the Senate: that you allow us; we do not complain that every parliamentary privilege of amendment, which any license of debate could suggest, is not allowed us:

that you also allow us; the question is before the Senate; we say this to you simply, being in a minority, we do not choose that the public business shall go on; you shall not do it; the public business shall not be done; this bill shall not be acted upon; we have nothing to ask in relation to it; but we stand here and say, the public business shall be arrested at our beck and pleasure."

It becomes a serious question in these circumstances what the majority is to do. Ordinarily, in representative assemblies, there are rules; frequently these rules are perverted to the detriment of the rights of a minority; minorities often complain that the majority are trampling upon their rights, refusing them an opportunity of debating the pending question, or refusing them an opportunity of suggesting such amendments to the pending business, the bill before the body, as they may think proper to suggest. In our body there is nothing of the kind. Relying upon a sense of public duty, relying that gentlemen who reach this Chamber require nothing but a sense of the duty they owe their countrymen, and patriotism to do the public business, our rules allow unlimited discretion. For the first time in the history of the country, a minority abuses that unlimited license, by saying to the majority, "you shall not go on with the public business except in a manner to suit us; you shall not take a vote on the bill; you shall not discuss the bill; we of the minority give you these orders."

Now, sir, this revolution having already commenced by the party known as the Republican party in the Senate the question is submitted for the serious consideration of the majority. A mere physical contest never was contemplated as a legitimate means of determining the public business of the country. How long is this to last? How long is it consistent with the dignity of the majority to permit it to last? And what is the remedy?

Mr. President, for hours the factious minority of this Senate have folded their arms, and pursued the course which I have just mentioned. I know of but one remedy; my reflections on the subject suggest to me but one thing to do. It is for the majority of the Senate to leave this Hall, and, with a message left behind to the minority that when they will please to permit the business of the country to go on, and will send us word, we will come back, leaving it to them to break up the Government. I know of no other course.

What is to be done? Shall we sit here taking yeas and nays alternately on motions to adjourn, to take a recess, to postpone; to adjourn, to take a recess, to postpone; to adjourn, to postpone, to take a recess; without a solitary reason for one of these motions but the simple declaration by the minority, "you shall not do the public business; we will not speak; we will not vote; we will not debate; we will not offer an amendment; you shall not do the business of the country." That is the proposition now of the minority. If there is no inherent power in the majority to force a conclusion to this, then, I say, clearly a revolution has commenced in the Government, and the country should know it. In order that the country may know it, as we have no rules for such a case, I see but one course for the majority—to make a formal declaration to the minority that they will leave them in possession of the Senate Chamber, power over which they usurp to prevent the business of the country being done; to tell them when they are ready to go on with the business of the Government, and will inform us, we shall be ready to come back. Upon them be the responsibility of stopping the public business of the country, stopping it short, placing it in a position where nothing whatever can be done.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish to put the Senator from Louisiana right in a matter of history, and the history of this body. If this is a revolution, it is not the beginning. In the summer of 1848, when the bill for organizing the territorial government of Oregon was before this body, there was a clear majority of the Senate for applying what was then called the Wilmot proviso, or anti-slavery ordinance to that bill. We came into this House at ten o'clock on a Saturday morning; and the minority in the Senate at that time were not those who were contending, as we are now, against what we consider to be the aggression of the slave power. I do not want to put it in any offensive shape; but the majority then was the anti-slavery party, and the minority were those who are opposed to it; and that minority took just exactly the course which the honorable Senator has indicated—speaking against time, and making motions to adjourn; and they kept that majority here from ten o'clock on Saturday morning until about ten o'clock on Sunday morning. The minority at that time were those who were opposed to the anti-slavery ordinance which was affixed to that bill. I do not see at this moment any member of the Senate now present who was then a member of the body.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was here.

Mr. HALE. The honorable Senator from Maine was present at that time; I had forgotten it. But, sir, the revolution, if it was a revolution, commenced long ago—ten years ago; and this mode of doing business, which the honorable Senator from Louisiana denounces, does not claim the paternity of the gentlemen who are now using it; but it was a game that was played then, and played by the very men who are now complaining of it. I say, therefore, that whatever of censure that honorable gentleman or his friends have to visit upon this course should be visited upon those who inaugurated and commenced this business in the Senate, and not upon those who have taken it up second-hand.

But, sir, I make a single suggestion further, if I may be so fortunate as to let what I say fall on as candid ears as I hope I address. I do not wish to repeat over and over again what has been so often said; but I think that, whether it was inaugurated by us or by others, the present minority are not obnoxious to the censure which the honorable Senator from Louisiana so eloquently and fluently attributes to us; and, for the humble part that I have in it, I have no fears of its going before an enlightened country. Sir, there is a right of debate, and there is a right of debate at seasonable hours; and as long as there has been no disposition manifested (and such a disposition has been disclaimed over and over and over again) of abusing the right of debate, but simply a disposition expressed to use it fairly, it seems to me that this complaint illy comes from those who are forcing us into such hours of the night as these, for the purpose of discussion. Having said this, I take my seat.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from Louisiana. So far as regards myself, I have not acted, and I mean not to act, without consideration. My relations to this matter I have considered as coolly and deliberately as I could. Since this course was resolved upon, I have reflected upon the position in which I stand, as one of the Senators of the United States, before the country, and the responsibilities which I assume by the course I have taken. Having considered all these things, and having acted, I trust it is not necessary for me to say to that honorable Senator, and to others, that I am ready to meet before the country the responsibility of my course.

Sir, I am opposed, as a general rule, to this kind of action; and I regret, as much as any one can regret, that it has become absolutely necessary to resort to this course in order to protect the rights of the minority. What has this majority attempted to do? Let the country understand it rightly. They come into this Chamber when this bill is under discussion, and announce to us that we must have a permanent sitting until it is disposed of, unless we will make certain stipulations. On this side of the Chamber we tell them to a man—for there is nobody who objects to it—we tell them in the face of the country, that we desire to discuss the question; that we do not wish to waste the time of the Senate; that we simply want opportunities for a full and fair discussion by all those gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who desire to speak, and to express their opinions. We have offered them our pledge that as soon as that is done, we shall be ready to take the vote; and that in doing it we will not attempt to speak against time, as it is called; that is, protract the time for the mere purpose of debate. It has been said, over and over again, that the moment we attempt anything of that kind we shall have no blame to cast on the other side for forcing a permanent sitting. What is the reply you make to us? "We cannot accede to these terms unless you fix a time, and a time to be designated within certain limits, and agree, as honorable men, to be bound by that time." We say to them that time is not sufficient, in our judgment; but if you will let us adjourn only over one night, until we can have a meeting and consultation among ourselves, and see what time we shall require, we will then make a proposal to you with reference to that matter. It is peremptorily denied. The majority offer us these terms, and these alone: "agree to take the vote within a certain time, or you must sit until this question is settled."

Mr. GREEN. You have had an opportunity to meet and consult.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have had no opportunity to meet. We have asked barely for an adjournment, and that after the notice was given at five o'clock in the afternoon, or between four and five o'clock, that this sitting was to be permanent until the question was taken.

Mr. GREEN. It was given to you seven days ago.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Given seven days ago! And yet at the same time we were told by more than one honorable Senator that the design only was to give us an intimation that we must not waste time, that it was not designed to enforce it.

Mr. GREEN. You did waste time.

Mr. HAMMOND. What Senator had a right to say that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. My statement will not be denied by any Senator, I am sure.

Mr. GREEN. I will not deny it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was said by more than one Senator, and said to me. I went on with that understanding. I have wasted no time of the Senate in speaking. I know of no Senator on this side who has—certainly none until this evening, if you call it a waste, when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] spoke longer than he otherwise would have done, perhaps, because it was the design of the Senate to force the question through to-night. That was the beginning of it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Allow me to ask a question. I ask the Senator from Maine what the minority propose to do. He tells us what the minority want. The majority will not do what he asks. I should like to ask him whether the minority then means that no business of any kind shall ever be done until the majority will do for them just what they want.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; I do not mean any such thing; but it is a question before the country, and to go to the country, whether or not what we ask now in reference to this matter is, or is not, reasonable; and I am willing to go to the country upon it.

Mr. GREEN. What then?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must remind the Senator from Missouri that if he desires to interrupt the Senator from Maine, he must do so through the Chair. These colloquies waste time, and sometimes lead to unpleasantnesses.

Mr. GREEN. I have not the least disposition of that kind in the world, and I thought that the Senator from Maine would appreciate my question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I take no exception to it at all.

Mr. GREEN. I knew he would take no exception; for we are on the best of terms, and I wished only to call his attention to the point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I take no exception to what the Senator did. I was about to state that every case must stand by itself. The Senator from Louisiana asks whether I assume as a principle that the minority must impose its terms on the majority, and unless the majority agree to them, stop business? I say, emphatically, "no!"

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would inquire of the Senator what the minority proposes to do?

Mr. FESSENDEN. What the minority proposes to do now? It is very late, and the Senator will see what condition we are in. What we did propose was simply that the Senate adjourn over until to-morrow.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator misunderstands my question. I take it for granted now, as a matter of course, that the majority will not grant any of the terms the minority asks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We do not ask it now.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Or that the minority may propose, I take it for granted, now. This is my point—a mere point of argument, the Senator will understand me—that the majority is determined to sit out this question until it is closed. The Senator says he wants to go to the country on it. My question is simply a parliamentary question in what way he proposes to go to the country upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh; I was answering the suggestion of the Senator that here was a question of a revolution.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Exactly. So I think.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A revolution that had commenced; and necessarily, if a revolution has commenced, the majority of the Senate take what course they see fit to take, and the question would arise for the people of this country to settle by and by who were right and who were wrong—

Mr. BENJAMIN. Exactly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Whether we demanded too much, or whether the majority exacted too much. That is all. Now, as to what we propose to do, I will answer the Senator.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is the point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the majority chooses to accede to the idea of the honorable Senator and go out of the Chamber, and leave the minority in possession of it, the minority will adjourn the Senate until to-morrow morning at twelve o'clock, the regular hour of meeting; and when that time comes they will appear here, and being convened—if the majority comes so as to make a quorum—we shall be able to go along and do the business of the country as well as we can. If the majority do not choose to come, I do not know whether we shall have any power to compel their attendance.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator still does not understand me. I say, suppose the majority continue their present course—not what I suggested, but just what has been going on all night—what then is the remedy the minority propose?

Mr. FESSENDEN. We propose no remedy at all. We leave the majority to find the remedy themselves, whether they will take the remedy suggested by the Senator from Louisiana or some other. We were notified substantially by the honorable Senator from Georgia that this was a question of physical endurance. We have accepted that challenge so far as that was concerned, and the battle seems now to be going on. For my part, I do not feel disposed to shrink from it.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, I wish to place this matter right by some few observations on the motion that is before the Senate, and I want to put the Senator from New Hampshire right. I think his history is entirely wrong. I was a member of Congress at the time when the question to which he alludes was debated. Gentlemen object that we are sitting all night on this question. I have known that to be done twenty times since I have been a member. Debating questions at night is the ordinary parliamentary mode, except with the present Black Republicans. They are the only people who will not discuss at night that I have met here, and I have been here thirteen years. I have never known a bill of this kind, or any of its cognate questions, that was disposed of without a debate at night. I have never known an important vote taken on questions connected with slavery, at least without a night session. The idea of physical endurance, as it is termed, is all the time presented to us. The minority will not permit any legislation without some difficulties; they have never permitted it since I have been a member of the body. The only pretense of complaint of the Republican party here is that you will not let them discuss the matter. When such efforts as these have been made in the other House, it has been charged there that the majority wanted to take the minority by surprise, or that one party sought to take a vote in the casual absence of a portion of the majority, or that they were attempting to break down the right of debate. Here unlimited debate is offered. The Opposition say they will not debate the question; they will debate anything else; they will debate physical endurance; they will debate putting it off until to-morrow; but they will not debate the question. The point is not that we will not give them time, for we offer them just as much as they want; but they say we must give them time to talk in what they choose to call regular, usual, reasonable hours. I should like to know what are the usual hours. From one o'clock to four? The declaration is made that no other public business can be done until we allow them to deliver the number of speeches they tell us about, within what they call the usual hours? The House of Representatives, and every other legislative body that I have known in modern times, has had a power in the hands of the majority, whenever they are satisfied with the argument, to take the question. It is a new idea, it is the idea of the Republican party that this Hall is a conduit pipe in order to spirt their speeches upon the public. It does not belong to parliamentary law; for in all parliamentary bodies, when the majority are satisfied, they have the means of taking the vote. Are there any higher rights of debate here than in the House of Representatives? Has not that House the means of stopping debate peremptorily, in a moment? Did not the Republican party, when they had the power in that House during the last Congress, exercise the right given by the rules to stop debate? Have not their opponents exercised it? Has it not been adjudged by both parties in the country, for the last fifteen years, that this power of a majority is a rightful and proper power? Everybody but the Senate has deemed such a power necessary. The House of Representatives has gone further, and instead of allowing a speech of two days, as we do, has provided that no speech shall exceed one hour; and I believe that is as old a rule as the time of Demosthenes. That great popular assembly, the immediate representatives of the people, have put this restriction on themselves, and it has become American common law, sanctioned by all legislative bodies, that debate shall be restricted to one hour to those who speak; and that the very instant the majority of the House says debate ought to stop, it shall stop. The House of Representatives applies the previous question for that purpose; and even when a measure is pending in Committee of the Whole, a majority can take it out. These gentlemen are now availing themselves of the fact that the Senate of the United States, from 1789 until this time, has been composed of gentlemen who acknowledged the right of a majority charged with the public business to discharge it, and has therefore had no previous question. This is an omission that grew up somewhat like the fact related in Roman history, that there was no law in Rome for centuries against parricide; for it was a crime so horrible that it was not supposed to be possible. Debate has been unrestricted here, and no coercive measures of the majority have been passed in this body, on the same great principle that it was supposed the representatives of the sovereign States of this Union were incapable of arresting this legitimate power, this necessary power, of the majority, exercised by all bodies, and by more numerous bodies, with positive restricted rules.

Now, I come back to the question. As I stated when I was up once before, we commenced this debate on the 9th day of December. From that time to this, everybody has spoken on this question who desired to speak. This bill has now been directly before the Senate for one whole month, less three days. It has been continually urged by the majority. The minority voted against making it a special order at an early day. I recollect very well that when it was proposed to make it the special order for the Thursday succeeding its introduction the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] insisted on its going over until Monday. They delayed the taking it up; they delayed the time of acting on it; they adjourned soon, whenever it could be done; they adjourned from Thursday to Monday; and now they come to us and say, "we will go to the country on this question." Three months, the ordinary duration of the short session of Congress, have been open to them. They have not been restricted in debate. The popular branch restrains every speech to an hour, and the majority there has absolute power to close the debate on any question whenever they please. This principle is acknowledged by all the parties which have been uppermost in this body since the foundation of the Government. I believe the previous question existed in the House of Representatives from the beginning, but it was not much enforced until twenty or thirty years ago. The hour rule was adopted in 1841; and the rule allowing a bill to be taken out of Committee of the Whole about 1845, or 1846—since my connection with the public service. The right of thirty, or forty, or fifty Senators to speak on a subject does not exist, and it ought never to be granted. It is impossible that the public business can go on with such a state of things. If gentlemen desire to address their constituents it should be done in another form. Bills, measures before us, should be discussed here. We all know to what this will lead.

As to the remedy, I do not agree with my friend from Louisiana; but I say that the Senate should do no other business; and for that purpose I shall move, if I can get the concurrence of my own friends, that this bill lie on the table, and nothing be done until the business of the House is put in the power of the majority by the previous question. That is the first, the last, and the only business this House should do until they get control of the business of the country. That is my judgment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no disposition to prolong this debate; but inasmuch as I was absent, and there seems to be some reflection cast on those who were absent and left the Senate without a quorum, I wish to make a suggestion. This matter has now assumed a different aspect; and the majority of the Senate desire, as I understand the explanation of the Senator from Louisiana, to put the case before the country—alluding, I suppose, to those who happened to be absent from physical necessity. He proposes to raise the question in the Senate, and suggests to the majority of the Senate to commence the business of revolution in this country by leaving this body without a quorum. It is well known that the majority party in the Senate is unusually large; they have two to our one. I had supposed that there was a sort of tacit understanding that we should sit six hours a day; and the Senator from Texas proposed that we should begin our daily sessions hereafter at eleven o'clock, and that was laid over. At the hour of six o'clock, last evening, when I had sat here six hours, I proposed an adjournment, supposing that was the understanding of the majority. It was refused. Having put myself under the care of a physician, I had to submit to his rules; and although I wanted to stay here as long as endurance would permit, I had to leave the Senate Chamber. When I came back at the request of the Senate I was ready to give my excuse, but the Senator from Louisiana voted down a proposition to enable me to do so. I voted not to lay these motions on the table, because I desired to make an excuse to the Senate.

The Senator from Louisiana now proposes to the forty-odd members of this body composing the majority, to withdraw and leave the responsibility on the minority. That is a most singular proposition to go before this country upon. The friends of the Administration in power have two thirds of the Senate; and unless they can have their own way about transacting the business of the Senate, they propose to leave the body without a quorum, pretending at the same time that the minority are revolutionary in their conduct because some of us are too sick to stay here to undergo a trial of physical endurance, when they can outvote us and half of them asleep!

Sir, I do not choose to submit to the imputation of being disposed to be factious when I leave here from mere physical inability to remain. I make no factious opposition in this body, or in any other body. If I had known that the rule of the Senate required it, I should have felt it my duty to ask leave of absence from the Senate while I could take the necessary rest to secure my health. I shall do that hereafter. No man in this body, no man in this country, shall ever have an opportunity to make such an imputation upon me as that I undertook to break down the deliberate action of this body. If men caucus, and choose to try a contest of physical endurance here, let the responsibility be with them, not with me. I never did such a thing in my life, and I never will do it.

But, sir, it is not possible for men to sit here always. It is a most unreasonable request to ask Senators to remain here during the twenty-four hours of the day, to talk to empty benches, while gentlemen of the majority may go away and rest part of the time, having watchmen to wake them up when the yeas and nays are called. Sir, I should have attempted to address the Senate on this bill before now, but I have often seen gentlemen on this side of the Chamber addressing empty benches on the other side. I attempted to get the floor in an irregular manner to make a few suggestions on this question, early in the session, but we were implored to let the Army bill pass, and let the President's message go by, and withhold our remarks until the Kansas bill should come regularly before us. I always take such a suggestion as conclusive on me, because I think that is the most proper way to debate a question in the Senate. I have not said a word on this subject since the commencement of the session, and I have refrained at the suggestion of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, who said it was more appropriate that the debate should be deferred until the measure was fairly before us. I desire at some proper time to say something upon this bill; I do not mean to occupy a great deal of the time of the Senate, on any question; but I desire to speak, because a great many imputations have been cast upon those with whom it is my pride and pleasure to act. We are told that this man speaks our sentiments, and that man speaks our sentiments. Sir, no man speaks my sentiments in this body, unless it is the Senator from Rhode Island, on this side of the Chamber. I do not converse with others about their purposes; but I do not believe there has been entertained on this side of the Chamber a purpose to protract this debate one minute longer than was necessary to give us a fair opportunity to lay before our fellow-Senators the convictions of our own minds on the important subject now before the Senate. Whenever we waste an hour, or a moment of the Senate's time in any idle purpose of debate here, for display elsewhere, or use this body as a conduit pipe, as the Senator from Georgia chooses to call it, to spout out speeches for the people, I will take my leave of this body before I will ever disgrace it by any such purpose.

I hope and trust that, having been physically unable to attend here, my absence will not be imputed to any factious purpose, and that Senators who hold the power in their hands will not now, at half past four o'clock in the morning, entertain a proposition to break up this Government by absenting themselves from the Senate of the United States. It is a proposition that I never heard made in this body before. I regret that it has been made now, and especially made with the view of placing this matter before the country. In my judgment, the most acceptable way that the Senate can place it before the country is to do its business orderly, respectfully to each other, and with a single regard to the interest and welfare of our common country.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before the Senator from Massachusetts proceeds, the Chair will ask the Senator from Louisiana to restate his motion. We have been without a quorum for three quarters of an hour, and all this debate has been irregular. The Chair has not arrested it, because it seemed that the Senate might as well debate as vote. The Chair will request the Senator from Louisiana to restate his motion before the Senator from Massachusetts proceeds.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The motion I made was for the purpose of meeting a point of order that some gentleman was kind enough to spring upon me, and I withdraw it now. I really do not exactly remember what it was. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. It was a proper motion to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of absentees.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw the motion. I do not want to send the Sergeant-at-Arms out unnecessarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the Senator from Massachusetts, and the condition of affairs now is that there is no quorum present, and no motion before the body.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say a word or two. Mr. BENJAMIN. I think there is a quorum in the Senate obviously now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is any suggestion of that kind, the Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think there is a quorum in the room. I suggest that the pages step into the ante-chamber, and call in Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are twenty-eight Senators in the Chamber.

Mr. GREEN. And three in the passage, behind the chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That makes thirty-one.

Mr. FITCH. And there are two on the sofas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a quorum, then, within the walls.

Mr. WILSON. I believe there is no motion before the Senate.

Mr. PUGH. The appeal is before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. But no particular motion. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, at half past twelve o'clock, and on that motion I wish to say a word or two. I desire to say to the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Georgia that if anybody here expects to make anything before the country upon what has transpired here to-night, for or against it, I think he will be mistaken. I am willing to take my share of the responsibility of this night. I am willing also to go to the country on the question before the Senate. What are the facts of the case? They are upon the record. The Senator from Missouri gave a sacred pledge to the Senate that we should have a full and fair opportunity to discuss this measure. Well, sir, eleven days have now been passed in its discussion. Twelve speeches have been made for the bill, eight speeches against it. I am informed personally by Senators who desire to speak, that there are fourteen who intend to speak—some of them will make short speeches, and some of them probably two-hour speeches—in opposition to the bill; and I am told that there are three or four Senators on the other side who intend to speak.

Now, sir, I want to say another thing. The Senator from Missouri made an appeal to me to-night in regard to his words to-day. I understand the fact to be that there was a meeting this morning—I speak legislatively—of the Democratic Senators.

Mr. GREEN. That is right.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Missouri came to my seat this morning, and said to me what he has stated, that he came as plenipotentiary, and wanted to know what I desired. I said to the Senator, as he will bear me witness, in good faith and in the kindest spirit, that I thought, from what we knew of the facts, we might close in the middle of next week; he thought we could not go beyond this week any way. I said to him, then let the debate go on, and towards the close of the week we can tell what to do.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN. My only object is to ask the Senator this one single question: whether I undertook to dictate and demand anything of him?

Mr. WILSON. I say very frankly, so far as any conversation I had with the Senator this morning is concerned, there was no dictation whatever.

Mr. GREEN. That is true.

Mr. WILSON. On the contrary, the language of the Senator towards me personally was of the kindest nature; and I think he will bear testimony that my answers were frank and kind.

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I have no other feeling, I can assure the Senator, towards him or any other member of the Senate. Last Saturday the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] came to my seat and brought me the roll of the Senate, and said he found the names of twenty-three Senators there who, he thought, were going to speak, and asked me what I knew about them? I gave him what information I had; and I came to the conclusion that altogether, for and against this bill, there would be about twenty-one or twenty-two speeches to make when we commenced this week.

I conversed with Senators in regard to it, and I thought, as a matter of course, that at least this week would be allowed for debate. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SIMMONS] has been lately quite unwell; but he is as much entitled to be heard as the Senator from Louisiana, who addressed us so ably the other day. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] has been confined to his room by sickness for several days. He told me very frankly that he did not believe the condition of his health was such as to allow him to speak this week, but that he would try to be here and speak on Monday, and he supposed the Senator from Missouri would reply to him. He thought, as there were so many speeches to be made, that it would be fair to make an arrangement to close the debate on Wednesday of next week. I think the debate may be closed on Monday, or early on Tuesday, and then the amendments will occupy a brief time.

Mr. GREEN. Would that be fair to me? Would it give me the same opportunity as the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WILSON. I think so. Let me say to the Senator from Missouri, that I think his chances are far better. Both he and the Senator from Illinois have had this matter in mind all this session; they have studied it. One of them is here in the vigor of health, and has watched the whole proceedings; the other has been confined to his bed for days by sickness.

Mr. GREEN. He has been here to-night.

Mr. WILSON. He came here to-night at the peril of his health; and any man who saw him, any man who took his hand, perceived at once that he was not in a fit condition to be here. He said to me to-night, that he had not read a paper, or examined anything, for days; that he had written a letter this very day, and it had caused a reaction. That Senator says he cannot come here until Monday.

Supposing that this debate was to go on, believing from what was said on all sides that the Senate would adjourn about six o'clock in the evening, we were surprised to find the Senator from Missouri proposing, at half past four o'clock, when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] got the floor, to take a recess until seven o'clock. I thought, and others of us thought, it was better not to take a recess, but to let the Senator from New Hampshire speak until six o'clock and then ask for an adjournment. At six o'clock we asked for an adjournment, but it was refused for the reason, as I supposed, that the disposition was to let him finish his speech. The Senator's colleague [Mr. POLK] stated that if the Senator from New Hampshire would finish his speech he thought it would then be fair to adjourn. The Senator from Illinois went home with the understanding that when the Senator from New Hampshire should close, the Senate would adjourn. We so understood it; but when he closed, the Senate refused to adjourn. Then the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] stated fully and distinctly what we wanted—that we desired to have an opportunity for consultation to-morrow to see when we could close the debate. He said he believed we could close it by Monday next, and I have not a doubt about it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is one fact which the Senator from Massachusetts forgets; and I will merely mention it. The colleague of the Senator from Maine, when appealed to, declared that he would not bind himself personally not to go on with this very action to-morrow night again.

Mr. WILSON. I think there was some misunderstanding in regard to that matter.

Mr. BENJAMIN. None whatever.

Mr. WILSON. I have said to Senators on the other side that we called a meeting of our friends for eleven o'clock to-morrow, with the expectation that the counsels of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] were to prevail, at which meeting we are to take the matter into consideration. I have no doubt we shall be able to come here unanimously, saying to you, as you are in great anxiety to close this debate, that we will shorten our remarks so as to close by Monday next. I have no doubt we shall come to you with that arrangement, in good faith, and there then need be nothing but the kindest and best feelings between us. I say now, to Senators in the majority, that I do not believe there is a man on this side of the Chamber who desires to occupy any position of unkindness towards the majority; and if they will adjourn and give us an opportunity for consultation, they will be met in the proper spirit. God knows there is enough in the question at issue to excite us, and to excite the country, without our adopting a mode of carrying it that may lead to bitter and unkind personal feelings which we shall all regret, perhaps to the day of our death. I have no desire to adopt any factious course here; it is not in my nature. I am the last man who would desire to cultivate unkind feelings to any one. I am ardent, earnest, and impulsive in my feelings; but I trust there is no bitterness in my heart.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Green.

SENATE.

Sensors see now what they have before them. We can sit here as long as they can. I can sit here a month without leaving the Capitol. Give me a crust of bread and a cup of cold water, and I can live here. It only requires ten men to sit in the Senate Chamber and hold you here for forty days and forty nights. I do not say this by way of threat; I do not wish to do anything of that kind. I think gentlemen in the majority ought to yield to the reasonable request we have made—adjourn the Senate, and let us meet at eleven o'clock to-day, or rather to-morrow, speaking legislatively. Let us see whether we cannot come here with a proposition that will enable all to go on harmoniously and kindly. I think this very debate will be likely to shorten the speeches that are to be made, and the matter can be closed before the sun goes down on Monday next. Although we expect the decision to be against us in this branch, we desire to see that decision effected in a way which shall leave behind no pangs, no unkind feelings, while we are members of this body.

Mr. GREEN. The majority of the Senate have no desire and no disposition to withdraw from the Senate in a factious spirit, create revolution, and leave the Government paralyzed, or to pursue a tyrannical and unjust course towards the Opposition. They think they have rights; they know there is a responsibility resting upon them; they believe it to be their duty to meet that responsibility so as to answer the just expectations of the country. If the opposite party will meet us in a proper spirit, all this matter can be disposed of without any difficulty; but it cannot be done otherwise. It must not be expected, it ought not to be expected, that the minority should dictate terms to the majority.

Mr. DOOLITTLE and Mr. WILSON. We do not ask it.

Mr. GREEN. Justice, equality, would simply say, let us meet on a corresponding ground, and with a corresponding spirit. If we yield a part, they must yield a corresponding part. It was the resolve of the friends of this measure, that the vote should be taken at the furthest on Thursday. I said to gentlemen on the opposite side—I said it in the kindest spirit; I said it in no spirit of dictation, as every one of them will bear me witness, notwithstanding what the Senator from Pennsylvania stated; I said it with a view of eliciting their opinion—that while my friends and the friends of the measure desired this vote to be taken at so early a period, yet give me your opinions, and see if we cannot harmonize upon the point. Every single one of them, without exception, said we cannot make any promise whatever; we think this, and we think the other. As the responsibility rested upon the majority, as the public expectation of the country rested upon the majority, it was to be expected that if they would not meet us, we would demand that the question should be taken at some reasonable time.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator consent to adjourn and let us meet at eleven o'clock, and come here at twelve, and say to gentlemen frankly what we can do? I have no doubt—I speak what I believe—that we shall meet the Senator in the kindest manner, and that then there will be no difficulty about this matter hereafter.

Mr. GREEN. I answer that, if the Senator will promise me that the vote shall be taken this week finally on the whole question, I will agree to it.

Mr. WILSON. How can I make a promise here before I have consulted with our friends? What we want is an opportunity to consult, to see what we can do. We want time to meet for the very purpose of consultation.

Mr. GREEN. Have you not consulted?

Mr. WILSON. We have not. Some of our friends are not here?

Mr. GREEN. Have you not been in consultation?

Mr. DIXON, Mr. WILSON, and others. No.

Mr. WILSON. We have called a meeting at eleven o'clock for the very purpose of consultation. It is the most extraordinary position I ever witnessed in this body, to say the least, that a large number of members asking for a little time for purposes of consultation, cannot be trusted as men disposed to do an honorable, manly, and fair thing!

Mr. GREEN. Well, sir—

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me?

Mr. GREEN. I cannot.

Mr. BRODERICK. Then I will wait until you get through.

Mr. GREEN. Of course you will; because I have the floor, and you cannot get it until I do get through.

Mr. BRODERICK. Oh, I do not want it.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will be good enough to address the Chair.

Mr. GREEN. I will. I yielded to the Senator from Massachusetts because he put a pertinent question. I answered it in a pertinent manner. It is now developed that they have never yet, and when I say they I mean those on the opposite side, honorable Senators who differ with us on this question, they have never yet agreed as to when they will take this question, and I therefore feel more than justified for every remark I made to-night. They have never agreed even that the vote shall be taken on Monday, or Tuesday, or Wednesday next, or any other day in the next week. I appeal to the majority of the Senate, are we to be perpetually put off with promises, made in good faith—for I will not impute bad faith to any man until that faith has been falsified—I cannot do it; it is not in my heart and nature; but in the absence of any certain evidence that we shall have a vote upon this question, what is the use of postponing its consideration? I know that a promise made from the other side in good faith, I can rely upon as much as I can upon the word of my own wife, which is as sacred as anything that God has ever given to man; but until I get that assurance, what are we to expect? While this vague talk is going on we have nothing to rely upon. Just give me the assurance and let me know what you intend to do, and we shall be prepared to meet you.

Mr. IVERSON. Mr. President—

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. IVERSON. On the suggestion thrown out by the Senator from Missouri I wish to make a proposition. I was one of those who left here last night about eleven o'clock, when I saw there was no chance of doing anything, because our friends on this side and the other were disposed to fritter away time in mere idle debate on questions of order. I felt unwell, and left. I have been sent for, and am here. It seems to me that our friends on this side are not acting with a generous spirit of forbearance towards the Opposition. I think we ought to have adjourned last night at ten o'clock, when the proposition was made to give them an opportunity to consult together this morning, and decide what they would do. Our friends met in caucus, as is well understood, and determined that we would sit out the question last night, unless the Opposition came to terms. That suggestion was made to them; but what opportunity have they had to consult together, for the purpose of deciding what terms they would submit to us? We say to them, "we will sit it out until you come to terms;" and yet we give them no chance to come to terms. I do not think that is fair. I believe we ought to have adjourned last night, and given them an opportunity to consult, and see whether they are disposed to act fairly or factiously in this body.

That was my opinion last night; and now I think it is due to them, and due to the country, and due to ourselves, in a spirit of magnanimity and propriety, that we should adjourn at this time, and allow the Opposition to have an opportunity this morning of consulting together, and coming to a determination as to what they shall do. The whole matter can be arranged, if the Opposition are disposed to act properly, as I trust they are, by a committee appointed by the two sides. Let the Democratic Senators meet in caucus, and appoint a committee for consultation. Let the other side meet and appoint a committee to meet our committee. In this way, the whole matter can be arranged, if gentlemen are really sincere when they say that they desire to bring this question to a close, and do not want any unnecessary consumption of time.

How can we force the Opposition to come to a decision in this case? The proceedings of last night show us how easily they may defeat us from night to night, and from day to day, and from week to week, if they choose. My colleague talks about adopting the previous question; but would not that be delayed as long as this main question? Suppose a resolution were introduced here to adopt the previous question; that could be put off for a month, if the Opposition were disposed to interpose dilatory motions and dilatory action. We shall no more adopt the previous question, or any other thing designed to bring the vote, sooner than we can vote on the bill itself. It is folly, in my opinion, to talk about adopting the previous question if the minority are disposed to fight that, and I suppose they would fight that as much as they fight this bill. My views being what I have stated, I shall, as soon as the Senator from Missouri gets through, if I can obtain the floor, move an adjournment.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator from Georgia is a little mistaken about his notions of propriety. It was distinctly announced by myself and others on my side of this question, that, if the other side would permit the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] to proceed with and conclude his speech, we should then adjourn without another question. I announced it myself with the assent of my friends on this side of the Chamber. It was repudiated; and the other side determined to adjourn anyhow. The majority had no right to yield to the course dictated by the minority; and I think, therefore, with due deference to the Senator from Georgia, that we did right in standing out, and waiting for the conclusion of that speech, which was not finished until twelve o'clock.

Now, sir, being temporarily charged with the conduct of this matter, I present it only as the agent of the friends of the measure. I do it in no dictatorial spirit. I seek not to domineer over any man's opinions. I concede to all the right to think, to speak, to vote, to decide for themselves; but it must be conceded that there is a responsibility resting on the majority that we must take such steps as we deem proper to meet that responsibility so as to correspond with the just expectation of the public mind. This has been our whole hope, our whole desire, and our whole end. What the ultimate result may be I cannot anticipate, I need not anticipate. No hardship will be done to anybody; but, until we come to some definite terms, it must from necessity result in a matter of endurance, and it may as well come on now as any other time. If we can have terms, resting on the honor and the word of gentlemen, I am willing to receive them, and rely upon them, for I have never yet had occasion to doubt their word or their honor; but until I get their word or their honor pledged in this manner, I see no reason for a postponement.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would state to the Senator that we have offered him repeatedly our word of honor that, if the majority will adjourn, we will do the best we can to fix as early a day as we possibly can when this question may be taken.

Mr. GREEN. That is not satisfactory to me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well.

Mr. GREEN. The word is, as early a day as they can. There is nothing definite. They may report to us to-morrow that the earliest day they can agree to is the 1st of May, or the 1st of June, or the 1st of July. That will not do for me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When I say that, I mean it in good faith. If I should propose the 1st day of May, or June, or July, I ask the Senator whether he thinks that would be acting in good faith? Now, when other gentlemen and myself say that we will give our word that we will do our best to fix a point at the earliest day when we can have a vote, after saying what we have to say, without trying or wishing to protract the time, we mean it; I have no mental reservations—none of any kind or description; and other gentlemen have none. They mean what they say, that it shall be as early a day as they can possibly fix with reference to our speaking what we have to say, and without trying to protract the time by long speeches. Now, the Senator will take me as I mean, and not suppose there is a reservation back in the mind of any man here that, under such an arrangement, he will haul off and take more time than he wants.

Mr. GREEN. I merely construe the Senator, then, according to the proper construction of his words; and that is, that he will do it at the earliest day possible. That is the fair intent of what he has uttered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly.

Mr. GREEN. But on this side we say, that we must have it at the earliest day at which it can be had. We are equals, all of us. A majority say it can be had this next Thursday, and the minority say it can be had on next Monday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then, if the Senator will excuse me—

Mr. GREEN. I desire not to be interrupted on this illustration.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire only to interrupt the Senator for the purpose of explanation.

Mr. GREEN. The majority certainly have just as much right to say what is fair and just and proper as any other party. They think it is right and just and proper to decide this question on Thursday. The other side have rights, but they are subordinate rights to the majority in a Government in which is infused the great principle of popular sovereignty. They say they want until next Monday. I am willing to relax and give away two days. I have offered, and I now offer publicly, before the Senate and the country, that we are willing to allow until Saturday for taking the vote. If you will agree to decide the question on Saturday next, the majority yielding two days and the minority one, we will meet you by the hand and strike the bargain. That is all I can offer.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. President, I wish not to be considered in any bargains that are about to be made in regard to this question. I came here yesterday at twelve o'clock, and have remained here ever since, with the exception of about half an hour. I understood from the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, that after the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] got through with his speech, the Senate would adjourn. I was told so by Republican Senators, and for that reason I waited quietly and patiently until that Senator got through. But, sir, I ascertained in a very few minutes after, that there was no intention on the part of the majority to adjourn, and I resolved to sit here with the majority, and, if they felt disposed to sit the bill out, to remain here with them, but to vote, whenever the opportunity offered, for an adjournment. I wish to say now, that I am willing to assume my share of the responsibility of delaying this question, for I am unalterably opposed to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. But, sir, I shall not be factious in my opposition. I have not been factious since I have occupied a seat on this floor, nor have I consumed the time of the Senate by speaking. I had intended to speak on this subject, but I refrained from doing so when I heard that my friend from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and my friend from Michigan [Mr. STUART] intended to address the Senate at length upon it, and I saw a disposition on the part of the majority to hurry the vote. For that reason, I did not care to take up, unnecessarily, the time of the Senate.

Now, sir, the Senator from Illinois is not able to speak. He commenced the war on this bill, and I desire that he should be here when the battle is to close. I am very anxious that he shall be present before the vote is taken, and I know very well that he is not able now to speak. For that reason I was anxious that this bill should be considered for eight or ten days longer, and the vote then taken; but I am willing now to remain here as long as I can retain strength sufficient to stand upon my feet, or to sit erect in my chair. I shall make no complaint against the majority of the Senate; they may be perfectly right. If they can force the minority to take the vote to-day let them do it; but I doubt their power to do it. I find as strong looking men on this side of the Chamber as I do on the other side; and since it is to be a question of physical endurance, why, sir, the pride of both sides of the Chamber is now involved in the question. I am perfectly willing to sit here until twelve o'clock to-day. If I can find time to rest for a few hours, I may avail myself of them and come back into my seat invigorated. If not, I will remain here as best I may; so that I do not want to be considered in any of the bargains that are about to be made between the Republicans and the majority of the Senate.

Mr. IVERSON. I desire, amongst others, to give the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber an opportunity to do what they profess they will do—consult together and submit to us a reasonable proposition. If they do it, it will be well to accept it. If they do not, the majority can go on and adopt any course they think proper to bring the matter to a conclusion. I think the minority ought at least to have an opportunity to determine what they will do, and let us see whether they are disposed to act as fairly as they represent themselves to be. I think they will. That is my impression; and for the purpose of enabling them to do it, I move that the Senate adjourn. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has been suggested to me that it is very possible that we may come to some arrangement. I have no hesitation in saying for myself, (but in the present stage of things so much has taken place that I cannot speak for anybody but myself,) and I think my friends will say the same thing, that if a majority of the Senate choose to adjourn at the present time, we will, or I will, honestly and fairly try to bring those associated with me here, to a proposition for fixing upon a time for taking this question at as early a day as we can consistently.

Mr. IVERSON. With the consent of the Senate, I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. IVERSON. By unanimous consent the call can be withdrawn.

Mr. TOOMBS. I insist on the call.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Kennedy, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Toombs, and Wright—17.

The VICE PRESIDENT voted in the negative; and so the motion to adjourn was negative.

The question recurred on the motion of the Senator from California, to postpone the further consideration of the subject until half past eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BRODERICK. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Toombs, and Wright—18.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAMLIN, and others. Withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the request for the yeas and nays, but insist on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at five minutes past six o'clock, on Tuesday morning) adjourned.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 18, 1858.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, I agree with my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] whose speech, delivered yesterday, gave me so much pain, that this is not a sectional question. It rises far above a mere sectional issue. It is true, that, in my judgment, it involves the rights, the safety, the honor of fifteen States of this Confederacy. It is true, that, in the judgment of many of those fifteen States, the principle involved in this question is worth more to them than the union of these States. Yet, sir, this is a great constitutional question, and not a sectional one. Let us not deceive ourselves. Such deception is not wisdom; it is folly. You know, sir, and I know, and we all know, that the anti-slavery shibboleth, that "there shall be no more slave States in this Union," strikes this question from bottom to top, and is the living, breathing spirit that animates the opposition to the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. Without that, it is nothing; without gentlemen holding these opinions, it is nothing. This is the sentiment pervading a large portion of the people of the United States. This is the principle which actuates a large majority of the opponents of this measure on this floor. No man who hears me doubts that the admission of Kansas will be their defeat or that its rejection will be their victory. So it is felt, so it is treated, so it is acknowledged by the universal, popular feeling of this entire Republic, with individual exceptions too small to enter into the calculation of the mighty elements now warring in this great struggle.

Then, sir, it becomes us to inquire what foundation has this principle, what support has it, in that fundamental law, the Constitution? In the first place, I shall direct my inquiries to this only source of political power in the Federal Government. Is it authorized by the Constitution of the United States? It must be found there expressly, or it must be necessary to carry out some acknowledged power, or it exists nowhere. It is true, that in some of the incidents of this question it widens and deepens. It involves the further question of the power of Congress over the constitutions and the forms of government of States, foreign or domestic, seeking admission into the Confederacy. There are two clauses in the Constitution of the United States having direct reference to this subject. In the first place, it is declared, in the third section of the fourth article, that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." The power is broad; in its objects it is unrestricted. We may admit directly foreign Governments; we may provide for their future admission, by organizing Territories to be admitted as States at a future time. All this we have done. This interpretation has received the undisputed sanction of this Government. I may, therefore, assume that to be a just interpretation of this power. There was an effort in the convention which formed the Constitution of the United States to limit this power to the then existing territory; but the wise men of that day foresaw the great destiny of this Republic. One of the most distinguished men of the Revolution, both in the field and in the Cabinet, I mean Mr. Hamilton, then early foresaw and declared that we should finally get Louisiana, all Mexico, and squat at South America. A part of his prophecy is history; the rest is destined soon to be. Then, I say, as to the object of this power, there is no dispute in the Republic. By virtue of this constitutional power the foreign independent State of Texas has been admitted into the Union.

In what manner shall this broad, comprehensive power be exercised? First, there are general principles that govern it. All power must be used for the benefit of those for whose benefit it is conferred; and the Constitution has expressly placed this great limitation on that power, that the governments which shall be introduced into this Confederacy of States shall be harmonious, shall be republican. They had seen the evils of dissimilar governments, in ancient and in modern times, united in a confederacy. They were warned by these evils. Therefore this power was subject to this great restriction, that the forms of government of the States to be admitted into this Union should be republican. It was not necessary that it should have a constitution, unless constitutions are held to be necessary to republican governments; and I do not think they are. If a foreign State, or a State carved out of two or more States of the Union, under the terms of the Constitution, or out of our own territory, presents itself to take its place in this family of States, it is the duty of Congress, in exercising this power to admit new States, to take care that the form of its government be republican. This is the only express power you have over their constitutions or forms of government.

Guided by this clear light, and marking the great fact, that the equality of the States is the cardinal feature of our Federal system, that it results from the system itself that each and every State, old or new, must of necessity be the equal of every other State, we now have no difficulty in finding the true and just interpretation of this power. This equality is demonstrable from the fact, that when in the Union, all the Federal rights, duties, and obligations of a State are measured by the Constitution, and not by any previous compact, not by any previous understanding. The Federal rights of all are the same; their obligations are the same; their duties are the same; and they are measured only by that same great standard—the Constitution.

This being the acknowledged standard for determining these questions as to States in the Union, it necessarily follows that the right of congressional interference in a State out of the Union, applying for admission, must be tested by the same rule; and, therefore, it must follow that you have precisely the same power over the form of government presented to you for admission into the Union as you have over the form of government of a State already in the Union—no more and no less. This is clear, because, the instant of admission, you put the constitutional test. Everything must fall before that. If a State comes in by a concession of any of the rights legally belonging to a State of this Confederacy already in the Union, it falls before the supreme law of the land—the Federal Constitution.

I think it, therefore, clear, that you have a right, in the exercise of this power of admitting new States, which is the question now before this body, to look into the form of government of the State applying for admission only to see whether it is republican. If it is, your inquiry must stop. If Ireland, or any other foreign State, had presented constitutions, asking admission into our Union, many other questions of political expediency might present themselves for the fair consideration of the American Congress; but when you come to look to its constitution, your inquiries of its capacity to come in must be measured by these two great principles—its equality with the rest of the States, and the republican form of its government. That is the utmost limit, the extreme bound of your power on that point.

This, in my judgment, embraces the whole case on principle—principle deduced from the Constitution; principle deduced from the very nature and form of our Government, and covers the whole case on that point. I desire next to look into the question of authority. The views I have already presented on the question of power are in accordance with the judgment of the great majority of the wise and good men of this Confederacy, under the old Confederation and under the Constitution, from the beginning to this day.

The ordinance of 1787, which, as it declares on its face, was a contract between the State of Virginia and the United States under the Confederation, and the people of the Northwest Territory, provides that when they shall have sixty thousand inhabitants, or sooner if it be judged prudent, they should be admitted into the Union as a State upon a perfect equality with all the rest of the States, and it made provision for forming five States out of that Territory. The State of Kentucky was admitted without inquiry further than into the points I have stated; and so were the States of Tennessee, Vermont, Maine, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. When Missouri came forward for admission, for the first time the question arose as to the power of Congress over a State constitution. It had stood unquestioned and unquestionable up to 1820. The Federal party, with Mr. King at its head, had been defeated on the popular issues before the Republic; condemned on the measures of the administration which they had supported and proposed. For the purpose, according to Mr. Jefferson, of wriggling themselves into power, they started this unfounded heresy in order to recover, by appeals to sectional passions, that power which they had so justly lost. Rufus King has worthy successors in the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] and his friends. He is but the imitator of his great prototype.

They are following up the same idea for the same reasons. Condemned by the popular judgment, declared to be unfit to carry on the affairs of this great country, they have sought to arouse, to direct, and use a popular fanaticism in their own section of the country in order to seize the government of the whole. Their aim and their policy have this object, and none other. Of course it is not avowed, but none but the willfully blind can fail to see their objects. When Missouri presented her constitution, it was not pretended that her boundaries were not correct; it was not pretended that her population was not sufficient; it was not pretended that her constitution was not republican; it was then only objected that her constitution tolerated domestic slavery—an institution which pervaded all the States during the Revolution, and up to the time of the formation of this Government. That was the objection, and the sole objection. That effort was resisted; and it was defeated with great difficulty. That ground was maintained by the great majority of the Representatives of the non-slaveholding States from the beginning to the end. The cry of the Union was raised, and timid men sacrificed principle for peace, and got no peace by the sacrifice. It is not the proper time for me to express the opinions which I have on that subject. I have done that before. I will, however, now say that the sacrifice ought not to have been made. We are not the only portion of the Republic to whom the Union is valuable. I have calculated its value to others as well as to ourselves, and I am prepared to announce one of the results of that calculation; and that is, whatever may be its value to the whole people, that its value to the South is less than to any other portion of the Republic. That is my judgment; and the subject has been long and well considered. We of the South have not sought your legislation to protect our industry or foster our pursuits. New England has scarcely struck a lick on the land or the sea since the American Revolution without prohibition, protection, and bounties, and is constantly clamoring for their increase. We have never sought, we have never got it. I represented one district of Georgia for eight years in the other House. I never had a citizen from that district apply to me to procure the passage of a single law to benefit his industry, and I will add, to their credit, to get them an office here under the Government. Sir, they are a bold, industrious, just, self-relying people. They begin to think they have been outraged about long enough under the protection of your fraternal bonds.

The objection that was made to the admission of Missouri was founded on naked usurpation. It claimed support, then as now, not on the ground of right, but of power. They said the North is the stronger section; this is her will; let it be done—though the Constitution fall. But, sir, there were then, as now, patriotic men from the non-slaveholding States; there were real republican men; there were men who were prepared to take all risks that duty demanded at their hands. They took them; they united with a considerable portion of the South, and they admitted Missouri; but put a clause, known as the Missouri compromise, the fatal eighth section of the act, which declared that slavery and involuntary servitude, except for crime, shall never exist in all that territory acquired from France north of 36° 30' north latitude, and outside of the State of Missouri. That law gave satisfaction nowhere. It was wrong; therefore, the mother of discord, not peace. The North repudiated it everywhere, and in all forms; by public meetings, legislative resolves, and the ballot-box; for they drove from Congress every man,

I think, but four, from the non-slaveholding States who voted for it. We are told it was a compact. We hear it reiterated every day that it was a solemn compact. In the first place, Congress cannot make a compact with a State or Territory; and in the second place, it did not make any. It passed a law, and a very bad law, and, as has been affirmed by all the tribunals entitled to respect in this country, an unconstitutional law.

The Supreme Court of the United States has so decided; and the great body of the people of the North, up to a very recent occasion, have declared that tribunal to be the final arbiter on all questions arising under the Constitution. That has been their doctrine ever since the passage of the Virginia resolutions of 1798, and the report of 1799, which announce great principles of government so often derided, despised, and jeered at by those who never took the trouble to read them. This tribunal was declared to be the ultimate arbiter over the sovereign States of this Confederacy by every non-slaveholding State in this Union; and such has been the concurrent universal judgment of all the organs of public opinion in those States up to the time when the decision was against them. That is the first time its authority was ever denied by the North. That is the first time it was ever denounced by the North—then, forsooth, there was a bargain; then there was intrigue; then there was collusion; then there was fraud; when it opposed itself and the law as a barrier to this fanaticism, and stood by the Constitution, it became the object of bitter denunciation. The court said the restriction was constitutional; the President said so; Congress said so. This judgment was placed upon your statute-book by the great coordinate branches of the Government, legislative and executive, and maintained by the judiciary. It is said now that it has no claim to legality, and my honorable friend from Kentucky unites his voice to swell the tide of denunciation against the Supreme Court, which I know he has ever considered one of the bulwarks of the Constitution.

This tribunal only ceased to be the proper arbiter of constitutional questions when it decided this constitutional point against the fanaticism of the North! But, sir, we have also gone to the final arbiter and have been there sustained; we have appealed, under the Constitution and laws of this country, to the great inquest of the nation boldly; with the judgment in hand of the President and of Congress, with all the assaults, and every means for making them formidable, of the enemy, we appealed to the people, not to the people of the South alone, but to the universal people of this whole country entitled by its political organization to speak. I have heard new and strange theories of popular sovereignty and of majority governments. I tell you, Mr. President, mankind made a long step in the right direction when they said irresponsible minorities should not govern; a long step and a good step, when they overturned kings, aristocracies, and oligarchies; when they said that an irresponsible minority had no right, human or divine, to govern the State; but, sir, they made a longer and better and higher and a nobler bound in the right direction, when they determined and declared that irresponsible majorities should not govern. This is our noble system; it was a bolder, a braver step for the security of human rights. These great and universally conceded rights of life, of liberty, of property, are not confided in this country of ours to a minority, they are not confided to a majority, but we have hedged about minorities and majorities with great republican organizations, with checks, with balances, with constitutions, which prevent minorities from usurping, and majorities from trampling under foot, the rights of the people, of all of the people, and each and every one of them.

Sir, we have affirmed the great principle that society shall govern; that government is not for the benefit of minorities, as was held in the olden time; that government is not for the benefit of majorities—a principle equally wrong and equally unfounded—but is instituted for the whole of society and every man in it. Majorities only govern in this country in questions submitted to them by the organic law. It is not because of a divine right. They have no more divine rights than other kings. In fact, all power of majorities outside of that is a mere question of force—nothing else. Where shall you find the natural right of one hundred men to govern ninety-nine? There is but one reason why this maxim has ever received any force. It is that in the greater number ordinarily may be found the greatest strength; and that is the basis of all human society. In the greater number you will most usually find the greater wisdom; and therefore all questions that you submit to be determined by the body of the people, you refer to the greater number. You do it here, standing as we do the representatives of thirty-one sovereign States, two from each State. We pay no attention to the principle of mere numbers. The Senator from New York represents his three millions of people; I represent less than one million, of all ages, sexes, colors, and conditions. In passing upon questions involving the rights of the whole country upon all matters submitted to us under the Constitution, my vote and his are equal. We have agreed to determine by the majority of the members of this body, not the majority of the people, the passage of all laws which may be rightfully passed, except in the cases of treaties, in which the rights of the whole are still further protected by requiring two thirds of this body to concur in them.

Sir, this great principle underlies our whole system, that majorities shall not rule except in cases submitted to them by consent, in the organic law.

In that sense the majority rule is wise; in that sense it is as discreet as wise; because, first, a majority ordinarily can enforce its judgment by superior power; and, in the second place, other things being equal, society secures a better chance for the requisite wisdom to carry on government in this system than in any other. But, then, when we speak of majorities, we speak of majorities which are ascertained by law, according to its forms, according to its regulations, its technicalities—its technicalities, so happily, but, I think, unfortunately, derided by my honorable friend from Kentucky. Sir, it is the sole protection of liberty; it is the sole bulwark against anarchy; it is the sole barrier against determining all questions by brute force. Strike out what the Senator calls your "little legalities and regularities," and where is the security of the weak against the strong? where is the distinction between legal right and wrong? where the difference between liberty and license? In these are to be found the landmarks which separate government from anarchy, regulated liberty from perpetual discord.

My honorable friend differs with the Supreme Court upon the right of Congress to make its will supreme over the present thousands and the future millions who may inhabit our Territories. He differs from the decision of every branch of our Government within the last ten or twelve years. He is certainly entitled to his opinion; I do not intend to deny it to him; but I wish to appeal to his judgment. I know of no man in this Republic, of whatever party, upon whose patriotism and integrity I would sooner risk any great question connected with the honor and safety of his country. I doubt nothing, then, but the correctness of his judgment. But I have too often seen in public life party prejudice obscure the brightest intellect and benumb the most earnest patriotism, to doubt the causes which have disabled him from the fair consideration of the overwhelming weight of evidence against his present position.

Whenever there has been a slave State admitted into the Union, from 1820 to this day, it has been opposed for that reason by a greater or less number of the Representatives of the non-slaveholding States. There, sir, the seeds of this discord were sown by the Federal party; there they sowed the wind; and if the whirlwind is to be reaped, they are the authors of whatever calamities or mischiefs may inure from it. As for me, it is my duty to-day, not to determine whether discord shall reign; not whether rebellion shall break out or continue in Kansas; not whether the ten thousand men already proclaimed by the President of the United States to be in rebellion to your Government shall be sustained or put down; but it is to inquire where is the right, and to follow it to its results; to follow it to its consequences. That I intend to do.

The attempt to resist the admission of Missouri was against the judgment of the great body of the patriots of the land. All authority, except the authority which I have just stated, was against it. So there is an end of it on the point of authority, until recently. Jefferson opposed it. Madison opposed it. All the fathers of the Republic then in public life opposed it, except Mr. King, and those who followed him in his attack on the Missouri constitution; and I believe, since that time, the great majority of the people of the North have almost universally declared that the principle was wrong. My honorable friend from Kentucky was a member of the Cabinet of Mr. Fillmore. During his administration the great question arose as to the power of Congress over this subject in the Territories of the United States. We were unable to solve it. We agreed to let the question of power over the Territories rest; but we declared, in the acts for the organization of Utah and New Mexico, that when they should be admitted into the Union as States, they might come in with or without slavery, as their constitutions at the time of admission might prescribe. This was affirmed by the whole Republic, with the exception of the bigoted Abolitionists. My honorable friend over the way [Mr. DOUGLAS] was supposed to have concurred in that judgment. My honorable friend from Kentucky was supposed to have concurred in that judgment, belonging, as he did, to an administration that claimed throughout the borders of this land the merit, if not of its conception, at least of its success. I am happy to award it to anybody that chooses to claim it; so that the great and correct principles are established, I am indifferent who gets the credit of them. Those measures had the approbation of my judgment, and they received my vote. When the national conventions of the old Democratic party and the Whig party met, in 1852, at Baltimore, the one unanimously affirmed the correctness of those measures; the other did not affirm them unanimously, but a large majority did, although there were sixty-six opposing them, but they supported the candidates who affirmed the principle. It is, therefore, fair to assume that, if they did not approve, they acquiesced in this universal judgment of the Republic. That sentiment was based on the principle that there was no rightful authority here to interfere with the constitutions of States seeking admission into the Union further than to see that they established republican forms of government.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TOOMBS. With great pleasure.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I may not have made myself understood on the point; and if the gentleman did not understand me yesterday as perfectly acceding to the principle, and agreeing that, in my judgment, every State not only ought to have, but had, an indefeasible right, when making her constitution, to determine upon this question of slavery as to her seemed best, I wish to say that I have always entertained that opinion, and now as fully as ever.

Mr. TOOMBS. I did not misunderstand my friend. This part of my argument is more directly addressed to a very large number of his present associates who are endeavoring to defeat the admission of this State for the reason I have stated; and I shall also try to show to my friend, and others, that, if you take away that objection, there is no legal or valid reason against the admission of Kansas; and, more than that, no opposition to it in either House sufficient to defeat it.

I think I have established the principle for which I contend by authority—authority fully conceded and acknowledged by my honorable friend. Upon policy, is it not wise, is it not just, under our system, that the people who cast their lot in our distant territory, who are to be affected by their domestic institutions, shall judge for themselves what institutions, in their opinion, will best promote their own happiness, and perpetuate liberty to their descendants? I will not argue that point now; the time has passed for that.

I say, then, that, upon principle, upon authority, and upon policy, the declaration held by the minority in the Senate of the United States, that there shall be no more slave States in this Union, and that Congress has a right to look into the State constitutions for any purpose they please, to make them conformable to their ideas of what is just and right, and for their advantage, has no foundation in either of those three great elements of sound constitutional construction.

It may be needful, in the examination of the second great branch of this inquiry, to ascertain when Congress may exercise this power to admit new States. In the first place, at what time may it exercise it? It is only a question of time. In the practice of the Government it has been left to the sound discretion of Congress. Therefore, in 1802, when we acquired Louisiana, we covenanted by treaty that we would admit those people into the Union as soon as it could be conveniently done. We did the same thing with Mexico. We did the same thing with Texas. We said we should divide her into four States more, as soon as her population would authorize it. It was done in the ordinance of 1787 as to the five States to be formed in the Northwest. It was done in the contract with the State of North Carolina and the State of Georgia; and the great and important exercise of this power in advance of the moment of admission is spread over your statute-books in compacts, in charters with the people of the Territories themselves. You claim and exercise the right to govern these people to the full extent of your constitutional power. I have ever acceded to that right. In the early history of your Government you gave them judges; you gave them Governors; you declared that their laws should be binding when submitted to and approved by you. When population increased, you gave them representative government, but with the same subjection to the will of Congress. You then gave them Territorial Legislatures, making their laws good and valid when you approved them. In another class they were good and valid unless you disapproved them.

Finally, in the case of Kansas and Nebraska, you gave them the power to legislate overall rightful subjects of legislation without any supervision from you, with no other control but the Constitution of the United States, and you declared that the people who might cast their lot in them should come into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution might prescribe. Therefore Kansas has now a triple right to admission here. First, she has it under the treaty with France of 1803; second, she comes here under your general declaration in the settlement of 1850; third, by the express provision of the charter you gave her in 1854. It is her existing law. It is the compact you made with all the people going to Kansas. You have given her Legislature control over all rightful subjects of legislation—the same powers you had, and to the full extent that you hold them—subject only to the Constitution of the United States, which is a limitation on you as well as on them. You went further; you parted with the power of admission, as to this State, in 1854. You told her that she might regulate her domestic institutions; that you did not intend to plant slavery in the Territory, or exclude it therefrom, but to permit her to form her domestic institutions in her own way; and you have told her that when the time came for her admission she could come into the Union with or without slavery as her constitution might prescribe. She has come. Now, it is for you to keep your faith. Will you do it?

Upon the true construction of this organic act I agree with my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] In his speech of the 9th December, he declares we established no new principle in territorial government, we only place slavery on the same basis as other domestic institutions. By the act of 1820, slavery was forever prohibited, no matter what might be the wishes of the people. They were permitted to regulate everything else their own way, except slavery; we struck out the exception and left the general, long established rule to operate in that, as well as in all other domestic relations and institutions upon this point. We did nothing more; we intended nothing more; by no just intentment can it be carried further. Its language is express; the interpretation is plain. Therefore, I take occasion to say that I agree with the distinguished Senator from Illinois in the interpretation of this great charter.

By virtue of the Legislative authority thus conferred, in conformity with the authority thus given, this constitution of Kansas was brought into existence. It was made with extreme caution, with extreme regularity—even with offensive regularity. It was too regular, it seems, for many of my honorable friends. It was made with strict legality. First, the Legislature passed a law leaving it to the inhabitants of that Territory to determine for themselves whether they would come into the Union. They decided that they would; nobody objected; it was a universal sentiment there. All, all agree that this is a thing fit to be done in order to terminate these difficulties. Then there is no dispute about boundary; none about population. We have no question with reference to the form of government; no one doubts that it is republican.

The Territorial Legislature of Kansas, by virtue of this broad right in their charter, in conformity to the popular will, called a convention. It met. It made this instrument. It adopted a constitution, full, ample, and complete—a government republican in its form, and declared to be the constitution of the new State of Kansas, when she should be admitted into the Union, except as to one clause. As to everything else but this clause it was a finality. That one clause involved the question of domestic slavery, and that they referred to the people. This clause was fairly and legally submitted to a vote of the whole people—all who were entitled by law to vote. The result was that this pro-slavery clause was adopted by more than five thousand majority. My honorable friend from Kentucky repeats the oft-repeated charge that there was some illegal voting at that election; that names of distinguished public men known not to be in Kansas, appear on the poll-book. Grant it. In the first place, it does not appear who did it; it is alleged on the other side, and the intrinsic evidence would seem to support it, that "an enemy has done this thing." But it does appear that a great majority of these votes are indisputably legal. This fact is nowhere denied, and it settles this case. A legal election is not void because illegal votes may be cast at it, but it must appear, before it can affect the result, that there were enough of illegal votes to defeat the legal vote. This is not pretended in any quarter.

It seems this constitution is to be attacked on new principles. It is the first time I heard it asserted anywhere that a whole constitution was void because an illegal vote was given for it, or many illegal votes were given for it. If the illegal votes given for it override the legal votes against it, then it was fraudulent and void, and ought not to stand a moment; but until my honorable friend establishes that, he no more weakens the constitution of Kansas than he does that of Kentucky, on account of the outrages in Louisville in 1855.

There were over six thousand votes cast for the slavery clause of this constitution; there were not two hundred against it. I say its legality stands on the fact that no man pretends to deny it, not even the last Kansas Legislature, whose outrages do not seem to have shocked my honorable friend from Kentucky, but whose statements are treated by him almost as record evidence; and this extraordinary and, I think, ill-placed credit, not only extends to resolutions of that body, but also to any member or officer of theirs who may venture an opinion on this subject. They say that there were three thousand of these six thousand votes fraudulent. Grant it. That is their case. The other three thousand were good. The other three thousand are as good to establish this constitution against those who failed or refused to vote as if every man in the Territory had voted for it. My friend was not warranted in saying that these whole proceedings were fraudulent, by a shadow of evidence. He is not authorized to say that this Lecompton constitution has ever had even an allegation of fraud sufficient, even if true, for its invalidation, much less proof. I say there is no such allegation. As far as I know, it never was made here; it never was made in Kansas. I will take the case of its enemies, and I say that, so far from proving fraud, they have not even made a specification which, if true, would invalidate the constitution; yet it is to go out to the country that the Lecompton constitution is a fraud, and the great name and high character of my honorable friend are to be used to bolster up this charge, unsupported by evidence and untrue in fact. My honorable friend does himself great injustice in accepting, without full examination, as true, allegations which have been, again and again, on this floor and elsewhere, disproved.

But there stands the case. Did not the Legislature of Kansas have a right to pass a law submitting the question of calling a convention to the people? If it be rightful legislation, they had. Is it a wrongful subject of legislation? Did they not have a right to take the sense of the people as to their wishes on this subject, and to follow that will and protect its exercise against fraud and violence? This is not only a rightful, but an ordinary exercise of legislative power, even without express grant from Congress; but here the grant is express, clear, and unquestionable. The action of this convention, thus legally called, was the act of the people of Kansas in the exercise of sovereign power. The constitution they made was the constitution of the people the moment the conditions they annexed were complied with and Congress assented. My friend says submission is not necessary. When this discussion first arose in Congress, at this session, that was the main point of assault. Some very adroit gentlemen thought they had a great popular point in the declaration that it never had been submitted to a popular vote, and therefore it could in no sense be considered a constitution. That could not stand argument; it could not stand public judgment. It proved too much. It proved the original thirteen States were wrongfully in the Union. It proved the objectors out also. It became necessary to back down. They found that the judgment of the country, that principle and the practice of the country, had all been against it, and therefore they changed their tactics and commenced raising the hue-and-cry of fraud, fraud! And this cry is now put forward as the main, if not exclusive, argument against it—that this is not sincere, but it is a pretext, and not a reason, with many of the objectors; that they first opposed it for other and untenable reasons, and that all the transactions in which fraud has been alleged arose after they had taken fierce and uncompromising ground against it. The vote on the slavery clause of the Lecompton constitution was taken on the 21st December. The election for State officers under the constitution was held on the 4th January last. This opposition commenced before the meeting of Congress.

We are now told that Governor Walker and Mr. Stanton promised to have the constitution submitted, and declared it must be submitted. I believe they did. From the day they went to that Territory until the day they came away, they were both engaged wrongfully interfering with rights of the people of that Territory, violating the provisions of the fundamental act, and bringing the Administration into disrepute with the country. What right has the Governor of a Territory to promise what a convention of the people shall do? The requirement of submission was presented to the Legislature, and rejected. When the convention bill was passed by the Legislature of Kansas, the then Governor vetoed it upon the express ground that it did not provide for submitting the constitution to the people. This was not a surprise; this was not a fraud. Nobody was cheated by the non-submission. If Mr. Walker promised that it should be submitted, he had no right to give the promise; and he gave it in the face of the declaration of the Legislature that they wanted a convention, the embodiment of the popular sovereignty of Kansas; that its voice should be the voice of the people. Sir, that Legislature were right. They not only acted upon principle, but they acted upon a principle affirmed by the Senate of the United States, including my honorable friends from Illinois and Kentucky, that no such submission was necessary. In 1856, when I felt it my duty to submit an enabling act to the Senate, that enabling act, as it passed this body, did not provide for a submission of the constitution or any part of it to a vote of the people of Kansas. It may be necessary for me to give a brief history of a transaction which has been much controverted; but my history shall be simply a record history.

I saw there had been complaints and allegations and counter allegations of fraud from the beginning of the organization of that Territory.

Murders, conflagrations, and other outrages, were the ordinary pastimes of many of the people. The people were not only divided, but hostile to each other. I knew that it was difficult to get fair elections even in quiet times in frontier countries; and I thought I would put an end to it at once by authorizing the people to elect a convention and make a constitution. The first twelve sections of the bill took the whole power out of the territorial government. I ignored Governor, Council, and Legislature. The first twelve sections provided the machinery for executing the bill, so that there should be no dispute as to its fairness. The other sections containing only the formal parts of the bill incident to every enabling act, I cut them off with my scissors from a printed bill before me. The first twelve sections are in my own writing. In the thirteenth section, under the usual clause stating that the following shall be the fundamental conditions of admission, there were words requiring a submission of the constitution to the people. That I did not observe.

When the bill came up for consideration between some gentlemen of the committee and myself, there being no provision in the bill for a second election; there being no safeguards for such a popular election; the bill being incongruous as to that purpose, I suggested the striking out of this clause. It was done, as the report shows. It having got there by accident, it was stricken out at my suggestion, as a matter of course. The principles on which that measure was based were these: first, that all the legal voters of the Territory should have a fair opportunity, free from force or fraud, to elect a convention, and to make a constitution; and then that they should come into the Union under that constitution, without referring either the constitution to the people, or the question of admission again to Congress. It was intended as an assent to admission in advance.

On consultation with friends, among whom was the present distinguished Secretary of State, it was objected that the bill was a novelty; that it was at least necessary for it to come back to Congress for final action before admission. I referred them to Ohio as a precedent. That State was admitted without either submitting her constitution to the people, or bringing it again before Congress. Her enabling act was construed to have given the assent to admission in advance.

But it is objected that the Kansas organic act is but an enabling act. That is certainly true in some sense; but the difference is unimportant to this issue. The Kansas territorial convention act was to every extent, and for all purposes, as lawful, binding, and obligatory on the people of Kansas, as though Congress had passed it. The convention called into existence by it was as much the representative of the people, and had the same powers, as though Congress had passed it. It differed from an enabling act only in this: it bound her people as firmly, but did not bind Congress. Congress, for just cause, could reject this action; whereas, if Congress had passed the act, and the people of Kansas had complied with the conditions, Congress would have also been bound by this action. The two bills now before me illustrate my idea.

The Judiciary Committee reported unanimously, the other day, that Minnesota having complied substantially with the act of Congress, was entitled to instant admission. Kansas makes a proposition which, if it be fair, legal, and just, and if it comes within the rules you have a right to consider, must be admitted too. That is the distinction. Indeed, the territorial act is most binding on the people of the Territory. The people of that Territory have only done what we intended they should do at the last Congress. They took my bill, in the main, as their model. A large majority of this body, including my friend from Kentucky, determined, in the then condition of the Territory, it was best to get the people together fairly in convention, and let the convention make a constitution, and then induct them into the Union. We held then, that the voice of the people could be fairly expressed through the convention, and that we would accept such action as their will. The Territorial Legislature but conformed to this action, and present you to-day the result in a mode approved by us in advance.

Yet they are sought to be turned away, because a faction in the Territory refused to acknowledge the law, and refused to exercise the right to vote for members of this convention, thus fully and fairly offered to them, and that offered upon them by the Governor, and protected in its free and impartial exercise by the military power of the Government.

My honorable friend from Kentucky further objects to this constitution, for the reason that it appears, from an election held on the 4th of January, that there were ten thousand votes against it, and therefore he asserts that it is not the act and deed of the people. This position cannot stand the test of reason or principle, and has already been answered by the principles heretofore established. This constitution was concluded and finished before this vote was taken. It was a nullity. This Territorial Legislature had no more power over it than it had over the constitution of Kentucky. It was a complete act of the people in their sovereign capacity, and was beyond the reach of the Territorial Legislature. Their powers were wholly derived from Congress, and were exhausted with the act calling the convention. Neither the Legislature which called the convention, nor any subsequent, could recall the act or modify or control in any way this sovereign act of the people. It is not a legislative power to control the people in forming a constitution; this is true of State Legislatures, much more of a Territorial Legislature, deriving its powers, not from the people, but from Congress. The case of Iowa is analogous, if sound.

My friend from Kentucky says the Territorial Legislature called a new convention and made a new constitution, superseding the old one after the action of Congress. I will reserve criticism on this precedent for the future. It is sufficient to say this Territorial Legislature did not appeal to that source of power—the people—to control their constitution, but undertook the work themselves. The honorable Senator confounds the powers of a Territorial Legislature over a constitution with the powers of the people over the same subject. Many of the States have never submitted their constitutions to the people. Can their Legislatures do so now? If not, why? How have they lost the power, if they ever possessed it? The whole doctrine is a fallacy, and a dangerous fallacy, subversive of popular rights and dangerous to public liberty. Like

“The fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste Brought death into the world, and all our woe,” it runs through all the descendants of the original culprit. But there seems to be a sovereign cure for their polluted, evil bodies. Dip them in the turbid waters of Black Republicanism, and they become clean. Then the last became a good Legislature; the others were bad ones! I admit it was a good Legislature; it was as legal as any of them—no more, no less. But when this constitution was adopted by the convention, all except the clause submitted by them became the will of the people, legally, constitutionally expressed, not to be gainsayed here or elsewhere. On the 21st of December, when that clause was submitted and affirmed, the work was complete: nothing but the power which created could destroy it.

Then it follows, that the vote of ten thousand on the 4th of January was taken without authority, as the President has justly stated. I think my honorable friend was not successful in his attack on that argument. I think it stands on the soundest principles of public and constitutional law. I think that, as well as the masterly exposition of all the events in Kansas concerning the adoption of the Lecompton constitution, by the President of the United States, has really left nothing for me, or for its advocates on that branch, except to repeat those unanswered and unanswerable arguments.

But gentlemen go outside of the constitution. They say again, it is not the work of the people because it was established by usurpation and fraud. I wish to call my friend's attention to a very important branch of this controversy between him and me. He says that the first Legislature was elected by usurpation and fraud, and that that has become history. Who wrote that history?

It is not to be found in the legislative records; it is not to be found in your executive records, unless you call the statements of runaway Governors executive records. They spoke a different language when in power, and this infirmity seems to have been common with Kansas Governors. The first Governor (Mr. Reeder) who went there thought this Legislature legal and fair, until it would no longer subserve his gainful operations. I believe he started a quarrel when they moved the place of sitting from his town to somebody else's town, and then it became an unconstitutional and illegal body! The assertion that the first Legislature was a Legislature set up by violence and fraud, is not supported by history, or by one particle of evidence, and I will show it before I take my seat. I now propose to show to my friend that the minority and the majority, that all parties in the Legislature of Kansas, and Reeder himself, maintained the validity of that Legislature; that it was a fair and honest election, as to a majority of both branches. My friend from Illinois, in one of the ablest reports he ever drew, settled this point beyond all peradventure with reference to the action of the Legislature; and here are his comments upon it, in his report of the 12th of March, 1856:

“So far as the question involves the legality of the Kansas Legislature, and the validity of its acts, it is entirely immaterial whether we adopt the reasoning and conclusions of the minority or majority reports, for each proves that the Legislature was legally and duly constituted. The minority report establishes the fact, by the position that the Governor's certificate was conclusive, and that he granted certificates to ten out of the thirteen Councilmen, and to seventeen out of the twenty-six Representatives, who finally held their seats, which was largely more than a quorum of each branch of the Legislature. The majority report establishes the same fact, by the position, that after going behind the Governor's certificate, and carefully examining the facts, they confirmed these same ten Councilmen and seventeen Representatives in their seats, and then awarded the seats of the other three Councilmen and nine Representatives to the candidates whom they believed to have been legally elected at the general election on the 30th of March.”

That is the evidence furnished by the Legislature of Kansas. That is the evidence furnished by the minority and majority of her first Legislature. All the rest of the seats were unanimously affirmed but the seven. The election took place in March; the Legislature did not meet until July, and there were but seven seats contested. The Missouri invasion started here and went back to Kansas. There of course it was dressed up with all the art of the masterly agents who were employed in the business. The same fact was established by a report in the other House, the official document to which I will turn my attention. In both the reports of the majority and minority, even of this roving commission that was sent out to Kansas to get up materials for the presidential campaign of 1856, and who brought back enough of it, perhaps too much—more than the people believed at all events—facts are given disproving this allegation. Compare the tables there given. Thirty days before the 30th of March, according to the organic act, a census was taken. Reeder was Governor, and was required to take the census of the actual residents of the Territory in order to divide the Territory into election districts. The census showed sixteen hundred men from southern States, one thousand from free States, and two hundred from foreign countries. There were nearly two thirds, a majority of six hundred southern men, at the first election by the official report for the purpose of dividing the Territory into election districts. Then the legality of the elections was admitted by both committees in the Legislature and by Governor Reeder himself. Yet my friend says it is history that this was an invasion. The acts of Reeder while Governor, the official action of all parties in the Legislature, are to be set aside before that great history contained in Black Republican reports and stump speeches.

If the speech of the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] is history, then frauds are historically established. If the speech of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] is history, then also are they thus established. The statement I make is to be found in the copy of the official records before me. This census was taken before a single disturbance in Kansas, taken under the organic act by the first Governor, for the legitimate purpose of dividing the Territory into election districts according to population, and therefore is freer from suspicion or taint than any other evidence on this subject. The men sent by the Massachusetts aid societies had not got in there; and my friend now gives the authority of his great name to a charge which I say is entirely unsupported by a particle of evidence, but is disproved by the strongest and most irrefragable documentary evidence admitted by all sides of this question.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will my friend allow me a word of explanation?

Mr. TOOMBS. With pleasure.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I did suppose, sir, that it was generally recognized fact that the history of Kansas was sufficient to show that that election was carried by votes intruded upon the soil of that Territory. I have not been very diligent in tracing the memorials or the written evidences of these matters; but I relied chiefly on the fact that I had conversed with some gentlemen, and I consider them as reliable as I claim to be myself, who told me that they were of the invading party themselves; that they went themselves and acted a part in it; and that the truth was as stated.

Mr. COLLAMER. Does the Senator from Georgia know the number of votes cast at the March election, 1855?

Mr. TOOMBS. The document is before me, but I have not turned to the point.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is in the same document. When the census was taken in February, there were some twenty-seven hundred inhabitants, and there were about six thousand votes cast in March.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir; there was a great increase.

Mr. COLLAMER. A sudden increase on that day.

Mr. GREEN rose.

Mr. TOOMBS. Excuse me, if you please.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to ask one question of the Senator from Kentucky, with the permission of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TOOMBS. I prefer not. Ask me questions, if you wish; but these cross fires sometimes lead to difficulties. I will answer any question myself.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I would very much prefer that the Senator would allow the question to be put.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am quite sure that in any statement my honorable friend made he was perfectly sincere. I know he was. I did not doubt it then or now. Hence, I say, I felt constrained to examine his statement, as it was going forth under the sanction of one so well entitled to the credit and confidence of the country. It is due to the cause, it is due to truth, it is due to this great question, that any inadvertence of my friend, or want of examination on his part, should be corrected. That men went from Missouri to the polls in Kansas, in not exceeding seven districts, is what I stated before to have been alleged, when the first Legislature met; but I do not understand that a foray on one ballot-box is to overturn an election in a State or Territory. My friend may have seen a hundred who said they went to the polls and voted illegally. It is often the case everywhere; but to the great majority of the Council and Assembly the certificates were granted by Reeder, and their right to seats was affirmed by the Legislature, by all sides unanimously. Ought not that to outweigh the history of partisans, who at the time the Legislature met, and before the seven contested seats were decided, unanimously affirmed the legality and rightfulness of the election of two thirds of the Council and Assembly? There was no dispute about them. They did say that in three, four, five, six, or seven districts, there was a dispute. It went only to the election of seven men. That was the whole extent of the invasion, as then contended. I say that up to the decision of this question by that Legislature, there cannot be found in the records of Kansas, nor in the memorials to this House for relief against it, even an allegation that in more than seven districts the polls were wrongfully and fraudulently usurped; and in these the allegation is not supported by satisfactory evidence. I have a strong opinion, from a former very thorough investigation of this point, that no man was molested or prevented from voting. Massachusetts men and Missouri men, who claimed to be residents, on an intention to reside there, did go into the Territory, and vote in some of these seven districts, and that is about all the foundation for this cry of usurpation.

The Legislature stands by as rightful a tenure as this Congress. It is alleged that the people were intimidated in different parts of Kansas at these elections. It is well known that more men have been killed in one day, at a single ballot-box, in the old States of this Union, than have ever lost their lives in all the disturbances in Kansas. These events have been distorted and magnified by telegraphs and by newspaper articles for the purpose of deceiving the great masses of the honest people of this country. I stand upon the record made by the Executive, made by the Legislature of all sides, and that must stand as long as the social fabric stands. Whether it was true or false, it is the only test. They must decide their own elections. You might as well call the government of Kentucky a usurpation. Some men say that the government of Maryland, or at least of Baltimore, is a usurpation; but when it is decided by proper authority to be valid, it must stand. I have nothing to say about it. I only speak of these allegations. Probably if statements of partisans, if statements of an unsuccessful party can make history, three years hence that will be history. It will have as good a right to be. The outrage at Louisville will be history too; and a sad history will it be for future patriots to contemplate.

I have shown that a majority of the first Legislature of Kansas were lawfully elected; were not usurpers; were not fraudulently elected. Then, at the second election, the Abolitionists having failed to get power, gave no votes. Who is to blame for that? Our opponents find it difficult to get rid of this Legislature, because only one side voted. It was elected without a contest, under the authority of the organic act, and was sustained by every department of this Government. Its authority was as fully recognized as that Legislature which elected my friend from Kentucky. This Legislature has not even been assailed by any person here or in Kansas, except upon the ground that it was the successor of what they please to term the Missouri usurpation. This Legislature called the convention in obedience to the expressed and nearly unanimous will of the people. They adopted a constitution, submitted a single provision of it to the people; and my friend from Kentucky attacks this election on the authority of the President of the Council and the Speaker of the House of Representatives which succeeded them; protesting against the principle that the evidence of a man holding office is official evidence. I would inquire, what was their evidence? They say about three thousand of the votes cast on the 21st of December, in favor of this clause, were, in their opinion, fraudulent. I looked into their evidence. My friend takes it in trust from a bad source, the minority report of the Senator from Vermont. He did not give all the facts.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It is in Judge Douglas's report.

Mr. TOOMBS. Very well. I believe the statement is in both minority reports; yet it is bad authority in both cases. Now, because these men said so, it is to be taken as true! They give their reasons for saying so. They do not pretend to say that they were there, or that they have any other evidence except their general acquaintance with the country; and that evidence my friend accepts as official evidence of a fact!

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am very sorry to interrupt my friend, but I wish to be understood.

Mr. TOOMBS. Certainly.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I quoted from what I saw reported to the Senate. I supposed that was as good authority as could be, and it is without contradiction.

Mr. TOOMBS. Certainly.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I quoted from that as the expression of the opinion of these officers, who say that they were well acquainted with the country.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is their statement.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I went on further, and I referred to the report made by the board of commissioners since appointed by the Legislature of that Territory to investigate those frauds, which report I had here, and which report shows that the Speaker and the President who made that statement were only mistaken in this: that there were seven hundred more fraudulent votes, according to the evidence, than they supposed there were. If I recollect their statement, they supposed there were two thousand fraudulent votes. The evidence before this board of commissioners shows that there were twenty-seven hundred.

Mr. TOOMBS. I was commenting, before I got to that point, on the testimony which my friend took from this statement. I had no doubt that he intended to give the facts correctly, and I want to show him that this statement is not supported by the evidence. I have looked into the matter. In the evidence of those two gentlemen, the Speaker of the House and the President of the Council, they give, as their means of knowledge, the fact that they knew the country. I do not think that is very good evidence. I submit to him, as a question of evidence, the utter worthlessness of such statements as evidence of a fact.

Now, Mr. President, let us group the allegations presented by my friend from Kentucky to sustain the charge of fraud, which he has so broadly and, as I think, incautiously made, against the Lecompton constitution.

The first allegation is, that the original Legislature was elected by fraud and force. This I have already disposed of; and besides, if it were true, these events happened nearly three years before this constitution was made; and the convention that made it was not even called by this Legislature. Secondly, he avers that there were great and flagrant frauds perpetrated at Oxford, in Johnson county, at the election in October last. These were transactions affecting the present Territorial Legislature, and were perpetrated, if at all, before the Lecompton constitution was either made or promulgated, and had no legal or other connection with that instrument. Thirdly, that there were frauds on the 4th of January, in the elections for State officers. These transactions were after the constitution was ratified and proclaimed, and could therefore no more affect its validity than frauds in Kentucky at a State election could invalidate their constitution, and are probably cognizable before another tribunal, and not by this body or the Territorial Legislature. Does it need argument to repel these unfounded charges against this constitution? If there be solid objections against this constitution, they will be equally good against any constitution that ever shall be made by the people of Kansas. If it be a ground of exclusion now, it will be a perpetual ground of exclusion; and if they are solid objections, truly founded on fraud, how can the Senator remove or cure them by a resubmission of the instrument to the people? The taint of fraud, if it truly exists, cannot be thus washed out. My friend cannot stand on these grounds; they are unfounded and untenable, and must fall before the public judgment, and his own calmer consideration of the question. None of these allegations affect the vote of the people to call the convention that made the constitution. None of them affect the validity or legality of the second Legislature which authorized the convention. None of them the vote by which the pro-slavery clause was adopted. All these are legal, valid, untainted acts, and stamps the character of this Lecompton constitution, and rescues it from these unfounded assertions. I know the honorable Senator has been deceived by the statements of persons who have objects far different from his own. They care nothing for these alleged frauds. With him they are reasons for his conduct; with them they are but pretenses, fraudulent pretenses, to cover up their hostility to the original Kansas act, that great measure of constitutional right.

As further evidence of the fact that this constitution does embody the will of the people, I am referred to Governor Walker and ex-Secretary Stanton, and the present Legislature of Kansas. These gentlemen are willing but competent witnesses, standing upon no better footing than ordinary men, and they are indebted to my courtesy for refraining from further criticism of their conduct in Kansas. They state their opinion against the truth as uttered by the ballot-box; and this Le-gisature asserts that nine tenths of the people are against it. I am obliged to them for furnishing this most indisputable proof of extravagance and want of reliability of their statement. They admit about twenty-five hundred legal votes to have been cast on the 21st of December; and if their statements are true, there must be about twenty thousand votes against it. No election in the Territory has ever shown as many as fourteen thousand votes, counting fraudulent as well as legal; therefore their statement is necessarily untrue. They usurped jurisdiction in an election over which they had no control, which greatly weakens their general credibility; and their atrocious and unconstitutional enactments, when they got power, have marked them as better fitted for the criminal's box than the witness stand. Against all these mere statements, I oppose and offer to the Senate the highest evidence known to our laws, of the popular will—that will as legally uttered through the ballot-box.

I leave this branch of the subject—though not exhausted, my strength is nearly so—and invite your attention to a single remaining point in the argument of the honorable Senator. I deeply regretted to hear him say that he disapproved the repeal of the Missouri restriction; that the prohibition of slavery north of 36° 30' had the sanction of great and patriotic names, among whom he enumerates, as one preëminently entitled to the credit of that measure, the name of one of Kentucky's greatest, noblest sons, and one of the brightest ornaments of the Republic—the name of Henry Clay. I am quite sure that it must have escaped the recollection of my friend, that in 1850 that great statesman, in his place in this body, corrected that popular error, and expressed his surprise that so well established a fact should so long have been misunderstood by the public. I quote, sir, from memory, but his speech is fully reported in the Globe. He then stated that he was not the author of that measure; that it originated in the Senate while he was a member of the House. It was proposed by Mr. Thomas, of Illinois, and he did not know that he ever voted for it; but he did not doubt his concurrence with his southern friends on that occasion; but that he had no agency whatever in originating or carrying it through either branch of Congress. These are substantially the facts; and this unjust, unequal, and unconstitutional legislation cannot lighten its sentence of condemnation by the authority of that illustrious statesman. In 1850, after thirty years' trial, he condemned and repudiated it, and placed the legislation of the country on the very basis that the Kansas act maintains and upholds.

My honorable friend regrets its fall; regrets its just condemnation by Congress, the country, and the people. From the bottom of my heart I rejoice at it, and renew my gratitude to the Ruler of men and of nations that it has fallen: it was a delusion and a snare; it was the mother of slavery restriction in the Territories, of discord, of strife, of injustice, of wrong. Let it perish forever. I do not now wonder that I should differ with my friend on this question; it is the legitimate result of the overthrow of the Missouri restriction. What was the effect of this repeal upon his constituents and mine? what upon all the people of every section of the Union? It simply restored our common property to the equal common enjoyment of its joint owners. We asked no advantage, and sought none, over any portion of the Union. We demanded that all the people of all the States should not be forbidden by an act of Congress to enter the common domain with their families and property of every sort, but should be protected by our common Government in the peaceable enjoyment of their rights, until the new Territory should be strong enough to take upon herself the duties and burdens and rights of a sovereign State, and then that she might adopt such domestic institutions as she might prescribe in her constitution. We restored to the Kentuckian, in common with all of his brethren of the Union, the long-lost right to carry his slave, on these terms, into all the Territories of the Union. This edict of exclusion was overthrown, and his countrymen and mine were thereby restored to their just rights in the Territories. This is her right, sir; is Kentucky prepared to surrender it? No, sir, never, never! I know her history; it is one of which she may be justly proud. I know the valor, the prowess, the intrepidity, and the lofty patriotism of her sons. I know, too, that, like my friend's, her devotion to the Union is deep and abiding. I have sometimes feared that her danger was that she might "love, not wisely, but too well;" that her worship of it bordered on idolatry. Yet for all this, she will maintain her just and equal rights in the Confederacy; and if these shackles are again put upon her stalwart limbs; if she is deprived of these rights restored to her by the repeal of the Missouri restriction; if she shall be degraded from her high position of equality in this Union, no State will feel more keenly, or resist more firmly this great wrong, than Kentucky. Nor will the anguish of her great heart be lessened by the consciousness that the fatal blow is struck by one of her own beloved and cherished sons.

"Keen [will be] pangs, but keener far to feel,
She nursed the passion which impelled the steel."

Mr. President, there is another test of the nationality of this policy, to which I would, for a few moments, invite your attention. Not alone in the South, whose interests are mainly and more immediately affected by it, but throughout the non-slaveholding States, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, its supporters are to be found, men who, rising superior to local and sectional prejudices and passions and influences, brave, dare all for the public weal.

At the head of this noble column of patriots stands the President of the Republic. Having reached, by the voice of his countrymen, the loftiest pinnacle of honorable ambition, at once the reward and testimonial of a long, able, brilliant, and patriotic career in the service of his country, surely none can doubt the disinterestedness of his counsels, or the purity of his motives. His sands of life have nearly run out. At home and abroad, in the Cabinet and in the Senate, he has won unfading laurels for himself and shed luster over the annals of his country. His political record is made up; it is submitted to the future, to time, and to truth; full of years and of honors he can now only seek to make a record that shall stand the scrutiny of the Judge of all the earth. Looking at this question at his lofty eminence, above the clouds and passions which obscure the mental vision of the active combatants, he supports this great policy which I have reviewed, and decides this measure to be wise, just, and necessary to the peace of the Republic. By his side stands another venerable patriot from the same section of the Union, who has passed the ordinary period of life allotted to man; one whose life has been patriotically devoted to the service of the country, to the practice of virtue, and the pursuit of truth. He, too, gave his voice and his vote against the Missouri restriction, and gives his support to the measure before us. Connecticut and Pennsylvania supply two other able, upright, and distinguished sons in the Cabinet to enlarge this patriot band and to vindicate these measures.

Many of the truest, firmest, and most able defenders of this policy are to be found on this floor and in the other House, among the representatives of the northern Democracy. Shoulder to shoulder with ourselves have these noble patriots struggled through long years against the rage and fanaticism of the common enemies of equality in the Territories and the independence of the States. From the beginning of this conflict, with unswerving devotion to their convictions, to the right, they have struggled on, defying prejudice, passion, and the torrents of defamation with which they have been assailed. A large majority of the northern Democracy in Congress voted to strike this restriction from the statute-book, and thus restore the rights of their southern brethren. Their enemies tauntingly point out to them daily the wrecks and ruins of the political hopes of their comrades, who have fallen in this great constitutional battle. Every wave of this fanaticism, to arrest which they have thrown themselves with such heroic and patriotic virtue into the breach, sweeps away some of them. Others will share the same fate; yet the noble remnant are undismayed. Standing for the right, upholding the Constitution, they present a spectacle of moral sublimity which challenges the admiration of friend and foe, and has no parallel in ancient or modern times.

This is true heroism. It deserves a monument more durable than brass. While some of their comrades have fallen honorably in the contest, others less fortunate have deserted and swelled the advancing hosts of the enemy, and left the lessened band to bear the brunt of this great contest. Their intrepidity, their courage, their patriotic devotion to their principles have risen with the occasion. Every increase of danger has been met with a sturdier, a more defiant courage. They have thrown their banner on the outer walls; and, neither chagrined by treachery, nor disheartened by desertion, nor overawed by numbers, they display a magnanimity and courage as great as the occasion, as prolonged as the conflict. All honor to this noble band of patriots!

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I propose to occupy a few moments to correct a mistake which I believe is rendered necessary by the remarks of my friend from Georgia. I have listened to him with great pleasure, and have cause to thank him for much that he has said.

I knew, sir, that Mr. Clay was not the author of the Missouri compromise; I knew that he did not draw the bill; but I knew, from his own declarations in conversation and in his speeches, that he did approve and concur in the passage of the bill. He gave it his sanction. He thought there was nothing unconstitutional in it. I have been brought up in the opinion that it was not only constitutional, but one of the most beneficial acts that had ever been passed by the Congress of the United States; that it had produced more of good than all the tariff laws or all the revenue laws that had ever been passed. It produced you, sir, a revenue of peace and good will among the people of the United States, and that is above all tariffs. Whatever other sanctions it may have failed in the names of the great men who supported it at that date, it has received abundantly from the people of the United States for the thirty-odd years it remained upon the statute-book, and for that number of years, in respect to the territory which it embraced, it gave us peace. It was for that I valued it, and for nothing else.

This opinion was adopted by me more than thirty years ago, perhaps without much examination; it had grown up as a fixed fact in my mind that that compromise formed one of the most beneficial acts of legislation that it was ever the good fortune of this Congress to pass. I have often, falling for a time into that common error to which the gentleman has alluded, and ascribing it to Mr. Clay, as its great author, rather than to any mere actual manual part he had in the work, extolled him for it; and, as I said yesterday, it was one of the claims in the opinions of the people which entitled him to the noble denomination of pacifier of his country. Sir, I have not been able to cast away that impression. I admit the Supreme Court to be the great arbiter, as the gentleman claims; and while I differ from it, I do not the less admit its constitutional and sovereign power in all the matters that come within its jurisdiction, and the chances are that any one is in the wrong who differs with it. I admit all that; but yet there are some things we cannot yield up. Our own convictions we cannot yield. We may obey, and yet disbelieve. I entertain the opinion now, that I have entertained for forty years—I am sorry to give so long a date to it. Since the passage of the Missouri compromise act, (not quite forty years ago,) I have always thought it was a constitutional and beneficial one. But I acknowledge the duty of obedience and submission to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I acknowledge that its decision, within the province the Constitution has assigned to it, is just as conclusive as your decision and mine within the limits to which we are confined.

My friend has said that I seem disposed to give no confidence whatever to the action of any of the Territorial Legislatures of Kansas, until they fell into the hands of the Black Republicans. Certainly he cannot suppose that that furnishes any ground of particular favor or attachment in my mind. I considered it merely as the Legislature of the Territory, the actual Legislature. How its members may be divided in politics I do not know, nor do I care; nor was it at all material for my purpose. It is enough for me that it is the Legislature of the Territory, and that it appointed a vote to be taken upon this constitution on the 4th of January. The vote was taken, and the result was as reported to us. I have heard nothing to impeach that vote, nor any single fact alleged against it. The result of it was a majority of ten thousand against the constitution. Certainly, those ten thousand have, at least, as good a right to be claimed against it, as the six thousand returned as having voted on the 21st of December have to be counted in favor of it. That was my object. It was to show that there was a majority against this instrument; and, assuming all this action to be equally legitimate, the members of the convention had no more right to order a vote to be taken by the people on any part of the constitution, it seems to me, than the Territorial Legislature had to order an election to be taken on the whole constitution. Both proceeded from organized, recognized bodies, one the Legislature, the other the convention. When, therefore, the common appeal is made to us and the constitution is brought before us, it seems to me that we ought equally to take into consideration both these facts. Furthermore, I adverted to the evidence going to show that, from the six thousand in favor of the constitution, there were many spurious and fraudulent votes to be deducted.

Mr. President, I acknowledge that forms are not only useful, but in many cases necessary. I agree that if, at an election, two thirds of the people stay away from mere apathy or negligence, the votes of those who do act and do vote must be effectual and must control. I agree, also, that the return is a necessary form, and that the revision of that return is subject only to the particular authority appointed for it, and when that is done there is an end of the case, there being no further tribunal to whom we can appeal; but I supposed and argued that, when this constitution was presented before us, the supreme power, now called upon to recognize the validity of these acts, called upon to recognize what was the will of the people in respect to them, we have a right to look to all the evidence, as well to that which is furnished in form, as to that which impeaches the formal papers on the ground of fraud.

I have spoken on these conclusions, and I shall act on them in voting against the acceptance of this Lecompton constitution. My friend, I have no doubt in perfect sincerity, regrets that my conclusions have forced me to this course; but I have followed my conclusions, and I mean to do my duty as I understand it.

Mr. President, I am not wanting, I think, in those feelings of our nature which connect us with our neighbors. Although we have a common country to look to, and ought to have a common patriotism which would embrace the whole, our natural affections and our natural feelings bind us with those with whom we are more immediately associated; to whom we are more nearly assimilated in manners, customs, and institutions—ay, peculiar institutions. I am not wanting in these sympathies; but what is my duty, as one belonging to a particular section, by his nativity and by his residence—what is my duty when a great question of this sort comes up? What is my duty to those neighbors to whom, by natural sympathies and affections, I am most bound? Is it not my duty, in this House of our common councils, to give the best counsel and advice I can; or am I to inquire whether this is to be regarded as a sectional question, and follow whatever course is indicated by a majority of its sectional members? Is it not rather my duty to my friends to give them the best counsel I can? I want to see the South, for instance—to apply this matter to her—always right. How am I to accomplish that? By advising always what my best judgment thinks is right, and by endeavoring to prevail upon her to take that course. Is not that my duty? Is not that my duty to my common country? and more especially is it not my duty to those with whom circumstances more nearly connect me? I have done that. I should have been gratified if the South had taken the same view of this subject that I have. I am sure she would have lost nothing by it. The question of slavery is not in the case. I think there is not one gentleman here who entertains the hope that Kansas can ever be really a slave State. If it be, it must only be for a little moment—a little, feverish moment—filled up with strife and angry controversy. No gentleman here believes it will really and permanently be a slave State. There is nothing, then, to be gained by the South, as I regard the subject. The element of slavery is only thrown in for the purpose of arousing feeling on the one side or the other. It is no real element in the question before us, because no man has any hope that Kansas will be a slave State. We learn that from every source. The hope of it was disclaimed before the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed; that view is now turned into conviction by all that has occurred since; and there is nobody who deceives himself so much, or would deceive the South so much, as to tell her that Kansas will be made a slave State by the adoption of this constitution, except, it may be, for that miserable and feverish period to which I have alluded, and which would be filled up in a struggle that could serve only to exasperate parties, and make the contest there more fierce than it has been.

If the South could have taken the view of the case which I have taken, it seems to me it would have been better for her. Then she would say, "the South scorns to take advantage of the little circumstances that might enable her to press her claims upon a reluctant and unwilling people—press the claim to impose slavery against their will; we snatch at no such accidental advantages; we see that the question is determined partly by climate, and more certainly and decisively by the majority of the people; the determination has been against slavery; we stand up in our justice, and in our honor always untarnished, and constituting our great strength as Commonwealths and States; and we say we will make no strife about it." If this element of slavery could be discharged out of the case, put out of our minds, put out of our debates, and we could look at this question singly, with an eye to the fairness of the instrument before us, and to the evidence which leads to the issue whether it is or is not the will of the people, I think there is none here who would be willing to give his sanction even for a moment to an instrument the existence of which, in respect to its fairness, was at all questioned.

Why need we of the South be impatient and anxious to hasten the admission of Kansas into the Union? Whatever constitution you put upon them now will not last; but you will have two Senators immediately from there. Should the South be in a hurry to have two more such Senators here as you would now get from there? But these are small matters. If the South could view this subject as I do, if they could have looked at this constitution, and the circumstances from which it had its origin, and those which attend it, as I do, they would have acted the very part which I have indicated; they would take no ignoble advantage; they would occupy no ignoble position of standing upon little points and nice estoppels. No, sir, the South would say—it is in her character, in her spirit, to say so—we go upon great principles, and we go for the truth. Occupying that position, the South would have stood where I have been proud so often to look upon her, and regard her as standing.

Sir, gentlemen of the South who differ with me, misunderstand me very much if they suppose that it is my purpose by these remarks, in any degree or in any way to impugn the integrity of feeling and motive by which they are now actuated. They view this question differently from me, and their course is made to conform to their convictions. I have performed my duty as one of the Senators belonging to the same section; I have given my opinion and my advice, and whether that advice be regarded or disregarded, I cannot be accountable for the result. I have given you the reasons why I have taken the course which I have indicated. Whatever course others choose to take, I hope it may turn out contrary to any anticipation of mine, to be most beneficial and most advantageous to the great interests of the people of the United States. I lament, only, that the course which I have indicated, and which I am pursuing, is not that which a different view of this subject would have led every Senator from the southern States of this Union to pursue. I think it would be the proudest and the noblest position for the South to occupy. She has no truer or more faithful son than I am. I can desert nobody, for I am enlisted under nobody. I am here the Senator of the State of Kentucky. I came here with the purpose, not of acting the character of a party man, or a partisan. I thought I had grown old enough to rid myself of the misconceptions and the prejudices that belong to the partisan; and my pride and ambition, when taking my seat here, were that I should now be able to act rather the part of the patriot than the partisan. I am a true son of the South, and I am a true citizen of the United States, one and all, inseparable and indivisible, now and forever. That is what I am. But whatever fate may betide this or that measure as to the South, no man wishes her better. May the sun shine forever upon her head, and prosperity fill all her borders. The duty which I owe to her, and to my common country, I intend to perform in no pride, in no feeling of affectation, in no feeling of superiority of judgment—God forbid—but simply because I believe it to be my duty to the South and my duty to the whole country and to my own integrity and my own convictions.

MR. BELL. Mr. President, it is my misfortune to be obliged to address the Senate at this late hour of the day, upon a subject of so much importance, or not at all. After the speech of the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] I shall be compelled to trespass longer upon the indulgence of the Senate than I had hoped would be necessary. He has made issues, he has stated facts, he has promulgated doctrines and arguments from his seat in the Senate to-day, which no man can pass unnoticed who takes the views I do of this question. He says, in substance, that it is a question of union or disunion; it is no sectional question, but one which concerns the whole country—the North as well as the South. He has proclaimed to the Senate that he has estimated the value of the Union, and that, upon a proper occasion, he is ready to state that value. With him it is a myth, a false idol; and he fears that the State of Kentucky, which my honorable and eloquent friend [Mr. CRITTENDEN] so well represents, has worshiped and loved, not wisely but too well. He has brought the question to a point—an issue which it becomes us all to ponder. I have been fearful that there were such calculations as he has suggested, founded on the possible result of this question; but I had before no evidence of it. It was only a vague dread, an impression resting on my mind; but now we must meet it as an admitted fact. It is now placed before us openly, boldly, directly; and therefore I feel called upon to notice it in every aspect to which he has pointed.

I do not mean to go into an estimate of the value of the Union, nor of the consequences which would flow from its destruction; but I mean to go into an investigation of the question before the Senate—the proposition to admit Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution—to show that the rejection of this measure would not be a fit pretext to be adopted by the South for the purpose of leading to that final issue to which the Senator from Georgia has alluded. It concerns not only the Senate, but the whole country, to look at this question in a different light from that in which the honorable Senator from Georgia has presented it. I am tempted by these considerations to depart from any regular course of argument, such as I had prescribed for myself, in order to notice at the outset some of his most unfounded statements in regard to the true facts of the case. I do not mean any personal disrespect to the honorable Senator; I do not mean to say that he has willfully presented a false view of the case; but many of his statements of fact are wholly unfounded.

I propose to go back to the original organization of the territorial government in Kansas—a part of the history of the Territory which I had intended to pass over, with a summary statement only of such facts—undisputed facts—as might be found chronicled in the public journals, without going into any minute investigation of them; but I now feel compelled to look more carefully into all the details of the subject, by the exigencies and importance of the question, by the demands which I consider the country has on every man having a seat here, to be well informed upon every material point connected with the subject. Like the honorable Senator from Kentucky, I do not mean to refer to the organization of the territorial government in Kansas for the purpose of justifying the party who have opposed that government, for I mean to become the partisan of neither side of this controversy. I have considered from the very origin of these difficulties—the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act—that there has been more of party interest and necessity than of any possible good to the country connected with this whole movement; and when I say this, I do not mean to impugn the motives of the honorable Senators who disclaim any such party interests. They may be unconscious of them. I therefore give them credit for their disclaimer.

I shall not at this time enter into a full statement of the facts connected with the election of members to the first Territorial Legislature, which took place in 1855, or with the armed intrusion of the people of the western borders of Missouri into Kansas, at that election. The Senator from Georgia says that the statements which have been made on this subject are entitled to no credit. He ridicules them so far as they are made on the authority of individuals engaged in that invasion, as it has been called, as the idle boasts of vain-glorious individuals. I admit that, as a general rule, little credit is to be attached to such statements; but I will lay before the Senate some facts that are founded upon that sort of record which the honorable Senator says will last as long as society lasts. I shall refer to authentic, well-confirmed facts, proved at the time of their occurrence by cotemporary evidence—testimony taken by men of credit and good character. I refer, in this particular case, to the investigations of members of Congress, and of both sides in politics, commissioned and authorized to investigate.

Now, what are the most material and prominent facts connected with the election in 1855? I may possibly go into a fuller statement of the circumstances of that election before I close my remarks. A census was taken under a provision of the organic law of Kansas one month before that election, and the returns showed that there were twenty-nine hundred and three qualified voters then in the Territory of Kansas. The election came on, and six thousand three hundred and seven votes were polled, as appeared from the poll-books. Of the twenty-nine hundred and three returned on the census list, only eight hundred and ninety-eight voted. Where were the remainder of the twenty-nine hundred and odd reported in the census returns? As the honorable Senator from Kentucky has spoken of interviews he has had with gentlemen connected with this transaction, I will tell what I have learned from similar sources. I understand that the census returns were, in part, made out in the border counties of Missouri; and it appears from an examination of the poll-books, that two thousand persons, and upwards, whose names were on the census lists did not vote in the election. We cannot draw any certain inference whether the two thousand who did not vote were free-State men who were driven from the polls, or how otherwise. I only state the simple fact, that but about nine hundred of them voted. The argument on the other side is, that of the twenty-nine hundred persons whose names were on the census returns, seventeen hundred were emigrants from the southern States, and but twelve hundred from the free States. We do not know what proportion of the nine hundred who voted were free-State men from the northern States, or what portion came from the southern States; nor is it material to decide that question, for only about one third of the whole voted. The honorable Senator has spoken of intrinsic evidence; he has appealed to what he considers the monumental record that is to last as long as society lasts. I appeal to it, too.

MR. TOOMBS. Do I understand my friend to say that of the twenty nine hundred voters recorded on the census only nine hundred voted?

MR. BELL. Yes, sir.

MR. TOOMBS. I assure my friend he is mistaken, for my friend from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] said in his report that six thousand voted. His complaint was that they doubled.

MR. BELL. I see that my friend from Georgia does not understand the question at all, and I was utterly astonished when I heard him in his statement passing over or denying the principal facts of the case.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will my friend from Tennessee allow me to say a word?

Mr. BELL. It is needless; I know the facts; but I will allow the Senator from Vermont to say a word, as he was alluded to by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. COLLAMER. The names of the six thousand who voted are all on the roll; and when you count those names, there are but eight hundred of them who are on the census list.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not understand that.

Mr. BELL. Does the honorable Senator from Georgia say he has examined the names?

Mr. TOOMBS. They have been examined by a friend of mine.

Mr. BELL. Is it not a fact that only about nine hundred of those whose names were on the census list voted?

Mr. TOOMBS. I think that is a mistake.

Mr. BELL. I can refer to the evidence.

Mr. TOOMBS. What evidence?

Mr. BELL. To the report of the names that were polled, compared with those on the census list.

Mr. TOOMBS. That, I think, you will find not to be a record. That is the difficulty.

Mr. BELL. But it shows the returns of the election, and is evidence.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is no such record in the world. Let me explain to my friend what I mean. The census that was taken was a record. As for all these accounts, by which it is made to appear that only eight hundred of those who were on the census list voted, they do not appear by any lawful authority—by any record. Has any person, on whom the Senator from Tennessee relies, ascertained the fact?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOOMBS. It was never ascertained by any authority.

Mr. BELL. The committee of investigation of the House of Representatives ascertained it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not consider their report a record; but perhaps I do not understand what a record is.

Mr. BELL. Perhaps I do not know what a record is. I refer to all the record that could exist in such a case, and I say that this fact is stated on sworn evidence. Will that pass for evidence? It was testimony taken by authority of the House of Representatives, by members of both political parties.

Mr. TOOMBS. If it is evidence in itself, it is evidence for the purpose—not otherwise.

Mr. BELL. The clerk of the committee of investigation compared the names on the census rolls with those on the election return lists or poll-books, and of the twenty-nine hundred returned on the census rolls in February, 1855, he could find only eight hundred and ninety-eight names recorded on the poll-books or list of voters returned in March. Now, the question is, where did the other five thousand and odd votes that were polled on the 30th of March, 1855, come from? From over the borders, of course, or made up by forged returns. These are facts, as well authenticated as facts of the kind could be—not in ancient times, not in the dark ages, but in the present day of light. These facts were ascertained under the supervision of a joint commission of partisans on both sides of the question. I do not desire, however, to pursue this inquiry now, for I mean to resume it at another time. I will merely say here, that at this election, by these means, every member of the Council and House of Representatives elected, except one, was of the pro-slavery party. Governor Reeder set aside the election certificates in several cases, on the ground of irregularity or fraud, and new elections were ordered; but in those cases where free-State men were returned elected, the Legislature rejected their claims to sit as members, and admitted those who had been set aside by the Governor. The pro-slavery party thus secured the whole Legislature, except one member, as I understand the history of the case.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is true.

Mr. BELL. The honorable Senator admits that to be true. It was all a one-sided affair, and made so by the five thousand and odd voters in that election not found on the census returns. The honorable Senator in the course of his speech appealed to the judgment of the impartial—to such as have no connection with either of the parties in Kansas—and asked what would be their decision upon this question? I appeal to the same impartial tribunal. That Legislature was elected chiefly by voters from Missouri; by citizens who had no right, by the organic law, to interpose in the election. It was irregular, and unlawful in every sense of the word.

But, sir, I am anticipating my argument. I thought, however, that I would travel out of my course for a few moments, in order to show that the honorable Senator from Georgia was totally mistaken as to the facts that I considered fundamental in coming to a right understanding of this question. I saw that the honorable Senator from Kentucky, not having looked into these points as carefully, perhaps, as I had done, was utterly amazed, he seemed to be confounded, when his friend from Georgia gave such a totally different version and coloring to the facts connected with the election of 1855, from what he had understood.

The honorable Senator from Georgia has furnished me, in the course of his argument, with some points for consideration for which I thank him. He tells us in substance, and plainly enough, that it is victory which is now to be contended for. This measure must be carried, now that an issue is made up on it. He has pronounced high and overwrought eulogies on the course of the distinguished gentlemen now at the head of affairs in relation to this question. I shall attempt to show how far, and with what justice, they are entitled to the eloquent eulogium of the honorable Senator from Georgia; and this I shall not do with a view of manifesting any personal disrespect to those high functionaries. I do not seek, in anything I shall say now or at any time, to detract from the high personal character of those distinguished gentlemen. I am not sure, however, that they have been the bold and undaunted men that they ought to be in the positions which they occupy, at such a time as this, in such a crisis as this, and upon such a question as the present. I fear that they have cowered and quailed before such bold men as the Senator from Georgia, and others who concur with him as to the policy which ought to be pursued in relation to Kansas affairs.

The Senator from Georgia, throughout his speech, seemed to be resolved upon victory, in carrying out all his plans connected with Kansas affairs, whatever consequences may follow; and I am afraid that the President and his Cabinet may have been constrained to espouse this measure under the positive and imperious requisition of such gentlemen as the Senator from Georgia.

I intend, if I have time, to review the Kansas-Nebraska act, and its consequences, respectfully towards the authors of it personally, that the country may learn a lesson from it. I shall not undertake to teach the Senate to what extremes the passions of men may lead them when they once get fully committed to a violent controversy on such questions. It was the passion for victory that carried the Kansas-Nebraska bill through Congress, under circumstances more extraordinary than ever attended the passage of any measure, so important in its consequences, through any legislative body, except, perhaps, in the times of revolutionary France. I do not mean to say the gentlemen were actuated by bad principles, or mischievous purposes; but Senators and Representatives seemed to me to have been so inflamed and exasperated by the fierce collisions of sentiment and opinions between them and their opponents, that their reason was taken captive; they became infatuated, and all their energies came to be concentrated upon one purpose, that of victory. It will be well to contrast the circumstances and results of that measure with the circumstances attending the present question, that we may form some rational estimate of the real value of those principles or objects sought to be established or accomplished by urging this measure through Congress, on the one side, and of the evil consequences which may follow its adoption, on the other. It is more than indicated; it is boldly assumed by some gentlemen, that the rejection of this measure will be regarded as a decision that no more slave States are to be admitted into the Union, and the consequences which may follow such a decision are pointed to in no unequivocal language.

There is no gentleman here with whom I differ as to the value of the Union of these States, to whom I do not accord honesty and patriotism of purpose. There is simply between us a difference in judgment as to the true interest of this great country; the true interest of the South as well as of the North, connected with the Union. When my attention is invited to the consideration of the advantages and blessings that may follow disunion to the South, I shun the subject as one that is speculative only, and prematurely brought forward. That is a field of inquiry into which I do not propose now to enter. When an issue is made; when a question does arise demanding such an inquiry as that, I shall be ready to enter upon it, and to estimate the value of the Union; but I will not anticipate the occurrence of any such contingency. When the North shall, by any deliberate act, deprive the South of any fair and just and equal participation in the benefits of the Union—if, for example, the Territory now proposed to be admitted into the Union as a State had not been subject to an interdiction of slavery for thirty years—if it were a Territory such as that lying west of Arkansas, by climate adapted to slave labor, and by population already a slave Territory; and if, on an application of such a Territory for admission into the Union as a slave State, the powerful North, without any of the feelings and resentments naturally growing out of the repeal of the Missouri compromise in regard to Kansas, should deliberately announce to the South, "you shall have no more slave States," that would afford a pretext with which the South might with some reason, and with some assurance of the approval of the civilized world and of posterity, seek to dissolve the Union. I know that it is supposed by some that the day will come when the North, in the arrogance of its power, will furnish just such a pretext as I have indicated; and the Senator from Georgia and others have argued this question on the ground that it will come; but I must see it come before I will calculate the value of this Union. I trust that day will never come. I do not believe it will come if the South is wise and true to itself. I would not have the South trundle or surrender any of their rights. I would not have them yield one jot or tittle of their rights; but I would have them make no questionable issues in advance, stir up no strife upon unnecessary abstract questions, having no practical value; but to do always what is just and right upon all questions. When a people or a Territory applies for admission into the Union under a constitution fairly formed, with the assent of the people excluding slavery, I would admit it promptly; and when an application comes, on the other hand, from the people of a Territory who have fairly formed a constitution recognizing slavery, I would insist upon its admission as a slave State. If the North should not agree to this, it would then be time enough to consider of the proper remedy. But I would make no such issue with the North now, and before any occasion for it has arisen; and I regret most sincerely to hear any Senator from the North suggesting that such an issue will ever be tendered from that quarter.

I have been led to make these remarks altogether out of the course of argument I had intended to pursue, by reason of the unexpected speech of the Senator from Georgia on this question; his extraordinary statements and avowals, both as to doctrine and matters of fact. I have felt it necessary, at the outset of my remarks, to meet some of them.

Now, Mr. President, unless this is to be the inauguration of a sort of saturnalia of principle; unless, from this time forth, there is nothing to be considered as established or permanent in this country; unless all the old landmarks are to be removed; unless the waters are to be let out, and all the highways are to be broken up, it would be an easy matter—the most easy task in the world—to demonstrate that, according to all sound principles, there is at this time no application before Congress, with the assent of the people of Kansas, for admission into the Union as a State. I do not know whether other Senators have thought of the question in that aspect or not.

What is the true doctrine on this subject? I had supposed that there could be no disagreement as to the true principles connected with the rights and powers of the people in forming a State constitution; but since I have heard the speech of the Senator from Georgia, I do not know what principle he agrees to. I say that in no disrespect; but I thought he was particularly wild, shooting extraflamantia maniamundi, on those high points of doctrine which he, in some parts of his speech, thought proper to enunciate. Does any person here deny the proposition, that the people of a Territory, in the formation of a State constitution, are to that extent—quoad hoc—sovereign and uncontrollable, though still owing obedience to the provisional government of the Territory? Will any Senator contend that the Territorial Legislature can either give to the people any power over that subject which they did not possess before, or withhold from them any which they did possess? The Territorial Legislature cannot dictate any one provision of the constitution which the people think proper to form. Who is prepared to contend that Congress can do anything more in this respect than a Territorial Legislature? It is usual for the Territorial Legislature, when the people desire to apply for admission into the Union, in the absence of an enabling act of Congress, to pass a law providing for the assembling of a convention to form a State constitution. But that is a mere usage, resorted to when Congress has not thought proper to pass what is called an enabling act. What is an enabling act? Nothing more than to signify to the people of a Territory that if they shall think proper to meet in convention and form a State constitution, in compliance with certain forms therein prescribed, to insure a fair expression of the people's will, Congress is prepared to admit them into the Union as a State.

But such an act gives no more power to the people over the subject of a constitution than an act of a Territorial Legislature. But suppose the people, either under an act of the Territorial Legislature or of Congress, meet in convention, by delegates chosen by the people, and form a constitution: what then? Has it any vitality as a constitution? Does it transform the Territory into a State? Has it any binding force or effect either upon individuals or upon the community? Nobody pretends that it has any such force. It is only after the acceptance of the constitution, and the admission of the Territory into the Union as a State, that there is any vigor or validity in a constitution so formed. Before that time, it is worth no more than the parchment on which its provisions are written, so far as any legal or constitutional validity is concerned.

But, upon principle, the people of a Territory, without any act of the Territorial Legislature, without an enabling act of Congress, can hold public meetings and elect delegates to meet in convention for the purpose of forming a constitution; and, when formed, it has all the essential attributes of a valid constitution as one formed in any other way. Many Senators contend that it is the inalienable and indefeasible right of the people of a State at all times to change their constitution in any manner they think proper. This doctrine I do not admit, in regard to the people of a State; but, in reference to the formation of a constitution by the people of a Territory, there can be no question as to the soundness of this doctrine. They can form a constitution by delegates voluntarily chosen and sent to a convention, but what is it worth when it is formed? Nothing at all, until Congress shall accept it and admit the Territory into the Union as a State under that constitution. It is worth no more in that case than in the case of a constitution formed under a territorial act, or an act of Congress; but it is worth just as much.

The honorable Senator from Georgia says that the special message of the President on this subject will stand as a lasting monument of his patriotism, boldness, and adherence to the high principles of constitutional justice and right. I say that, according to the doctrine of that message, the people of a Territory have the right at any time to meet voluntarily in convention, in mass or by delegates, and to form a constitution; and when so formed, that, in virtue of the same powers of sovereignty over the subject, they can alter or change it, or form a new constitution, at any time before Congress shall have admitted them into the Union as a State, under the constitution as first formed and adopted in convention.

I know that the honorable Senator's argument upon this point was so mixed up with qualifications—such as that this act of sovereignty must be exercised in regular form—that I cannot assert that he has admitted the principle I have laid down; but others have. All agree that no constitution formed by the people of a Territory, whether formed in one way or another, has any validity or binding force, until the admission of the Territory into the Union as a State under it. Then, according to the admitted principle that the people of a Territory have a right to form a State constitution, with or without an enabling act of Congress, or with or without any act of the Territorial Legislature, where is the limitation or restriction upon the power of the people of Kansas to change or wholly set aside any constitution formed by them, at any time before Congress shall have accepted it? Gentlemen say that the Lecompton constitution was regularly and fairly formed, under the provisions of an act of the Territorial Legislature. Let all this be admitted to be true, as stated. What follows? Have the people lost all power over the constitution so formed, before it is accepted by Congress? Suppose the people of Kansas should become dissatisfied with the constitution they first agreed upon, and should desire to change some of the features of it, or to frame a new one, before the one first formed has been presented to Congress; or, if presented, before any action has taken place in regard to it; could not the people, either before the presentation, or between the presentation to and the acceptance by Congress, through the same regular forms in which the constitution was originally formed—that is to say, under an act of the Territorial Legislature—decide to set aside or reject the constitution which had been previously formed, and proceed to form a new one? I should like any honorable Senator to state why they have not ample and complete power over the whole subject until the last moment before the admission of the Territory into the Union as a State; and this upon every principle of sound doctrine and constitutional law known to this country? Certainly they have. Now, take the case of the Lecompton constitution. Admit that it was regularly formed, as gentlemen contend, and that it will not do to look into any frauds nor any contrivances that may have been resorted to in its formation; suppose it to have been formed with all the regularity and fairness that they insist it has; have the people, in that case, so tied up their hands, have they so fettered their inalienable right and power over the subject of their form of government, that they cannot alter, reform, or abolish it; that it must stand as it was originally formed, until Congress shall have passed upon it, accepting or rejecting it?

The idea of the President is, that when a Territory is once prepared for admission into the Union by the formation of a State constitution, the Territorial Legislature has no power over it.

That is not the question. The question is, have the people of the Territory the power over this constitution, and have they exercised it? The Legislature elected in October did proceed to provide for taking the sense of the people in regard to this constitution with the same regularity, and at least as unquestionable in regard to fairness as the original election of delegates to the convention which formed the Lecompton constitution; and the people have decided, by an overwhelming majority, against that constitution.

I say, therefore, that when you come to examine this question on every principle connected with the inalienable rights of her people, announced by the President and his principal supporters here, there is really no application before us for the admission of Kansas into the Union without the assent of the people of that Territory. Nevertheless, there may be such a condition of public affairs as to override all established principles; but it must be a very strong case to do that. It may possibly be that a case exists which may justify us in disregarding the manifest will of the people of Kansas, and taking this instrument presented to us by the President as the legitimate exponent of the sense of the people of that Territory, and admit it into the Union as a State. But unless such a case of overruling necessity can be made out, I maintain that it is enough to say, in opposition to this measure, that there is no application made to us by the people of Kansas for admission into the Union under this constitution.

Having disposed of this point, as the Senate has already determined that it will take a recess until seven o'clock, I request that, as but a minute intervenes between this and the appointed time for taking the recess, they will do me the favor to take it now.

On motion, the Senate took a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m., and resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. BELL. I regret that the speech of the honorable Senator from Georgia was of such a character and tenor as necessarily compels me to go more into detail on this subject than I had supposed would be proper after the very full investigation and discussion which have already taken place on most of the material points connected with it.

Unless this bill, when it is put to the test of a final vote, shall assume some different shape, I shall be compelled to cast my vote against it; and after what has been said by the Senator from Georgia, I feel it necessary to make a record of the facts of this case, as I understand them—not such a record as I can hope will stand as long as society lasts, in the language of that Senator; but such as I think will stand the scrutiny not only of the present but of future time.

I need say but little in regard to my position in relation to this subject, now or heretofore. I will say, that I may claim to be impartial between the parties that divide upon it. I owe no allegiance to either of them, nor am I swayed by any pride of consistency which some may feel, leading them to support all the measures that may be regarded as part and parcel of the original movement—of the repeal of the Missouri compromise. The honorable Senator from Georgia treated this question as directly connected with the Kansas-Nebraska act of 1854. The contest at this time he regards as involving a principle and policy embraced in that act. I did not believe, after examining that measure maturely and looking at it in all its aspects, that it would ever bring any solid benefit to the South. I never impugn the motives of honorable gentlemen who took a different view of the subject, but I did not believe that it would lead to the permanent establishment of any principle of any practical advantage to the South; but, on the other hand, that it would prove injurious to southern interests. I think so still.

With regard to the present question, I lay down as the basis of my conclusion as to what ought to be done, that the solution of it which promises the speediest termination of this dangerous slavery agitation is the true one. This dangerous agitation has continued long enough. There has been no mitigation of it in the last four years. There have been intervals of apparent repose, but it was just such repose as foreboded increased disorder and commotion. It is time to terminate it.

The question is, what is that solution which promises the speediest and most permanent remedy for these difficulties? Divine that to me, whoever can, and I will follow his lead. How shall we cut this Gordian knot of Kansas politics? Shall we cut it by the sword? Shall we first subdue the rebellious faction said to exist in Kansas by arms, or shall we attempt to unravel this tangled skein by some more peaceful means? The President assures us that the best, and I believe I am warranted in saying, from the language of his message, the only mode by which this dangerous slavery agitation can be quieted, and peace be restored to the whole country, is to admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; or, at all events, that to adopt this course will localize agitation, and leave the country and the Halls of Congress free from strife upon this exciting subject.

The President, furthermore, appears, from the tenor of his message, to consider that Congress is under an obligation, binding it in good faith to admit Kansas under this constitution. He states this proposition in his message, "that the organic law recognized the right of the people of the Territory, without an enabling act of Congress, to form a constitution, is too clear for argument." The assumption then is, that this is a constitution formed in pursuance of authority derived from the organic law of Kansas, enacted by Congress. He adds, that "it is impossible that the people could have proceeded with more regularity in the formation of a State constitution than the people of Kansas have done."

In another passage of his message, he speaks of this constitution as having been "fairly submitted for the ratification of the people." Hence the conclusion, that to reject the application of Kansas to be admitted into the Union under these circumstances, would be a violation of plighted faith. It is also said that such rejection would be justly considered as an outrage upon southern rights and feelings, inasmuch as the only objection that can be taken to this constitution by those who would reject it is, that it recognizes slavery. That is the position assumed by the President and those who support his policy upon this subject, with this addition, that we have no right to go beyond what appears on the face of the constitution, and the official authentication of the public acts and proceedings which led to its formation and subsequent ratification by the people; and that whatever irregularities or frauds may have occurred or been practiced connected with its formation or ratification, are altogether foreign to the question before us; and so of the question which has been raised as to whether a majority of the people of Kansas approve the constitution or not. All such inquiries are repudiated as irrelevant. Such is the issue made up and presented on the part of the supporters of this measure. On the other side, it is said that the Lecompton constitution has been formed in pursuance of no legal authority; that the organic act vested no such power in the Territorial Legislature; that it does not reflect the will of a majority of the people; that great irregularities took place in the election of delegates to the convention that formed it; that the constitution was not fairly submitted to the people for their ratification; and, upon these grounds, they say it would be an outrage on the rights of the people of Kansas to impose this constitution upon them. Now, how are the facts? Has this constitution been formed in pursuance of legal authority derived from the organic act of Congress? This I understand to be the main pillar on which the argument rests, that Congress is bound to admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, without inquiry as to the truth of any alleged irregularities or frauds connected with it, or as to whether the majority of the people approve it or not.

I noticed that my friend from Georgia argued the general question to-day on the assumption that that act did give to the people of Kansas the power to form a constitution; but he afterwards said that Congress was not bound to accept the constitution when formed under such authority; though he did contend that Congress would be bound, provided it had passed an enabling act, and the people of the Territory had accepted and acted under it. If Congress would not be bound to accept a constitution formed under territorial authority, derived from the organic law, what is that but an admission that the organic law does not contain the power claimed? If the power is given by the organic law, it is in the place of an enabling act, and would be just as binding on Congress when the people of Kansas accepted it as would be an enabling act accepted by the people of the Territory. With all due deference and respect to the opinions of the honorable Senator from Georgia and the President of the United States, I think there is no pretext for the assumption that the organic law of the Territory conferred any such power as is claimed. If it did, the organic laws of Utah, New Mexico, and Nebraska, conferred the same power on the people of those Territories; for the language is identical in all those laws. The Kansas organic law, after describing the boundaries of the proposed Territory, proceeds to declare that—"The same is hereby erected into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Kansas; and when admitted as a State or States, (if divided,) the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission."

The organic laws of New Mexico, Utah, and Nebraska contain similar provisions, without the variation of a word.

I make no account of the other clause in the Kansas organic law, which provides that its true intent and meaning was, to leave the people to form their domestic institutions in their own way; because I agree with the Senator from Georgia, that that gives not one jot of power which was not given to the people of the Territories of Utah, New Mexico, and Nebraska by their organic laws. The authority given in those acts to the Territorial Legislatures extended "to all rightful subjects of legislation, subject to the Constitution of the United States." Why was the peculiar language I have adverted to employed in the Kansas organic act? The purpose it has answered we are all well advised of. We know that it answered fully and completely the design with which it was incorporated into the Kansas-Nebraska act. It served to conciliate the support of northern men. It would be a most mischievous doctrine, indeed, if it were true that the organic law of Kansas gave the people the power to form a State constitution when they pleased, without any limitation as to time or population, and to demand admission into the Union as a right, which Congress could not resist without a violation of good faith. According to this construction of the organic law of Kansas, not only Kansas, but New Mexico and Utah, must be admitted into the Union whenever the people of those Territories shall think proper to apply for admission. It might be no great outrage to admit New Mexico at any time; but to admit Utah, with its Mormon population, upon compulsion, would not be so seemingly upon the principle sought to be applied to Kansas. The people of the Territory of Nebraska, though not exceeding probably some four to five thousand in number, would have a right to form a State constitution, and demand admission into the Union now, or as soon as they think proper to form a constitution and demand admission.

The idea that the Kansas organic law confers on the people of Kansas power to form a State constitution, and demand admission into the Union at their discretion, is subversive of every principle that has been considered established heretofore in connection with the admission of new States. Unless we mean to tear up all the old landmarks which have regulated us on questions of this description, it is a heresy which ought to be met at the threshold. Nevertheless, it is solemnly maintained by the President. I think it is sufficient proof that this is a heresy, that the Senator from Georgia, who indorses everything else in the President's message, abandons the President on this point, after he had stated in his message that this point was "too clear to admit of an argument."

Well, sir, to employ the language of the President, it being too clear to admit of an argument that the organic law of Kansas confers no power upon the people to form a State constitution, and there being, of course, no obligation of good faith resting upon Congress to admit that Territory into the Union under the constitution now presented to us, how stands the main question, and upon what principles are we to decide it? Just as all like questions have stood heretofore, when Congress had passed no enabling act, and is to be decided upon like principles of reason, expediency and propriety. The present application of a Territory to be admitted into the Union under a constitution formed without the authority of Congress, is an appeal to the discretion of Congress, which has power to admit or reject, as may be thought expedient or proper, under all the circumstances of the case. The application is open to all exceptions which may be taken to it—to all fair and reasonable objections—as, for example, that the constitution does not reflect the will of the people; that a majority or any respectable minority of them have not been represented in the convention which formed it; that a strong feeling of discontent and opposition exists among a large portion of the people upon the subject. One object that Congress ought to have in view in such cases would be, to give general satisfaction, to lay the foundation of good-neighborhood feeling among the inhabitants of the proposed new State. Not only should the complaints of the majority be inquired into, but those of a minority also. I do not know of any instance where Congress has admitted a State where there was a respectable protesting minority.

Let us now examine the grounds upon which this application stands, according to the principles I have thus laid down. I am afraid I shall be somewhat tedious, because I propose, at the risk of some repetition of what I have before said, to note all the leading facts and circumstances connected with this subject to be found in the brief and disorderly annals of Kansas. When the Kansas-Nebraska bill was first brought forward in the Senate, in January, 1854, there were probably not over a hundred white inhabitants in the Territory, excluding some few United States troops. As soon as the bill passed, the whole Territory, except the Indian reservations, was thrown open to free competition between the North and the South, between anti-slavery men and pro-slavery men, to settle, by superiority of numbers, whether Kansas should be a free or slave Territory; for, at that time, the popular understanding and interpretation of the Kansas-Nebraska act was, that the people of the Territory were authorized to settle that question by an act of the Territorial Legislature, and before they should come to form a State constitution. To be sure, there was a clause in the organic law that this power was to be exercised, subject to the Constitution of the United States; but the Constitution had been in existence more than half a century, and there had been no judicial interpretation of the Constitution which could lead the people to suppose that they were not fully authorized to decide the question of slavery by a territorial enactment. A considerable portion of the people of the North and East, in resentment of the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and resolving that the South should not derive any benefit from what they considered the wrong inflicted upon them by that measure, in the establishment of a new slave State, resorted to the organization of an emigrant aid society, by which they were enabled to furnish large facilities in money, and in other modes to quicken emigration, with a view to provide a sufficient number of settlers to control the election of members to the first Legislature, which it was supposed would decide the question of slavery in the Territory.

The people in the western counties of Missouri, living in slaveholding communities, and feeling a deep concern that Kansas should not become a free Territory or a free State, formed associations on their part, and adopted such other measures as they thought necessary to secure the ascendancy of the pro-slavery settlers in the election of members to the Legislature. When the day of election came, on the 30th day of March, 1855, many armed companies of Missourians appeared at the polls in most of the election districts and precincts; and where they found the judges of election opposed to their views, by threats of violence drove them away, and substituted others in their place; where they found the judges friendly to their views, they allowed them to remain in the discharge of their duties. The result, without going into further details on that point, was, that every pro-slavery candidate but one was returned as elected. The returns of the census, taken, under a requirement of the organic law, one month before this election, showed 2,903 qualified voters then in the Territory. At the election 6,307 votes were polled. Of the 2,903 whose names were upon the census rolls, only 898 voted at the election. This fact appears by the comparison of the names on the poll-books with the census returns. These facts speak for themselves. Either the census returns were false, or the Free-Soil voters were driven from the polls. But, be that as it may, it appears certain that some four or five thousand Missourians voted at the election, or the returns were fraudulent.

Complaints were made from several precincts that the election was carried by violence, and Governor Reeder set aside the returns in several cases, and ordered new elections; and in all these cases, except one, Free-Soil candidates were returned elected. When the Legislature met, however, they were all ejected, and the persons first returned as elected allowed to take their seats—so that the Legislature may be said to have been a unit on the slavery question.

That body proceeded to enact a code of laws. No act was passed establishing or prohibiting slavery. The question was not put to a vote in any form, except on the passage of stringent laws for the protection of slave property; and, among others, a law was enacted, making it a felony, punishable by two years' imprisonment at hard labor, to assert, either by speech or writing, or to circulate pamphlets, magazines, or any printed matter asserting, that it was not lawful to hold slaves in Kansas. Test-oaths were prescribed for voters and other regulations for the conduct of subsequent elections, well calculated, if not designed, to enable the pro-slavery party to carry all elections, and to keep the government of the Territory under their control; and they succeeded in that object until October, 1857.

In explanation of, and in justification of, these high-handed proceedings, commencing with the election in March, 1855, it is alleged that a gigantic fraud was committed by the Emigrant Aid Society in attempting, by unusual and violent means, to make Kansas a free State. I have no defense to make of the proceedings of that society; but it is material to state that, upon investigation, I find that before the first election in March, 1855, only one party or company of emigrants arrived in Kansas under the auspices of the society, consisting of one hundred and sixty-nine souls, men, women, and children, and that thirty-seven of them voted at that election. I deplore, as much as any man can do, the spirit in which this Emigrant Aid Society was gotten up. I believe that it tended strongly to promote and foment discord not only in Kansas, but throughout the country.

The Territorial Legislature having passed acts of the character and tendency I have stated, from that time forth, it is fair to both sides to state that the mass, at least much the largest portion of the Free-Soil party, or Abolitionists, as gentlemen, according to their tastes, choose to call them—and no doubt many of them were Abolitionists—avowed their determination never to submit to the authority of the territorial government, nor to yield obedience to its laws. That spirit of resistance and rebellion against the territorial authorities continued to exist to October last.

I trust that I have, so far, given the history of Kansas affairs truly and fairly. I agree with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] that, as a question of duty and public morals, the free-State men ought to have submitted to the authority of the territorial government, and to have waited, like good citizens, with patience, a remedy for their grievances, which time could not fail to bring, or, at least, so long as any hope remained that relief would come in a reasonable time; for, as the Senator from Virginia says, and says truly, whether a government be founded in fraud or usurpation, or not, there is a necessity for some government; no society can endure in a state of anarchy; civil war and bloodshed are worse evils than the endurance of an unjust government for a short period.

To resume my narrative. The second election for members of the Legislature and Delegate to Congress came on in October, 1856. The Territorial Legislature having passed an act in 1855 for taking the sense of the people upon the call of a convention to form a State constitution, at the election in October, 1856, a vote was taken accordingly on that subject. The number of votes polled at that election was about twenty-five hundred, the free-State party not voting. All the votes cast, I believe, were in favor of the call of a convention, and none but pro-slavery men were elected to the Legislature.

I have omitted to state in the regular order of time that the Free-Soil leaders called a meeting of the people in 1855, at which delegates were chosen to meet in convention at Topeka, in September, of that year, to form a State constitution. The convention met, formed a constitution, and application was made to Congress for the admission of Kansas into the Union, as a State, under it. The House of Representatives, in 1856, passed a bill to admit Kansas into the Union under that constitution, but it was rejected in the Senate. What the motive was to this proceeding on the part of the Free-Soil party may well be supposed to have been, as it is alleged it was, to be relieved from the unjust legislation of the territorial government.

The Topeka constitution has been stigmatized as a revolutionary movement. If a government had been set up under it, it would have been so, undoubtedly. But, though there have been two elections of a Governor and members of the Legislature under that constitution, yet no government has been put in operation under it; though I have no doubt that some of the more desperate leaders of the party which formed this constitution were prepared to take that step, and would have done so if they had not been overruled by the more moderate portion of their followers. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] took no notice of the formation of the Topeka constitution, except to ridicule it as General Jim Lane's production.

I am not sure that he was warranted in treating it with so much disrespect, when the President put forth the doctrines to be found in his special message upon the subject of the right of the people at all times to change their form of government; unless you deny to the people of a Territory a right which you concede to those of a State in that respect, which would be contrary to the principle of popular sovereignty so strongly maintained by the authors of the organic law of Kansas.

The Legislature elected in October, 1856, met in January, 1857, and, in conformity with the vote of twenty-five hundred of the people in the preceding October, they passed an act providing for the election of delegates on the 15th of June to a convention to meet in the following September. Governor Walker made his appearance in the Territory in May. He published an address to the people of the Territory, which was declared to be in conformity with the views of the President and his Cabinet. In that address he assured the people of his determination to use every means in his control to prevent all disorder and violence at the election to be held on the 15th of June, and earnestly advised the free-State party to go to the polls and vote for delegates to the convention, warning them that, although he would use all his influence to have the constitution, when framed, submitted to a vote of all the bona fide inhabitants, and had no doubt that it would be so submitted, yet he had no authority to dictate that course. By the act of the Legislature providing for the election of delegates to the convention, the most obnoxious of the test oaths prescribed by her first Legislature was repealed, and a census was directed to be taken, and a register made of the qualified voters in each county, which was to be the basis of the apportionment by the Governor of delegates among the several election districts into which the Territory was divided, and also the test of a right to vote in the election. One objection to going to the polls, as stated by the free-State party, was, that of the thirty-eight counties of the Territory, including Arapahoe, in which there was no population, there had been no register made of the qualified voters in nineteen of them, as the law required, and that no census had been taken in fifteen of those nineteen, and that, as a matter of course, the people in those counties could not vote. Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton confirmed this statement, and the fact is indisputable. I do not see what could be a greater or more fatal irregularity in getting up a convention to form a State constitution. Sir, one half the counties of a Territory left unrepresented—allowed no voice in the convention! Is that no objection to a constitution formed by a convention so constituted? The Senator from Georgia passed this irregularity over as a matter of slight or no consequence. It had, he said, been satisfactorily answered and accounted for. Where is the explanation or justification to be found of this gross irregularity? Upon what evidence does it rest? I have seen or heard of none which does not appear to me a mere pretense—an evasion. To say that some free-State men in some one, two, or three of those counties refused to be registered, and threatened the officers with personal violence if they persisted in the discharge of their duties, was a sufficient reason for taking no census and making no register at all in nineteen counties, appears to me to be preposterous. When gentlemen talk of there being no irregularity in forming the convention I must believe that they have not examined into the facts connected with the subject. It is alleged that the population in the nineteen neglected counties was small. In many of them that no doubt was so. But still, after deducting the nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one legal voters returned on the register made out in the other nineteen, judging from the number of votes polled in October, 1857, and again in January following, there cannot have been less than three thousand legal voters in the neglected counties. Thus it appears that the sixty delegates to the convention were elected by the nineteen counties in which registers were duly made out; while not a single delegate was voted for or elected in the other nineteen counties of the Territory. Governor Walker, in one of his letters to Secretary Cass, states that in some of the neglected counties the people made out a register on their own authority, and elected delegates to the convention; but they were not allowed seats on the ground that their election was irregular. And the further significant fact is stated by him that in the election of October, 1857, more votes were cast in three of the neglected counties than were given to the twenty-eight delegates who formed the Lecompton constitution.

But I am departing from the order of my narrative. The election of the 15th of June for delegates to the convention was held. The free-State party did not participate in it, assigning, as reason for their refusal to do so, besides the one I have just mentioned, that they had no confidence in the officers who were to hold the election, and the opinion given by Governor Walker, that any constitution which might be framed would be submitted, for ratification or rejection, to a vote of all the people in the fall, whether they voted at this election or not. At this election, when it may be presumed the pro-slavery party put forth their whole strength, only twenty-two hundred votes were polled—less by three hundred than the vote polled in October, 1856; but the loss may be fairly accounted for by the exclusion of the pro-slavery voters in the nineteen counties in which there was no register.

The convention met on the 5th of September, but adjourned to a day in October, as it was understood, to await the result of the territorial election fixed for the first Monday in that month. Governor Walker had given the strongest assurances of his purpose to use all the means in his control to preserve order and prevent violence at that election. Conventions were called, nominating candidates on both sides. On the one side, they were called National Democratic candidates; on the other side, free-State candidates, or, if you please, Abolition candidates; it is no matter by what name they were called. By that time two thousand regular troops had arrived in the Territory, sent at the earnest request of Governor Walker, who stated that this was the only mode of preserving peace and preventing bloodshed. He stationed them at different and the most exposed points, on election day, to prevent inroads from Missouri, or any other disturbance at the polls. The result was, that the free-State party proper cast some seven thousand six hundred votes, and the national Democratic party, composed of pro-slavery men and such of the free-State Democrats as united with them in the election, polled some three thousand seven hundred votes. It is material to state that Ransom, the candidate for Delegate to Congress nominated by the national Democratic party, was Free-Soil in his principles. Altogether, there were upwards of eleven thousand votes cast in that election, after rejecting some twenty-eight hundred votes found to have been fraudulently returned; sixteen hundred from the famous Oxford precinct, and twelve hundred from McGee county, in which no poll was opened. These are all strong facts, but the Senator from Georgia can see nothing in them. That Senator asks for the evidence by which these alleged frauds were proved. He said that Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton were not entitled to any greater credit than common witnesses, and by courtesy alone did he concede them that. He said they traveled over the country, looked about, and came to the conclusion that so great a number of voters could not be there. This was the sort of evidence upon which his friend from Kentucky held his immense fabric of fraud and unfairness. Sir, not only did Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton examine the matter, but others of undoubted integrity have confirmed the existence of the frauds alleged. A census has been taken, and forty-nine is returned as the number of residents in the Oxford precinct.

Mr. WILSON. There are forty-three voters in the precinct of Oxford, according to the actual census returns.

Mr. BELL. There could not be many in that county, because the Shawnee Indians own nearly all the land. How many are there in the whole county?

Mr. WILSON. Three or four hundred voters in the whole county.

Mr. BELL. I have examined the proof, but I cannot retain all the facts in my memory. The Oxford returns were rejected by Governor Walker on the ground of irregularity in the returns. Singular as it may seem, he appears to have considered it necessary, to justify his interposition, to find out some irregularity in the certificate or return, although he was convinced from the first that the return was fraudulent. Well might the eloquent Senator from Kentucky exclaim that fraud seems to have become native to the region of Kansas, and to claim the privilege of being a sort of established institution there.

The result of the October election was, that nearly every member elected to the Territorial Legislature was a free-State man.

The convention reassembled in October, according to adjournment, and formed the constitution which is now before us. When the fact transpired that the convention had not submitted the whole constitution to a vote of the people, and that the question of slavery alone was to be submitted, and that in a form and under the restriction of a test-oath which would prevent the free-State party from voting, such a commotion immediately arose as threatened to lead to bloodshed and civil war. In this condition of affairs, acting Governor Stanton, as a means of averting such a calamity, called an extra session of the Territorial Legislature. That body, when assembled, passed a law for taking the sense of the people upon the constitution recently formed, on the 4th of January last—the day fixed by the constitution for an election of State officers and members of the Legislature under that constitution. The 21st of December last was appointed by the convention to take a vote of the people upon the slavery clause of the constitution in this form—"the constitution with slavery," "the constitution without slavery." There were six thousand seven hundred and ninety-three votes returned as cast on that day—six thousand two hundred and twenty-six for the constitution with slavery, and five hundred and sixty-seven for the constitution without slavery. The remarks of the honorable Senator from Kentucky in regard to that election were justified by the circumstances of the case. Votes enough were returned in favor of the constitution to overcome any majority that had ever before been given in the Territory. There had been eleven thousand and odd votes given in the October election, and it was arranged to show a vote to exceed one half that number. It is well established by a commission appointed to investigate the subject under authority of the Legislature, that two thousand seven hundred, or nearly one half the six thousand and odd votes returned as having been cast on the 21st of December in favor of the constitution were fraudulent; and about an equal number returned as polled for State officers and members of the Legislature on the 4th of January last. In the vote taken by authority of the Territorial Legislature, on the 4th of January, on the Lecompton constitution, there were ten thousand majority against it. The Senator from Georgia says that on the same day there were over ten thousand votes cast for State officers and members of the Legislature under the constitution; and that to sustain the fairness of the votes against the constitution the joint vote should have been twenty thousand. I must conclude that on that point the honorable Senator from Georgia made his statements altogether in the dark, and at random, in regard to the true facts and circumstances attending the votes taken on the 4th of January. He asks the reason why these ten thousand claimed as a majority vote against the constitution did not vote in the election for State officers and members of the Legislature. The explanation must be obvious to all those who pretend to know anything about recent events in Kansas. A convention was called by the free-State party to decide whether they should vote or not in the election for State officers and members of the Legislature, on the 4th of January. It was contended that if they voted it would be taken as a ratification of the constitution, just as the President now construes the vote actually given in that election by a portion of that party. This view being taken by a majority, the convention came to a resolution not to vote; but after the regular convention adjourned the minority got together, and, after considering the question fully among themselves, decided that it was best to make an effort to carry these elections; and those who chose—more than half their party—voted under the recommendation of the minority of the convention.

I believe that no attempt has been made, from any respectable source, to cast a doubt on the genuineness of the vote cast against the constitution on the 4th of January last. The result of that vote shows, incontestably, that there must be a majority of at least four or five to one, of the people of Kansas, against this constitution.

I have now narrated the most important facts in the history of Kansas affairs, which have any material bearing upon the question before the Senate, and upon which we may rely in deciding whether this constitution should be accepted or rejected. These, however, are not the only material facts connected with the case—I mean facts calculated to show whether it is expedient, just, or politic to admit Kansas with this constitution. Assuming it as a point that cannot be contested, that a large majority is opposed to the constitution, what are the further facts connected with this subject material to be noticed? Governor Walker declares to you that a large majority of the people of Kansas are determined to resist the organization of a State government under this constitution. Mr. Stanton expresses the same opinion. The people themselves tell you the same thing through their Territorial Legislature. Resolutions have been adopted by that Legislature pledging their fortunes and their lives in resisting this constitution. But there are some facts that speak louder than words. The President has now under him two thousand troops in Kansas; and he expresses the hope that when this measure shall pass, he may be able to withdraw them. Why has he not withdrawn them before? He tells us why. It is not considered safe to do so. When and how long after the adoption of this measure, before he will consider it safe to withdraw the troops from Kansas? Of course, after the people of Kansas shall, voluntarily or by force, have yielded to the authority of this constitution. It may take twice two thousand troops to force this constitution on a people of whom such a large and determined majority are opposed to it; and who have shown, by their obstinate persistence in opposition to the territorial government up to a late day, that they are of a character and cast of men that we may justly apprehend will continue their resistance. They say that no State government shall be organized under this constitution if it be accepted by Congress. I know it is calculated that the friends of law and order, and the natural tendency to reaction after all great excitement, will induce submission. The result may still be civil war; but I trust they will submit.

But, sir, I am not yet done with the evidences in my possession to show the true state of affairs in Kansas. More than fifteen months ago the leading pro-slavery men in that Territory abandoned the idea of making it a slave State; and I desire to go a little into detail on that point, because I know that, if this measure be rejected, it will be said in some quarters of the South, nay, the idea is already artfully propagated, that a slave State can be established permanently in Kansas if the measure now before the Senate should be adopted. The Senator from Georgia said to-day that his friend from Kentucky only had the evidence of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton as to the frauds alleged to have been practiced in Kansas; and who are they? Those gentlemen, he said, did nothing from the time they went to Kansas until they were taken out of it, except to violate the Constitution of the United States, the organic law of Kansas, and to break down the Administration that had sent them there. Those statements confirm me in the impression that the Senator from Georgia has made his entire speech with but very little knowledge of the state of things in Kansas. Will he recognize the name and authority of Dr. Stringfellow, who, for the first two years of the existence of Kansas under the territorial government, was the very soul of the pro-slavery party—the Speaker of their House of Representatives during the first two Legislatures. What is his opinion? I have no direct authority to speak for him, but am told that he has published a letter, which is to be found in one of the public journals, stating that since July last he has abandoned all hope of making Kansas a slave State, and considers it idle to make any further effort to effect that object. Will the Senator from Georgia recognize the name and credit the statements of such men as Dr. Tebbs, a leading and influential upholder of the pro-slavery party in Kansas, while there was any hope of success?—of A. W. Jones, who traversed the South to obtain recruits to sustain the pro-slavery cause in Kansas? If the Senator ignores the authority of these names, will he respect that of General Whitfield, so well known as the former Delegate from Kansas in the other House? Will he please to point out a single pro-slavery leader in Kansas, unless it be John Calhoun, the surveyor general of the Territory, who now maintains that Kansas can be made a slave State? Will they point out a single pro-slavery leader, who has been in that Territory from the first, who did not concur with Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton in their views and in their policy in relation to Kansas affairs? Of the twenty pro-slavery journals in Kansas, all but one approved the policy of Governor Walker. They agreed that it was idle to attempt to make Kansas a slave State at any time since January, 1857, the time Governor Geary left the Territory. If the Senate will bear with me, I will read a few passages from a slip that has been placed in my possession, taken from the press of the Washington Union. I am informed, on authority that I can rely, if any question is made about it, that the publication of the letters which are copied in this slip was suppressed by a member of the Cabinet, and I do not know but by the President himself. These are the prefatory remarks of the editor of the Washington Union:

"The following letter, addressed to a gentleman in this city, has been handed to us for publication. We cheerfully give place to the letter for the purpose of removing any erroneous impression which may still linger in the minds of some of our southern friends in regard to the present feelings, sentiments, and position of the pro-slavery men of Kansas. Mr. Tebbs, the writer, is widely known and universally respected. He is a Virginian by birth, a slaveholder, and is one of the early settlers of Kansas. He has been a member of every Legislature since Kansas became a Territory; and it is scarcely necessary for us to add, that in each instance representing a very decided pro-slavery constituency. His radical views on the slavery question have rendered him peculiarly obnoxious to the Black Republicans of the Territory."

Then comes the letter of Mr. Tebbs, from which I take this extract:

"Now, sir, how can it be that Governor Walker has done so much, as is charged, to abolitionize Kansas? If Kansas is abolitionized it has been done by the pro-slavery party, and not by Governor Walker, for they had adopted this policy long before he had entered the Territory. But every one did man will see at a glance, and must admit, that neither Walker nor the pro-slavery party have done it; but the simple fact that more anti-slavery men than pro-slavery men have gone to Kansas, whether from interest, natural or unnatural causes, it matters not, they are there. But I will not anticipate events or hazard predictions. Let the great principle of popular sovereignty be fairly and honestly carried out. That is all I ask."

Let me also read an extract from a letter of General Whitfield to the editor of the Union, dated Washington city, September 2, 1858:

"I have seen the letter addressed by Dr. Tebbs to a gentleman in this city. His letter fully and fairly represents the condition of parties in Kansas, both before and after the advent of Governor Walker. And I have been perfectly astonished, upon my arrival here, to find the crusade from the South upon Governor Walker, charging him with an attempt to 'abolitionize Kansas.' It required no action from Governor Walker to make Kansas a free State. Its doom, if it is fixed, was fixed long before Robert J. Walker ever entered the Territory.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Bell.

SENATE.

"I repeat again, sir, that, knowing Dr. Tebbis well, and knowing him to be thoroughly posted upon Kansas affairs, I indorse fully his views and conclusions as expressed in his letter to you."

Dr. Tebbis makes this further statement in the letter from which I have just read:

"That in January, 1857, four or five months before Governor Walker arrived in the Territory, the pro-slavery party held a convention of all the members of the Legislature and of delegates from every county in the Territory to discuss the condition of parties, and leading pro-slavery men deliberately declared it as their opinion that the pro-slavery party proper was in a hopeless minority."

The convention to which I have just alluded concluded that it was no longer worth while to attempt to form a slave State in Kansas. When a convention was held, in July last, to nominate candidates for the October election, over which Judge Elmore, one of the largest slaveholders in the Territory, presided, the same opinions were announced. Not only that, but, from the date of January, 1857, the position was taken by the leading pro-slavery men that the constitution to be formed by the delegates to be elected on the 5th of June should be submitted to the people; and if not, that it ought to be rejected by Congress. General Whitfield himself said, in a speech made last summer, that it ought not to get ten votes in Congress, if it were not so submitted.

I have adduced the testimony furnished by the letters and verbal statements of the early and most influential pro-slavery leaders in Kansas, to show that the views I have presented of the actual state of things in that Territory do not rest exclusively upon the information furnished, or the opinions expressed, by Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton. I was, myself, under the impression last spring and summer, that Governor Walker, as well as the President and his Cabinet, was looking more to party and political objects than the support of any particular interests the South could have in the management of Kansas affairs; and it is due to that gentleman, whose course has been so harshly denounced in this debate, that he should be vindicated and sustained by a reference to the course and policy of leading pro-slavery partisans, upon whom no shadow of suspicion rests, as to their perfect fidelity to the slavery cause in Kansas. It appears now, incontestably, that long before Governor Walker arrived in Kansas, and even before the advent to power of the present Administration, the idea of making Kansas a slave State had been abandoned by those leaders who had the deepest interest in the question, being slaveholders themselves. The utmost they had any hope to accomplish, by the conciliatory policy adopted in the convention held on the second Monday in January, 1857, and again in the convention held in July following, so far as the interest of slavery was concerned, was to protect the right of property in the slaves then in the Territory. Governor Walker, in his letter to Secretary Cass, dated 15th July last, states that "It was universally admitted here (Kansas) that the only question is this: whether Kansas shall be a conservative, constitutional, Democratic, and ultimately free-State, or whether it shall be a Republican and Abolition State?"

After it became known in Kansas that the Administration had changed its policy, and particularly after the increased exasperation of the free-State party, which ensued upon the promulgation of the Lecompton constitution, I learn from a well informed and reliable source, that a large proportion of the slaves have been sent out of the Territory; and that of the two or three hundred there a year ago, not more than one hundred remain—some say not exceeding fifty.

It is a most striking and remarkable feature in the present status of this question in Kansas, that it is not the slaveholders who are most active and forward in keeping up this controversy against all hope of making Kansas a slave State, but political adventurers, chiefly office-holders or office-seekers, who have not the slightest interest in the questions beyond the expectation of some personal benefits. Henderson, who is implicated in the perpetration of election frauds, is, I am informed, a special mail agent; Calhoun is surveyor general of the Territory, and McLain his chief clerk. Others I might name, who are only seekers of office. I fear Lmay have done General Whitfield, who is an office-holder, an injury by quoting him as authority in support of the policy of Governor Walker. The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] in his opening speech, announced that he had seen a telegraphic dispatch, stating that he had been notified by the free-State party to leave the Territory. I hope that is not true; and as there has been no confirmation of the statement, I conclude that there was no foundation for it. The danger to which I may have exposed him lies in another quarter. I hope he has had the prudence to abstain from taking any part in this question since he was informed of the President's present views, which would expose him to executive vengeance.

My friend from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] said, in his able speech the other day, that it would be difficult to persuade the people of the South that if this constitution be rejected by Congress, it will not be upon the ground that it recognizes slavery. That is also the opinion of the honorable Senator from Georgia, and others. Unless it be that these honorable Senators want some immediate pretext for a movement in the South, I advise them to investigate this question more fully than they seem to have done, before they conclude to make the rejection of this measure, should it be rejected, a casus disjunctionis. We are told that it will be difficult to persuade the people of the South that any other objection exists to this constitution except that it recognizes slavery, and these opinions are avowed in the face of accumulated frauds and irregularities connected with its history, and though it is clear that four fifths of the people of Kansas are opposed to it.

It will not do for these gentlemen to say that there is no record, or other satisfactory proof, to show the frauds and irregularities alleged against the Lecompton constitution, or of many other statements made by the opponents of this measure in relation to the state of things existing in Kansas. The supporters of this measure in the Senate and in the House of Representatives have obstinately persisted in voting down every proposition to investigate and take proof upon the contested questions of fact; and I take it for granted that this course would not have been persisted in, unless it was understood that the facts would turn out to be as they have been charged.

If I have not wholly misconceived and misstated the material points in the history of Kansas affairs which preceded the formation of the Lecompton constitution; if I have not misrepresented the facts connected with its formation; if I am not wholly mistaken in the views I have presented of the existing state of public sentiment in Kansas in relation to this constitution, is it becoming the character of the national Legislature to accept this instrument as the organic law of the new State which is proposed to be admitted into the Union?

Is it fit, is it becoming the Senate of the United States, to stamp this constitution, with all its attendant circumstances, with their approval, and send it to Kansas to be abided by or resisted to blood by the people there? Surely, sir, there ought to be some great and overruling political necessity existing in the condition of affairs to justify such a proceeding. The President, I understand, from his special message, to say that such a necessity does exist. He insists that in no other way can this dangerous slavery agitation be terminated, and peace be restored to the whole country. He insists that, if Kansas shall be admitted into the Union under this constitution, this sectional controversy will, at all events, be excluded from the Halls of Congress; that the agitation upon this subject will be localized, and confined to the people whom it concerns. This is no new conception; such an experiment has been made before. The country has already had the benefit of a great lesson upon this subject, if it will only profit by it. If I may venture to trespass on the patience of the Senate, I propose to sketch the history of that experiment and its results. I think it will be found rich and abounding in suggestions as to the probable consequences of the renewed experiment proposed to be made, in localizing slavery agitation in Kansas.

Four years ago, when it was proposed to repeal the Missouri compromise—to adopt the principle of non-intervention, and to concede to the people of the Territories the right to settle the question of slavery in their own way—it was said by the advocates of the measure that as soon as the principle of it came to be understood all agitation and discussion upon the subject of slavery in the Territories would be localized—excluded from Congress—and the country would be left in undisturbed repose. So boldly and confidently were these views maintained that the whole southern delegation in Congress—Whigs and Democrats, with seven or eight exceptions, together with many Democrats from the free States—came into the support of the measure. How were these bold predictions verified? In less than one month of the time during which the Kansas-Nebraska bill was pending in Congress, nearly the whole North was in a flame of resentment and opposition. Old men, of high character and great influence, who had for twenty years opposed the policy and designs of the abolition faction in the North, suddenly became its allies and coadjutors. Thousands of the best citizens at the North, who had exerted all their energies to repress all opposition to the execution of the fugitive slave law of 1850, became suddenly converts to free-soilism. The religious feelings of whole communities became frenzied. The pulpit was converted into an engine of anti-slavery propaganda, and hundreds of thousands of sober-minded and conservative people at the North, who had never countenanced sectional strife on the subject of slavery, evinced that they had thrown off their conservatism, and were ready to array themselves under the banner of any party leader or faction to check the progress of the South in what they considered its aggressive policy.

After that demonstration of opposition at the North, but little more was said in debate of the tranquilizing character of the measure. But its most influential supporters from the South, becoming inflamed and irritated by the fierce invectives with which the measure was assailed, both within and out of Congress, became, in their turn, reckless (apparently at least) of all consequences, and seemed only bent on victory—on obtaining a triumph by passing the bill! It was in vain that they were admonished that they were adding largely to the abolition faction at the North; that they were increasing the free-soil element of political power in that section. They admitted no distinction between Abolitionists and Free-Soilers, and denounced all at the North, who opposed the bill, as Abolitionists and foes to the South. Some gentlemen declared that the screams of the Abolitionists were music to their ears. It was idle to warn men, in such a tempest of passion, that, instead of sowing the seeds of peace, as they had promised, they were sowing dragons' teeth, that would spring up armed men. So intense did the feeling become on the subject, that some southern members of Congress, who had gone into the support of the bill on the idea that the Missouri restriction act was a violation of the treaty with France, and who would not have listened for a moment to the admission of aliens to the right of suffrage in the Territories, lost sight of these views under the influence of the furor that was gotten up among the friends as well as the opponents of the measure; and they became even more determined champions of the bill when these grounds of their original adhesion were entirely swept away—one by the rejection of the Clayton amendment, and the other by the Badger proviso—than they were at the outset. There were, however, a few of the supporters of the bill who to the last contended that the intemperate demonstrations of opposition at the North were but the ebullitions of temporary excitement, which would subside as soon as the equitable and just principles of the bill should be exhibited in their practical operation in Kansas. On what flimsy grounds that delusion was indulged, and how soon and under what circumstances it vanished, I need not recount. The recollection of every patriot must still be painfully impressed with them. It is enough to say, that soon after these principles were put in operation in Kansas, disorder, anarchy, and civil war, ensued in rapid succession. It required the strong arm of the Government of the United States, and the interposition of the military force, to sustain the territorial government; and even now, after the lapse of four years, we still find that the presence of a military force is necessary to maintain peace. So much for the effect of that measure on Kansas and the country. How has it been in Congress? Need I ask that question? Has not the subject of slavery in the Territory been the absorbing subject of our thoughts and discussions at every session of Congress since the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act? And as for the character and temper of the debates upon this subject, have they not, in asperity and fierceness, far exceeded those of any antecedent period of our history?

Seeing that the principles of non-intervention and popular sovereignty established by the Kansas-Nebraska act had not been successful in repressing slavery agitation and sectional controversy, the friends of that measure appear, in the last resort, to have invoked the Supreme Court to interpose its ermine to stay the fratricidal strife; and that august tribunal, the last stay and hope of the Constitution to preserve the balance of justice even amid the storms of dangerous and powerful factions, has plunged into the vortex of political and sectional controversy. But that high tribunal, with all the advantages of the respect, veneration, and confidence which it has justly enjoyed for sixty years, has not been able to stem the tide of sectional controversy, which still rolls onward and threatens to sweep us on to a fatal catastrophe.

The President tells us in his special message that every patriot had hoped the Kansas-Nebraska act would have put a final end to the slavery agitation which for twenty years "convulsed the country and endangered the Union." That statement is not quite fair. If he had gone back thirty-seven years he would have included the Missouri compromise. Every patriot hoped that that measure was a final settlement of all difficulties in regard to the Territories then belonging to the United States. If the President had adverted to that other period, 1849 and 1850, when there was another slavery agitation that convulsed the country and endangered the Union, he might have said with perfect truth, that every patriot had hoped that the compromise measures, then adopted, would put a quietus upon slavery agitation. The great men of both parties, the distinguished statesmen of the country at the period of 1820 and 1850, realized by their wisdom and patriotism the expectations of the great founders of our system, who anticipated difficulties on this subject. So important was the promised exemption from future slavery agitation held out by the compromise measures of 1851 felt to be by the people, so highly appreciated and hailed with such joy, that in 1852, when the two great parties of the country met in convention to make their platforms and nominate their candidates for the presidency, both felt compelled, by public sentiment, to solemnly pledge themselves to abide by, or acquiesce in, the compromises of 1850, and never again to countenance agitation on the subject of slavery in any form whatever. Each of the nominees of the two parties, General Pierce and General Scott, in his letter accepting his nomination, pledged himself that, if he should be called to the Presidency, he would faithfully conform to the policy to which his party had pledged itself upon this subject. So deeply was the interest diffused throughout the country in favor of maintaining the compromises of 1850, that, though there was not a breath of suspicion against General Scott's fidelity and sincerity in maintaining the cause of peace, yet, because it was supposed that he had some prominent friends who had not that object so much at heart, that slight ground of distrust had the effect to turn the election in favor of the more trusted candidate of the Democratic party, General Pierce—more trusted for the devotion of his friends to the maintenance of the compromise of 1850—by the overwhelming number of two hundred and fifty-two electoral votes to forty-two, given to General Scott; while the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] who allowed his name to be run on the Free-Soil ticket, received in the whole Union a popular vote of only one hundred and fifty-seven thousand, and not a single electoral vote. That, however, is not the strongest evidence of the feeling that was manifested in regard to the compromise measures of 1850. In the elections which came off in the fall of 1852, and in the succeeding spring, one hundred and fifty-nine Democratic members were elected to the House of Representatives, giving the Democratic party a majority of eighty-four in that House.

Mr. HALE. And I lost my election to the Senate the same year.

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir; and others, then members of the Senate, as well as yourself, might never have been returned to the Senate again but for the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act.

When Congress met in December, 1853, the Democratic party had the large majority in the House of Representatives before stated; and among the minority there were only three or four members who desired to further agitate the question of slavery, while in the Senate there were only five Free-Soilers, all told; so effectually had the Free-Soil movement in the North been put down by the compromises of 1850.

The Senator from Georgia said to-day that the compromise of 1820 had never given satisfaction or quiet anywhere, South or North. Let me tell him that at the last session of the Thirty-Second Congress—the very one that preceded the introduction of the Kansas-Nebraska bill—a similar one, saving the clause repealing the Missouri compromise, and establishing the principle of non-intervention, passed the House of Representatives, with scarcely an allusion to the slavery restriction act of 1820. There were only forty-three votes against the bill in the House, and some of them from the North. On that occasion there was not a word said of the propriety or justice of repealing the Missouri compromise. On the last night of that session I contributed, with the distinguished Senator from Texas, [Mr. Houshoun,] to defeat the passage of that bill in the Senate. The objections urged against it were, that there was no white population in the Territory; that the measure would be a violation of numerous Indian treaties; and at last the bill failed, more from the want of time than from any other cause; not a single southern Senator, besides myself and the Senator from Texas, interposed a word against the bill. So much as to the correctness of the statement of the Senator from Georgia, in relation to the effect of the Missouri compromise. That bill was laid on the table on the last night of the session—the 3d of March, 1853. General Pierce, on the next day, in his inaugural address congratulated the country on the restoration of peace and harmony, and, true to his former pledge, he solemnly promised that he would do nothing during his administration to disturb the condition of things then so happily existing in the country. In the first message, on the meeting of Congress in December following, he renewed this pledge; but in less than two short months from the date of that message, the whole political heavens, then beaming brightly and sending joy and gladness to the hearts of the people of the whole country, the scene as it were, in a twinkling, and as by the agency of some diabolical magic, was changed. The political skies were suddenly overcast by dark and portentous clouds, out of which a storm arose, which, in the language of the President, "has convulsed the Union and shaken it to its very center."

I now ask the attention of the Senate to the effect of the experiment of localizing slavery agitation in the Territories made in 1854, in changing the complexion of parties both in Congress and in the country. In the Congress which passed the Kansas-Nebraska bill we have seen that there was, at the commencement of the session in December, 1853, a Democratic majority of eighty-four in the House of Representatives, and only four Free-Soilers; and in the Senate a like number—so small, yet so distinct in their principles, that neither of the two great parties then known to the country knew well how to arrange them on committees.

Mr. HALE. You left them off.

Mr. BELL. The Whigs were afraid to touch them. Mr. Chase was a Democrat, and was so recognized by his brethren in the Senate, and was taken care of by them in arranging the committees; yet he was one of the gentlemen whom I have designated as Free-Soilers. Now, let us see what was the effect of the Kansas-Nebraska act on the elections which ensued in the fall of 1854, just on the heels of the adoption of that measure. One hundred and seven Free-Soilers were returned to the House of Representatives; and the Democratic party, instead of having a majority of eighty-four in that House, found itself in a minority of seventy-six; and in the Senate the number of Free-Soilers was increased to thirteen. Such was the complexion of the two Houses of Congress in the Thirty-Third Congress, which assembled in December, 1855. Now we find in the Senate twenty Free-Soilers. How many more they may have in the next Congress will depend upon the disposition we make of the question now before the Senate. I call upon the Senator from Georgia to say whether he will have that number limited or not. Does he want a sufficient number to prevent the ratification of any future treaty of acquisition? How long will it be before we have that number if the southern Democracy persist in their present course? They would seem to be deeply interested in adding to the power of the Republican party. I consider that the most fearful and portentous of all the results of the Kansas-Nebraska act was to create, to build up a great sectional party. My friend from Ohio, who sits near me, [Mr. WADE,] must allow me to say that I regard his party as a sectional one.

Mr. WADE. Is not the other side a sectional party?

Mr. BELL. So far as they are confined to the South they are, but they say that they lap over.

Mr. WADE. Lap over further South still. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELL. I consider that no more ominous and threatening cloud can darken the political horizon at any time. How formidable this party has already become may be well illustrated by the fact that its representative candidate, Mr. Fremont, was only beaten in the last presidential election by the most desperate efforts; and I feel warranted in saying, that but for the imminent prospect of his success which shone out near the close of the canvass, Mr. Buchanan would not have attained his present high position.

Such have been the trophies of the victory—the triumph achieved in the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act in 1854. It is with all this sad experience of the effects of that experiment in localizing the slavery agitation in the Territories, that we are now called upon to renew it. To be sure, we are told the circumstances are not the same. They are not identical, I admit. For instance, we are told that if there is any wrong done by accepting the Lecompton constitution, the people of Kansas can easily redress it. They have, it is said, an inalienable right to change their constitution when and how they please, and that they are not fettered by any restrictions contained in this constitution. I was sorry to hear the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] whom I regard as one of the old-fashioned supporters of sound principles—to whatever inconvenience they sometimes lead—say, in his late speech, that he was inclined to think the provision in the Lecompton constitution which prescribes that after the year 1864 it may be amended in the way therein pointed out, does not prevent any alteration or change of it which the people may think proper to make before that time; nay, I may say that I was astonished to hear such a declaration coming from that Senator, when we all know that the only purpose of that provision in the constitution was to prevent any amendment before 1864. This is the very restriction relied upon to give color to the change already made and propagated in some of the slaveholding States, that those members of Congress from the South who may by their votes defeat this measure, will have prevented the establishment of a slave State in Kansas.

But the President takes the bolder ground that the restriction in the Lecompton constitution, though intended to prevent any amendment before 1864, is altogether unavailable. He asserts the doctrine that the people of a State can change their constitution at any time; and this he says is a fundamental principle of American freedom. He refers to the second clause of the bill of rights in the Lecompton constitution, to show that the people of Kansas have recognized this fundamental principle. In that clause it is declared that "all political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their benefit, and therefore they have, at all times, an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish, their form of government in such manner as they think proper." This language is identical with that employed in the bill of rights to be found in the constitutions of Connecticut, New Jersey, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, and probably in those of many other States, for I have not had time to examine them all. What is meant by this declaration to be found in the bill of rights of most or all of our State constitutions? Nothing more is meant than to assert the right of revolution—the antagonistic doctrine to that of passive obedience, at one period so strongly maintained in England.

It will be difficult to maintain, by any sound process of reasoning, that this recognition of the right of the people to change their form of government has any reference to a change of their constitutions; for, in all of them, their right to do that is not only recognized, but the mode in which it can be done is distinctly prescribed. The principle asserted in a bill of rights, in any State constitution, is, that the people, when their rights of person and of property are trodden down; when their dearest interests are disregarded and sacrificed by an unjust, arbitrary and oppressive government, they have a right to change or abolish it by a resort to the sword, if found necessary. They have a right, under the circumstances I have described, to establish a pure democracy, and dispense with the use of all organic laws or constitutions, if they choose. They may even establish a monarchy, if they believe that their rights and interests would be best protected and promoted under such a form of government; but the right to do all this is clearly a revolutionary one. There is no danger in the recognition of this right; but there is danger in the admission of the doctrine avowed by the President, that a majority of the people of a State may set aside all the guards in their constitution against sudden and capricious changes of its provisions, and change it as often and when they please. Such a doctrine reduces all organic laws to a level with acts of the Legislature. If such a doctrine shall come to be generally admitted and practiced upon, it cannot fail, in the end, to lead to oppression and anarchy, and make a resort to revolution and a change of the form of government the only means of safety.

I had supposed that the chief merit of the great American invention of written constitutions and organic laws was in the protection they afforded to the rights of the minority against the tyranny of an arbitrary and capricious majority. The doctrine of the President strikes down at a blow the whole system of defenses and guarantees intended for the security of minorities. Majorities can always protect themselves.

But it is said that the great States of New York and Maryland have practiced upon the doctrine of the President in changing their constitutions. If that be true, I maintain that they acted upon a revolutionary principle; and the sooner that is understood the better for the country and its institutions. A general acquiescence among the people in an irregular mode of changing their constitutions may result in no immediate danger; it is in the precedent that the danger lies.

The honorable Senator from Georgia announced some great truths to-day. He said that mankind made a long step, a great stride, when they declared that minorities should not rule; and that a still higher and nobler advance had been made when it was decided that majorities could only rule through regular and legal forms. He asserted this general doctrine with reference to the construction he proposed to give to the Lecompton constitution; and to say that the people of Kansas, unless they spoke through regular forms, cannot speak at all. He will allow me to say, however, that the forms through which a majority speaks must be provided and established by competent authority, and his doctrine can have no application to the Lecompton constitution, unless he can first show that the Legislature of Kansas was vested with legal authority to provide for the formation of a State constitution; for, until that can be shown, there could be no regular and legal forms through which the majority could speak. But how does that Senator reconcile his doctrine with that avowed by the President, as to the futility of attempting, by constitutional provisions, to fetter the power of the people in changing their constitution at pleasure? In no States of the Union so much as in some of the slaveholding States would such a doctrine as that be so apt to be abused by incendiary demagogues, disappointed and desperate politicians, in stirring up the people to assemble voluntarily in convention—disregarding all the restrictions in their constitution—and strike at the property of the slaveholder.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky inquired what, under this new doctrine, would prevent the majority of the people of the States of the Union from changing the present Federal Constitution, and abrogating all existing guarantees for the protection of the small States, and any peculiar or particular interest confined to a minority of the States of the Union. The analogy, I admit, is not complete between the Federal Constitution and a constitution of a State; but the promulgation of the general principle, that a majority of the people are fettered by no constitutional restrictions in the exercise of their right to change their form of government, is dangerous. That is quite enough for the purposes of demagogues and incendiary agitators. When I read the special message of the President, I said to some friends that the message, taking it altogether, was replete with more dangerous heresies than any paper I had ever seen emanating, not from a President of the United States, but from any political club in the country, and calculated to do more injury. I consider it in effect, and in its tendencies, as organizing anarchy.

We are told that if we shall admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution this whole difficulty will soon be settled by the people of Kansas. How? By disregarding the mode and forms prescribed by the constitution for amending it? No. I am not sure that the President, after all the lofty generalities announced in his message in regard to the inalienable rights of the people, intended to sanction the idea that all the provisions of the Lecompton constitution in respect to the mode and form of amending it should be set aside. He says the Legislature now elected may at its first meeting call a convention to amend the constitution; and in another passage of his message he says that this inalienable power of the majority must be exercised in a lawful manner. This is perplexing. Can there be any lawful enactment of the Legislature in relation to the call of a convention, unless it be in conformity with the provisions of the constitution? They require that two thirds of the members of the Legislature shall concur in passing an act to take the sense of the people upon the call of a convention, and that the vote shall be taken at the next regular election, which cannot be held until two years afterwards. How can this difficulty be got over? The truth is, that unless all constitutional impediments in respect to forms be set aside, and the people take it in hand to amend the constitution on revolutionary principles, there can be no end of agitation on this subject in less than three years. I long since ventured the prediction that there would be no settlement of the difficulties in Kansas until the next presidential election. To continue the agitation is too important to the interests of both the great parties of the country to dispense with it as long as any pretext can be found for prolonging it. In the closing debate on the Kansas-Nebraska bill I told its supporters that they could do nothing more certain to disturb the composure of the two Senators who sat on the opposite side of the Chamber, the one from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] and the other from Ohio, [Mr. CHASE,] than to reject that bill. Its passage was the only thing in the range of possible events by which their political fortunes could be resuscitated, so completely had the Free-Soil movement at the North been paralyzed by the compromise measures of 1850. I say now to the advocates of this measure, if they want to strengthen the Republican party, and give the reins of Government into their hands, pass this bill. If they desire to weaken the power of that party, and arrest the progress of slavery agitation, reject it. And if it is their policy to put an end to the agitation connected with Kansas affairs at the earliest day practicable, as they say it is, then let them remit this constitution back to the people of Kansas for their ratification or rejection. In that way the whole difficulty will be settled before the adjournment of the present session of Congress, without the violation of any sound principle, or the sacrifice of the rights of either section of the Union.

But the President informs us that threatening and ominous clouds impend over the country; and he fears that if Kansas is not admitted under the Lecompton constitution, slavery agitation will be revived in a more dangerous form than it has ever yet assumed. There may be grounds for that opinion, for aught I know; but it seems to me that if any of the States of the South have taken any position on this question which endangers the peace of the country, they could not have been informed of the true condition of affairs in Kansas, and of the strong objections which may be urged on principle against the acceptance by Congress of the Lecompton constitution. And I have such confidence in the intelligence of the people of the whole South, that when the history and character of this instrument shall be known, even those who would be glad to find some plausible pretext for dissolving the Union will see that its rejection by Congress would not furnish them with such a one as they could make available for their purposes.

When the Kansas-Nebraska bill was under discussion in 1854, in looking to all the consequences which might follow the adoption of that measure, I could not overlook the fact that a sentiment of hostility to the Union was widely diffused in certain States of the South; and that that sentiment was only prevented from assuming an organized form of resistance to the authority of the Federal Government, at least in one of the States in 1851, by the earnest remonstrance of a sister State that was supposed to sympathize with her in the project of establishing a southern Republic. Nor could I fail to remember that the project—I speak of the convention held in South Carolina, in pursuance of an act of the Legislature—was then postponed, not dropped. The argument was successfully urged that an enterprise of such magnitude ought not to be entered upon without the coöperation of a greater number of States than they could then certainly count upon. It was urged that all the cotton-planting States would, before a great while, be prepared to unite in the movement, and that they, by the force of circumstances, would bring in all the slaveholding States. The ground was openly taken, that separation was an inevitable necessity. It was only a question of time. It was said that no new aggression was necessary on the part of the North to justify such a step. It was said that the operation of this Government from its foundation had been adverse to southern interests; and that the admission of California as a free State, and the attempt to exclude the citizens of the South, with their property, from all the territory acquired from Mexico, was a sufficient justification for disunion. It was not a mere menace to deter the North from further aggressions. These circumstances made a deep impression on my mind at the time, and from a period long anterior to that I had known that it was a maxim with the most skillful tacticians among those who desire separation, that the slaveholding States must be united—consolidated into one party. That object once effected, disunion, it was supposed, would follow without difficulty.

I had my fears that the Kansas-Nebraska bill was expected to consolidate the South, and to pave the way for the accomplishment of ulterior plans by some of the most active supporters of that measure from the South; and these fears I indicated in the closing debate on that subject. Some of the supporters of that measure, I fear, are reluctant now to abandon the chances of finding some pretext for agitating the subject of separation in the South in the existing complications of the Kansas embroilment.

To what extent the idea of disunion is entertained in some of the southern States, and what importance is attached to the policy of uniting the whole South in one party as a preliminary step, may be inferred from a speech delivered before the southern convention lately held in Knoxville, Tennessee, by Mr. De Bow, the president of the convention, and the editor of a popular southern Review. I will only refer now to the fate to which the author resigns those who dare to break the ranks of that solid phalanx in which he thinks the South should be combined—that is, to be "held up to public scorn and public punishment as traitors and Tories, more steeped in guilt than those of the Revolution itself."

I have but a few words more to say on this subject. I have been pained at many things which I have heard in the progress of this debate. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] and the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] opened new and wider and more alluring fields for discussion—alluring, not by their tendency to train the public mind to contemplate the destruction of the Union with complacency, but as suggesting subjects of debate which offer an unlimited range for intellectual display—rich themes for the gildings of fancy. I shall not venture beyond the borders of these new fields of discussion. I could not but be struck and fascinated by the grand outlines and the gorgeous yet beautiful filling up of the picture of southern power and resources presented by the able and eloquent Senator from South Carolina; but the fascination was all gone when my eye was at leisure to rest for an instant on the dark background which the rich pencilings of a master artist were intended to light up. Still these changing emotions did not prevent me from feeling some surprise that the eloquent Senator, whom I know to be both just and generous, could find in his heart to close his speech without some slight expression of gratitude—offering some small tribute to the worth of that glorious old Federal Union, which, after all its plunderings by tariffs, navigation laws, internal improvements, and national banks, had still left the South in the possession of such multiplied riches and blessings.

I wish I could, with propriety, pass without notice some passages in the speech of the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD], towards whom personally I have no unkind feeling. It was with pain and regret that I listened to the utterance of sentiments by that Senator affording material of the most effective nature for agitation at the South; and calculated to excite the feelings of those who still cling to the hope that the Union may be perpetual. That honorable Senator spoke with deliberation; and what he said cannot be considered to have escaped his lips in the heat and excitement of debate. Several weeks ago, he vauntingly proclaimed to the Senate that the battle of freedom was already won. But that was not enough. When he was last on the floor, assuming an oracular mien and air, he read to us, "as from the book of fate, the decrees which he seemed to think it concerned the South to know."

Some of us had flattered ourselves that when the Kansas question should be settled, peace and quiet would reign in Congress and throughout the country. The honorable Senator from New York announced to us that this was a gross delusion; that the admission of Kansas as a free State would not terminate the slavery agitation in Congress or anywhere else; that neither Congress nor the country is to have any respite from its evils, and that there never will be quiet on the slavery question until the South shall have abandoned all further efforts to extend slavery under the Federal Constitution. He even undertakes to advise the South on this point. He could counsel nothing less. No conquering general in a cooler manner, or with an air of greater authority, ever dictated to vanquished foes the terms on which they could have peace. But he does not encourage us with the hope of peace and quiet, even if the South should yield to his counsel, and seek no further extension of slavery. Agitation, he informs us, is to go on until the Supreme Court of the United States is reorganized, or shall recede from some of the doctrines, so abhorrent to him, it has lately promulgated. I shall not enter into any discussion of these doctrines. I will say, however, that if the opinions announced by that court are founded on sound principles, and formed within the pale of judicial authority under the Constitution, they will stand, and ought to stand; if otherwise, like hundreds of decisions in the judicial history of this country and Great Britain, they will yield to further and closer investigation without any disorganizing interposition of the legislative power. If, as many gentlemen here say, they were extra-judicial opinions, obiter dicta, voluntary announcements of sentiments and opinions, they can do no injury in any quarter; because, whenever the same questions shall again arise, they will be open to argument and readjudication. Whatever may be the decision of that court on the power of Congress to interfere with the question of slavery in the Territories, and however clear and well-founded in principle and authority its decision may be, I have supposed that inasmuch as it is a question of constitutional construction or interpretation, and relates to the jurisdiction and power of a separate department of the Government—a department always more or less under the influence of political considerations—the question would not be regarded as permanently settled; and that whenever in future, as heretofore, Congress shall be called upon to legislate concerning a Territory, the question will again become a subject of discussion and such decision as the majority shall think proper to declare. Congress was never swayed by the opinion of the Supreme Court on the question of its power to establish a national bank; nor will it be controlled by any of its opinions on questions involving political considerations. If I am right in these views, and when it is clear that no injury can be done to either the North or the South by the opinions recently pronounced by the Supreme Court upon this question, why should it be made a pretext for continuing this dangerous slavery agitation?

As to the opinion of the court on the question of the recognition of property in slaves by the Constitution, I will say but a word or two. I will not enter into any argument of it; but I will refer the honorable Senator from New York, and others who agree with him, to an authority which I think they will not disavow, and for which all who have any admiration for great ability, associated with all those personal qualities that give weight and character to a statesman, will respect. I allude to Rufus King, of the organic period of our history. I allude to him not only as authority on a point of constitutional law, but as a model of senatorial propriety in the discussion of questions affecting the personal sensibilities and interests of brother Senators. He is known to have been, if not the mover, the ablest champion of the slavery restrictive policy. He was also a member of the convention that framed the Constitution. In his speech at the commencement of the controversy upon this subject, in 1817, in reviewing the history of the concession made by the convention which framed the Constitution, to the slaveholding States, of a representation founded upon three fifths of their slaves, added to their free population, he contended that it was unequal and unjust to the free States, on the ground that it was a representation founded on property, and so understood when the concession was made; and if the principle was right, it ought to have extended to property in the free States as well as in the slave States.

That eminent man, while he showed himself a determined opponent of the extension of slavery, never sought to weaken or undermine any of the securities which existed for the protection of slave property, by the announcement of any doctrine or sentiment not in strict conformity with the obligations and requirements of the positive institutions of the Government in the councils of which he participated. He always spoke within and under the Constitution. He may have held slavery in as great abhorrence as the Senator from New York professes to do. He may have considered that, as a question of Christian ethics, man cannot be the subject of property; but, if such was his opinion, the greater the honor that will attach to his memory, as a man and as a statesman, for his forbearance to set up his private opinions as of higher authority than the Constitution and Government in the service of which he was engaged.

The honorable Senator from New York further announced to us, in exultant tones, that "at last there was a North side of this Chamber, a North side of the Chamber of the House of Representatives, and a North side of the Union, as well as a South side of all these;" and he admonished us that the time was at hand when freedom would assert its due influence in the regulation of the domestic and foreign policy of the country.

When was there a time in the history of the Government that there was no North side of this Chamber and of the other? When was there a time that there was not a proud array of northern men in both Chambers, distinguished by their genius and ability, devoted to the interests of the North, and successful in maintaining them?

Though it may be true that southern men have filled the executive chair for much the largest portion of the time that has elapsed since the organization of the Government, yet when, in what instance was it, that a southerner has been elevated to that high station without the support of a majority of the freemen of the North?

Do you of the North complain that the policy of the Government, under the long-continued influence of southern Presidents, has been injurious or fatal to your interests? Has it paralyzed your industry? Has it crippled your resources? Has it impaired your energies? Has it checked your progress in any one department of human effort? Let your powerful mercantile marine, your ships whitening every sea—the fruit of wise commercial regulations and navigation laws; let your flourishing agriculture, your astonishing progress in manufacturing skill, your great canals, your thousands of miles of railroads, your vast trade, internal and external, your proud cities, and your accumulated millions of moneyed capital, ready to be invested in profitable enterprises in any part of the world, answer that question. Do you complain of a narrow and jealous policy under southern rule, in extending and opening new fields of enterprise to your hardy sons in the great West, along the line of the great chain of American lakes, even to the head waters of the father of rivers, and over the rich and fertile plains stretching southward from the lake shores? Let the teeming populations—let the hundreds of millions of annual products that have succeeded to the but recent dreary and unproductive haunts of the red man—answer that question. That very preponderance of free States which the Senator from New York contemplates with such satisfaction, and which has moved him exultingly to exclaim that there is at last a North side of this Chamber, has been hastened by the liberal policy of southern Presidents and southern statesmen; and has it become the ambition of that Senator to unite and combine all this great, rich, and powerful North in the policy of crippling the resources and repressing the power of the South? Is this to be the one idea which is to mold the policy of the Government, when that gentleman and his friends shall control it? If it be, then I appeal to the better feelings and the better judgment of his followers to arrest him in his mad career. Sir, let us have some brief interval of repose at least from this eternal agitation of the slavery question. Let power go into whatever hands it may, let us save the Union!

I have all the confidence other gentlemen can have in the extent to which this Union is entrenched in the hearts of the great mass of the people of the North and South; but when I reflect upon and consider the desperate and dangerous extremes to which ambitious party leaders are often prepared to go, without meaning to do the country any mischief, in the struggle for the imperial power, the crown of the American Presidency, I sometimes tremble for its fate.

Two great parties are now dividing the Union on this question. It is evident to every man of sense, who examines it, that practically, in respect to slavery, the result will be the same both to North and South; Kansas will be a free State, no matter what may be the decision on this question. But how that decision may affect the fortunes of those parties, is not certain; and there is the chief difficulty. But the greatest question of all is, how will that decision affect the country as a whole?

Two adverse yet concurrent and mighty forces are driving the vessel of State towards the rocks upon which she must split, unless she receives timely aid—a paradox, yet expressive of a momentous and perhaps a fatal truth.

There is no hope of rescue unless the sober-minded men, both of the North and South, shall, by some sufficient influence, be brought to adopt

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Foster.

SENATE.

the wise maxims and sage counsels of the great founders of our Government.

Mr. President, I will not longer trespass upon the indulgence of the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. It is my wish to be heard by the Senate before the vote is taken, but I cannot ask them to sit here and hear me at this late hour of the night.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 19, 1858.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, the objections I have heretofore urged against this high measure were confined exclusively to what seemed to me to be the obnoxious features apparent on the face of the proposed constitution. At the same time, I recognized other objections, strong and conclusive to my own mind, against this measure; and I intimated a purpose, on another occasion, should opportunity offer, to ask the indulgence of the Senate to present my views more at large, and on other points connected with this most important subject. To do this, and as briefly as possible, is my present design.

The real question at issue here can certainly be brought within very narrow limits. Such, however, has not been the course of the discussion; that has taken the widest range. Slavery and its incidents have of course attracted a large share of attention; the question of union and disunion has not been neglected; aggressions of the North on the South, and the South on the North, have been adverted to; and the power and resources of the different sections of our country have been exhibited, not altogether to place them in friendly competition, but rather in hostile array.

Mr. President, I regret all this. It would be unbecoming in me to lecture any Senator here on the proprieties of debate. I assume no such ungracious office. Others have judged these topics proper and necessary in this discussion; possibly they are. If the necessity exists, I must be permitted to say that I regret that necessity.

Of slavery, sir, I propose now to say nothing; of union and disunion, and our mutual aggressions, nothing; of the resources, productions, and strength of the different sections of our country, very little. I glory in our country—in its united strength as one country. It is a magnificent, a majestic country; it is my own native country. I glory in each and every of its sections, as parts of one great whole. In any section, when put in array against any other section, I glory not.

A lesson of wisdom is taught us by the cunning hand of the artificer who wrought out the marble mantels back of the chair you occupy, Mr. President, in this Chamber. My attention was first called to them by the late Senator from Delaware, Mr. Clayton, whose death made a great breach in this body and in the councils of this country. In words too impressive to be forgotten, and but a short time before his death, he asked me to notice the fact that the bundle of rods chiseled on the one defied the efforts of the mightiest giant to break them, because bound together; on the other, taken separately, they were snapped asunder by a boy's hand.

Our strength is in our union. Which section would be the stronger, and which the weaker, in the event of disunion, I will not undertake to decide. The subject has no attractions for me. Those whose tastes lead them in that direction may make the calculation. Late be the day that proves either their truth or their falsehood.

It is, sir, a mischievous error, a fatal mistake, to suppose that any portion of this Union is not dependent on other parts. We are mutually dependent. Take the great staple of the South—cotton—the “king,” as the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND,] in his speech the other day, so complacently styled it. What Warwick was the “king-maker” of cotton? Who gave “King Cotton” his crown and scepter? The inventive genius, the mighty hand of Eli Whitney, of Connecticut. But for him, the kingdom of cotton would be yet to come. The honorable Senator was very full, and, I presume, very accurate, in his statistics; he will pardon me for suggesting that he omitted one very important item, and that is, how much did the invention of Whitney—Whitney, of Connecticut—add to the value of all the cotton lands in the southern States? I cannot answer the question myself; perhaps the honorable Senator can; and though in his calculations he deals with very large sums of money, I hazard the assertion that this amount, when ascertained, will be the largest of all. I have alluded to this, Mr. President, to illustrate my position that we are mutually dependent, even where we may, perhaps, feel that we are most independent.

I expressed a determination to say but little as to the relative resources and strength of the different sections of our country. I intend to carry out that determination. As the honorable Senator from South Carolina seemed to place the claims of the South mainly on a single production—cotton—I could not but recall to mind the fact that it is but a few years that cotton has been grown in any considerable quantity in this country. It is no longer ago than about 1790, that a few bales of cotton on board an American vessel at Liverpool were seized by the revenue officers, because articles not the growth of our country could not be imported by American vessels; and this, though claimed to be the product of the United States, was not believed to be so. So great are the changes in sixty years. Within that period in the future, may not this staple be cultivated to a great extent in portions of the globe now producing little or none? The reign of kings is proverbially brief in our times—that of “King Cotton” may not be an exception. And if it should, he may erect his throne and hold his court far nearer the gates of the Orient than the plains of Carolina. We are a republican people—not fond of kings, crowns, thrones, and scepters.

It is not for any lack of confidence in the power or resources of my own immediate section that I refrain from pursuing this portion of the subject. It is not, in my judgment, germane to the matter in hand; and I therefore dismiss it with the single remark, that the South is no doubt strong—strong in what it has pleased the God of nature to do for that section in soil and productions. The North is no doubt strong—strong in what it has pleased the God of nature to enable its people to do for themselves.

To bring this discussion within its just limits, to decide the question involved on its real merits, we have but to determine these simple points: Is the constitution of government proposed for the new State the work of the people to be affected by it? Is that constitution of such a character as to harmonize with the principles on which our Government rests? If both these questions can be answered affirmatively, the State should be admitted; if either is answered negatively, it should not be admitted.

In discussing these, indeed in discussing any questions connected with this subject-matter, I am aware that I am entering a field which has been gleaned by abler hands than mine. Nothing new, perhaps, is left to be said that can be said appropriately to the subject. I may say, however, that it is assented to on all sides of the Chamber, that this constitution ought to be the embodiment of the people's will before we can admit this State under this constitution. All, I say, assent to that proposition; but, while they do so, they, almost in the same breath, fritter it away by the manner in which they tell us the will of the people may be ascertained. There are certain forms, more or less technical, or solemn, or imposing, which we are to take as proofs. The constitution here before us is surrounded by certain forms, which, in the opinion of some gentlemen, conclude us from going behind them to ascertain what the will of the people really is.

Does not this, Mr. President, instead of making it our duty to ascertain the real will of the people, simply make it our duty to see whether certain forms have been complied with? Is that our whole duty in the premises? Forms may be simulated. They are, as I believe, in this case. We are always in danger of being imposed upon by forms. I have hoped I never should hear, in the Senate of the United States, on a question whether a State should be added to the Confederacy, that any form, no matter how solemn or how imposing, should intervene between us and the will of the people whom we are called to organize into a new State. There is danger, great danger, if we allow any partition to be built up between us and the will of the people in such a case as this. No wall should be considered so high or so thick that we were not at liberty to look over it and through it; not only at liberty so to do, but, faithfully to discharge our constitutional duties, I believe we are bound so to do. It is not enough that we have certain evidences before us of the will of the people. We are to be satisfied that those evidences prove the truth. We are not to be satisfied with any form of evidence short of the actual truth. Gentlemen, however, insist that a constitution coming, as it is claimed this does, from a convention, that convention having been called by the Territorial Legislature, that Legislature having been organized under the organic act creating the Territory, comes to us under such sanctions as that, the work of ascertaining the people's will is already done by these forms.

Now, Mr. President, it becomes necessary in this state of things, to see what these forms really mean, and how much real authority attaches to them, at least, in this particular case. This convention held at Lecompton which made this constitution, was called, I believe, by the second Territorial Legislature, so styled of the Territory of Kansas. All of course, so far as validity and constitutional authority goes, depends upon the character of the first Territorial Legislature. What evidences have we before us in regard to the character of that assemblage? Was it what it purports to have been—the Territorial Legislature of the people of Kansas, organized under the act styled the Kansas-Nebraska bill? On that subject I am aware there is a contrariety of opinion. To my mind, however, the evidence is full and satisfactory that that Legislature was in no proper sense the Territorial Legislature of Kansas.

It appears from an examination made under the authority of the House of Representatives that in November, 1854, there was an election in Kansas for a congressional Delegate. The pro-slavery party, as it was called, at that election polled twenty-two hundred and fifty-eight votes, and of those there were illegal seventeen hundred and twenty-nine, leaving of legal votes at that election polled by that party five hundred and twenty-nine only. The people of the Territory, generally, took but little interest in that election; not more than half of the people of the Territory authorized to vote voted at all. In February and March, 1855, a census was taken, and that census showed of voters in the Territory twenty-nine hundred and five. On the 30th of March, 1855, when the election for the Territorial Legislature was had, just after the census was taken, as I have stated, which was completed in March, 1855, showing twenty-nine hundred and five voters only—the returns show that the pro-slavery party polled fifty-four hundred and twenty-seven votes, of which it is shown were illegal forty-nine hundred and eight, leaving only of these fifty-four hundred and twenty-seven votes polled by their party the number of five hundred and nineteen legal votes. If these facts are true, can anybody say that that was a Legislature entitled to any regard or respect as the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas? The same authority to which I have just adverted, the authority of the House of Representatives, speaks on this subject in this manner, through their committee. They say:

“First. That each election in the Territory, held under the organic or alleged territorial law, has been carried by organized invasion from the State of Missouri, by which the people of the Territory have been prevented from exercising the rights secured to them by the organic law.

“Second. That the alleged Territorial Legislature was an illegally constituted body, and had no power to pass valid laws, and their enactments are, therefore, null and void.

“Third. That these alleged laws have not, as a general thing, been used to protect persons and property, and to punish wrong, but for unlawful purposes.”

Such, sir, as I claim, was the character of that so-called Territorial Legislature. I am aware that this is denied; but it is denied, as it seems to me, in the face of evidence which ought to satisfy any candid, unprejudiced mind. This by no means is the only evidence. I allude to it as being evidence, as it seems to me, entitled to respect in this body; coming, as it does, from a coördinate branch of this national Legislature. It is not, as it seems to me, enough to say that this is simply the offspring of party spirit, and is not in fact true. That may be said of any fact proved ever so clearly, ever so solemnly. It may be denied; but, unless there is evidence of its falsity, unless there is something far stronger than a simple denial, I ask whether unprejudiced minds can fail to come to the conclusion that this Legislature was really a usurpation; that those who came into that Territory, conquered the Territory as directly through the ballot-box as any people were ever conquered through the cartridge-box? A subjugation of a people through the ballot-box is far more complete and perfect than it ever can be through the cartridge-box. Where a people are conquered through the ballot-box, the forms of law over them are continued, and the subjugation appears under a more mitigated form than when the arm of a conqueror is openly and palpably stretched out over them; but the actual subjugation, I repeat, is more complete.

Not only is this denied, however, as a matter of fact, but it is also said that, even if the fact be true, it is now too late, and that this is not the tribunal to examine those facts. We are concluded, it is said, by the action of this Legislature itself. The question of their election, or the election of any members of that body, we are told, must have been decided by the Legislature itself, and at all events that body is now to be considered as having been a lawful Legislature. If I am right in the claim I make, that the Legislature was a direct usurpation, the idea of submitting the question of usurpation or not to the usurpers themselves, is little less than a mockery. The present Emperor of France, I believe, claims his throne under an election by the people of that country. Some of the inhabitants have questioned whether that election was entirely fair and legal; but did it ever occur to any of the inventive geniuses of France to submit the question of the legality of the election to his Imperial Majesty, and did it ever occur to anybody that, until it was submitted to him and decided by him, the people were absolutely prevented from questioning the legality? What is the difference between one usurper and a multitude of usurpers in point of principle? Why should we submit the question of usurpation to the many and not to the one? I think it would be far better, and I should greatly prefer, under the circumstances, to submit it to the one; for where there is only one, there is a sense, even in abandoned men, to some extent, of individual responsibility; where there is a body of men together they will do acts which each alone would scorn to do by himself. There is no sense of personal responsibility in the one case, and there is some in the other.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to show that this Legislature was elected under such circumstances as that it was a perfectly unauthorized body, an illegal body, a body having no authority to enact laws for any people on the face of the earth; and to answer, so far as I have answered, the objection that this tribunal cannot pass upon that question. My argument, however, permits me to waive the objection, and to admit that this so-called Legislature was a legal tribunal, and clothed with all the authority with which a Legislature could be clothed under the organic act; and yet I arrive at the same result upon principles and authorities which seem to me perfectly incontrovertible, in regard to the validity and force with which this constitution comes before us; for I hold it to be established as a perfectly settled principle, in our Government, that a Territorial Legislature cannot call a convention which shall have any authority whatever to institute proceedings to create a State government. It is (and this certainly would strike every mind on reflection) an inadmissible principle that the territorial government is authorized, in and of itself, to institute a government to overthrow itself. I am not going to argue that question at any length. I allude to authorities on this subject which seem to me cannot be controverted. They have been alluded to before. I allude to the authority of Attorney General Butler, during General Jackson's administration, in regard to the then Territory, now State, of Arkansas. The same question arose at that time that arises now, in regard to the power of a Territorial Legislature to institute proceedings creating a State government. The Attorney General, supposed, I take it, to speak the language of the Cabinet and the Administration, says on this subject:

"To suppose that the legislative powers granted to the General Assembly include the authority to abrogate, alter, or modify the territorial government established by the act of Congress, and of which the Assembly is a constituent part, would be manifestly absurd. The act of Congress, so far as it is consistent with the Constitution of the United States, and with the treaty by which the territory, as a part of Louisiana, was ceded to the United States, is the supreme law of the Territory; it is paramount to the power of the Territorial Legislature, and can only be revoked or altered by the authority from which it emanated. The General Assembly and the people of the Territory are as much bound by its provisions, and as incapable of abrogating them, as the Legislatures and people of the American States are bound by and incapable of abrogating the Constitution of the United States. It is also a maxim of universal law, that when a particular thing is prohibited by law, all means, attempts, or contrivances to affect such thing are also prohibited. Consequently, it is not in the power of the General Assembly of Arkansas to pass any law for the purpose of electing members to form a constitution and State government, nor to do any other act, directly or indirectly, to create such new government. Every such law, even though it were approved by the Governor of the Territory, would be null and void. If passed by them, notwithstanding his veto, by a vote of two thirds of each branch, it would still be equally void."

Well, Mr. President, surely that covers the whole ground, unless there be something in the organic act—the Kansas-Nebraska act—variant from the act which incorporated the Territory of Arkansas, of which I may say a word presently. To my mind, there is, in this regard, no difference. The cases stand on the same ground, and are to be governed by the same rule. If so, even if this Territorial Legislature had called this convention in the most solemn and technical manner, and the people had elected their delegates to the convention freely and lawfully, without obstruction, and all who were qualified had voted, who chose to vote, and no others, still, a constitution so made by such a convention, would possess no authority. It would be simply a petition or a memorial to Congress for admission into the Union, clothed with no higher sanction than an instrument made by any other equally large number of the citizens of the Territory.

We have, moreover, the high authority of the gentleman who is now the President of the United States. When the admission of Michigan into the Union was under discussion here, Mr. Buchanan, who was then a prominent member of this body, on this same question, expressed these opinions:

"We ought not to apply the rigid rules of abstract political science too rigorously to such cases. It has been our practice heretofore to treat our infant Territories with parental care, to nurse them with kindness, and when they had attained the age of manhood, to admit them into the family without requiring from them a rigid adherence to forms. The great questions to be decided are: Do they contain a sufficient population? Have they adopted a republican constitution? And are they willing to enter the Union upon the terms which we propose? If so, all the preliminary proceedings have been considered but mere forms, which we have waived in repeated instances. They are but the scaffolding of the building, which is of no further use after the edifice is complete. We have pursued this course in regard to Tennessee, to Arkansas, and even to Michigan. No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislatures had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

And yet, sir, notwithstanding those plain, direct, and unequivocal averments, it is now insisted, and pertinaciously insisted, that because a Legislature has called a convention and that convention has formed a constitution, we are bound to take that constitution as embodying the will of the people, and cannot go behind these forms. As I said, I believe the first Territorial Legislature was a usurpation, and we all know that usurpation begets usurpation, and only usurpation; and the little finger of the offspring is frequently thicker than the loins of the parent. What began in usurpation strengthened in usurpation; and this constitution, vauntingly spoken of as it may be here, as embodying the will of the people of Kansas, has its origin in usurpation, and nothing but usurpation.

It has, however, been intimated, and more than intimated, that in the organic act—the Kansas-Nebraska bill—power was given to the people of Kansas to a more enlarged extent than was given to these Territories to which I have been calling attention. Efforts have been made to show that the Kansas and Nebraska act was an enabling act, so called. This question has been answered most triumphantly, as it seems to me, on both sides of this Chamber. I do not propose to add anything—I could not, however earnestly I might attempt it—to add to the force of that answer. I will say this, however, Mr. President, that if this claim was correct, if the Kansas-Nebraska bill contained directly authority to the people through their Legislature to call a convention and form a constitution, and bring that constitution here in order that the new State might be admitted into the Union, I submit, with great confidence, that it would be the duty of this Senate still to ask the question, is this constitution acceptable to the people who are to be affected by it? Nothing short of an honest answer in the affirmative to that question could justify us, even then, in taking another State into this Union, no matter what was the character of her constitution.

I repeat what I have said before, that no form should be substituted for the substance; for it is perfectly within the bounds not only of possibility, but of probability, that a convention, called ever so legally, formally, and solemnly, elected ever so fairly, consisting of men ever so capable and respectable, may after all fail in drafting an instrument which the people who are to live under it are willing to recognize as their constitution; and although the people may either inadvertently or deliberately—I care not which—bestow on a convention the authority to make for them a constitution without submitting it to them, or part, so to speak, with the sovereignty which was in them, and transfer it to a convention—although under such circumstances, so far as the people themselves are concerned, if nothing more were in the case, it might be the constitution of the people, still, if, as in this case, a constitution so formed has to come before another tribunal, and that tribunal are bound by their official duty before they admit the Territory as a State, under that constitution, to be satisfied that that constitution embodies the will of the people, they are not justified without first ascertaining that it is the will of the people, notwithstanding all these forms. We are to go behind the convention even then, because our duty is imperative. We cannot, unless we are prepared to do an act of tyranny, impose a constitution on a people who we know would not accept it if they had an opportunity to accept or to reject it. Granting all that is claimed in regard to this, granting that this Legislature, the original one and the subsequent one, have all been legally elected, and are, to all intents and purposes, what they purport to be; granting that the Kansas-Nebraska bill is an enabling act; that the census, that everything, which, as I believe, is now actually tainted with fraud and corruption, were all sound; granting all that, we cannot, I repeat, unless we are prepared to do an act of tyranny, impose this constitution on the people of Kansas, because we know as well as we know that we are living men, that, if this constitution were submitted to the people of Kansas to-day, a great and overwhelming majority of them would repudiate it, and trample it under their feet.

In this state of things, Mr. President, I care not what forms surround this instrument. I for one am not prepared to do an act which is despotic and tyrannical, and shelter myself behind forms and shadows which must prove unsubstantial. Where is it found that this high tribunal is compelled to submit to these technical, and I must say, to some extent, absurd rules? Where is the work on pleading behind which we can or should shelter ourselves when we are performing one of the highest—the highest possible—of our constitutional functions, the creation of a new State, an empire State, a State which I trust will uphold millions of happy people when we are all gathered to our fathers? Is it in the text books of the English or American law that we find any principle which controls this high tribunal in this most important of its high duties? Shall we look into Chitty, or Gould, or Stephens, and find some technical rule of pleading which prevents us from looking at the truth? I trust not.

Whether, then, we regard the Legislature which called the convention as a legal or illegal body; whether the organic act was an enabling act or not; whether we regard the members of the convention as having been fairly apportioned and legally elected, or otherwise; whether it was the understanding that the constitution, when prepared, should be submitted to the people or not, the same question after all comes back to us: is this constitution the embodiment of the people's will? That it is not, is most conclusively shown from various sources of proof. I need not pause to enumerate them. The vote of the people on the 4th of January last, taken, let it be remembered, under the authority of the Legislature of the Territory, showed a majority against the constitution of ten thousand and sixty-four votes. This surely will convince any one who is not predetermined not to be convinced, that the people of Kansas oppose this constitution.

The other day, under somewhat inauspicious circumstances, I addressed the Senate upon the objections that were apparent to me on the face of this constitution. The honorable Senator from Missouri, who sits furthest from me, [Mr. POLK,] took occasion, in the course of his speech on this subject, to allude to the fact that nobody but the Senator from Connecticut had scrutinized the provisions of this constitution, or claimed that it was not republican. It may be that the honorable Senator thought that so long as the objection was confined to that source, it was unnecessary to answer it. To disabuse the mind of the gentleman, should that have been his impression, I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate, and of the Senator from Missouri, to certain facts connected with the admission of his own State into this Union—facts which I am bound to presume are quite familiar to that honorable Senator, but had he recalled them to mind, he would not, as it strikes me, have disposed of the objections which I took to this constitution in quite so summary a manner, nor passed them by quite so speedily as altogether unfounded.

The Territory of Missouri, Mr. President, memorialized Congress in the month of December, 1819, through their Delegate in the House of Representatives, for authority to make a constitution preparatory to their admission as a State into this Union. The great question in both Houses of Congress was, whether an enabling act, as it is now, and was perhaps then called, should be passed, giving to Missouri such authority, without any restriction in regard to the subject of slavery? The Senate passed an act of that sort, without such a restriction. They added, however, to it, by way of amendment, a section prohibiting domestic slavery north of the line of 36° 30' in all the territory which was acquired by the Louisiana purchase. This amendment was made part of the enabling act in the Senate by a vote of 34 yeas to 10 nays. The bill as thus amended, was engrossed and passed. The vote on the engrossment was 24 yeas to 20 nays, two gentlemen only—Mr. Macon, of North Carolina, and Mr. Smith, of South Carolina—from the southern States voted against the bill. That bill went to the House of Representatives. They had already passed an enabling act, but with a restriction upon the people in regard to the subject of slavery. They therefore struck out the proviso, or rather the amendment of the Senate, prohibiting slavery north of 36° 30', by a vote of 159 yeas to 18 nays. The House, for a time, persisted in the restriction forbidding slavery in the new State, but finally struck it out, by a vote of 90 yeas to 87 nays. They then concurred with the Senate in passing the bill with an amendment prohibiting slavery north of 36° 30', by a vote of 134 yeas to 42 nays. The bill thus became a law, and went into effect on the 6th of March, 1820.

Up to this time, Mr. President, no constitution was before Congress from the State of Missouri, and it was a matter of conjecture entirely what would be the character of the constitution which that State would adopt. It was believed that the people would prefer establishing slavery within the new State; and this act, thus passed, was supposed to give the assent of Congress to the formation of such a constitution. It was the expectation of Congress, and of the country, that when it should come, as it did, come the next session of Congress, with a constitution, although there might be a clause establishing slavery in the new State, it would nevertheless be admitted into the Union.

Congress came together in the month of November, 1820, and Missouri came with her constitution asking admission. There was, however, in her constitution, in addition to the clause in regard to slavery, which was anticipated, and which had been, under these circumstances, consented to, a clause making it the incumbent duty of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, after this constitution should have been adopted and the State organized and have a Legislature, to pass laws prohibiting the immigration of free persons of color into the new State. That feature of the constitution of Missouri was regarded by a large portion of the members of Congress in both Houses as being an infringement of the provision of the Constitution of the United States which declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; and although the contest in regard to the question of domestic slavery in Missouri was over and gone, a contest arose in regard to that feature of the constitution of Missouri, scarcely less exciting than the original controversy on the subject of slavery. The result arrived at in the two Houses was this: In the Senate the constitution was referred to a committee to ascertain and report whether the constitution was conformable to the act, and whether, under those circumstances, the State was entitled to be admitted. The Senate committee reported favorably. The question on the passage of a resolution admitting the State being before the Senate, Mr. Eaton, of Tennessee, moved an amendment to the resolution, which was in fact a caveat, that nothing in the resolution should be construed to imply that Congress meant to give its assent, or in any way admit the validity, of any clause in the constitution of the proposed new State which should infringe at all upon the Constitution of the United States. That resolution, so amended, passed the Senate, and went to the House. In the House it was referred to a select committee of thirteen, at the head of which was Mr. Clay. The committee reported in favor of the passage of the resolution. The House, however, refused to accept the report, and the resolution was lost by a vote of 80 yeas to 83 nays. In this state of things conferences were had between the two Houses, and the result finally was the passage of the resolve which admitted the State of Missouri. I will ask the Secretary to read that resolution.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

"Resolution providing for the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union on a certain condition.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen, of either of the States in this Union, shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof, the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete."

Mr. FOSTER. That resolution was passed by the House by a vote of 87 yeas to 81 nays, and also in the Senate by a vote of 29 yeas to 14 nays. Now, sir, what I want to call the attention of the Senate to in this connection is this: the feature in the constitution of the State of Missouri, it will be noticed, was one simply requiring the Legislature to pass certain laws, excluding persons of a certain class from coming within the jurisdiction of the State, and that provision was deemed so obnoxious, that Missouri could not obtain admission into the Union until her admission was qualified according to the terms of that resolution, making it incumbent upon the people of the State, through their Legislature, to assent to an entire abrogation of that provision. Congress did not assume the right of amending that constitution, or stating how it was to be construed, as I understand gentlemen very gravely propose to do here. They did this: they made the admission of Missouri dependent on the fact that the people of the Territory, through the Legislature, in fact through the convention, should consent to erase the obnoxious feature from their constitution; and Missouri did it. Otherwise, non constat, she never would have been a State of this Union; certainly she would not under that resolution.

Now, Mr. President, when I took exception the other day to the feature of the constitution of Kansas which said, in express terms, no free black shall be permitted to live in this State under any circumstances, the honorable Senator from Missouri disposed of it in the unceremonious manner I have described. I think, in view of these facts regarding his own State, the objection is not got rid of so easily. If Congress, in 1820, would not admit a State until they abrogated a provision saying that the Legislature should pass a law excluding free blacks—if that created so much excitement then, and if the result to which I have called attention was arrived at then, I beg to know whether the fact that this constitution for Kansas contains so obnoxious a feature as this is not an objection entitled to some weight? So thought the Congress of 1820. I repeat again, the feature in the constitution of Missouri was much less obnoxious than this. If Congress, in 1820, required the abrogation which that resolution did require of the State of Missouri, prior to its admission, a fortiori should we require an abrogation of this clause in the constitution of Kansas before that State can be admitted, or that Territory, more properly speaking, can be admitted as a State.

The question then, and now, is wholly independent of the question of slavery. Why, sir, many of the men who, at the session of Congress ending in the spring of 1820, voted for the bill enabling the Territory of Missouri to form a constitution preparatory to her admission as a State in effect tolerating slavery, afterwards uniformly voted against the admission of Missouri under the constitution which she brought, not on account of slavery, but on account of this clause. Mr. Storrs, of New York, a leading member of the House of Representatives, having few superiors in that House or the country, was one of that class. He insisted that free blacks were citizens; that there was no distinction among native free-men, whatever their color, in this country, so far as citizenship was concerned. So thought many other leading and distinguished men, and the contrary was very faintly asserted by anybody. True, it was by some, but it was not resisted on that ground. Members, and distinguished members of the House, insisted upon it that granting that free blacks were citizens, the State ought to be admitted and Congress could not take exception to that clause. The great majority, however, thought otherwise. I will not pursue this subject further, except merely to add that on this question of citizenship, which has latterly become a topic of great interest, I say so faintly as I asserted in any quarter at that time that free blacks were not citizens, that Mr. Hemphill, of Pennsylvania, said that he understood the report, recommending the admission of the State, to admit that free blacks were citizens, although a majority of the committee were, of course, in favor of the admission, and spoke, it may be presumed, the opinions of their party. I am by no means, however, disposed to go over the ground which I went over the other day, and should not have alluded even to this had it not been for the remark of the Senator from Missouri.

I come to the result, then, Mr. President, that the constitution before us is not an embodiment of the people's will; that it contains provisions not in harmony, but directly repugnant to the principles on which our Government rests; and for these reasons this Territory ought not to be admitted as a State. What excuses are urged why it should be admitted? There are many. Among them are, it will give peace, calm the agitation, quiet the troubled sea on which we are now tossed. Mr. President, it is not a statesmanlike reason for doing a legislative act. We should be just and fear not. Besides, I do not believe that the passage of this bill, and the admission of this Territory under this constitution, will give peace—nay, sir, I believe it will give the sword. I do not urge that as a reason why we should not pass it, for I do not propose to address any argument to any gentleman's fears. It is merely in reply to an argument urged on us to vote for it, that it will give peace, and for no other purpose. I disclaim any appeal whatever to the fears of any gentleman. While I disclaim an appeal to the fears of any one, I must also say that any arguments addressed to fears on the other side have very little weight with me. It is said that certain sections of the country will be so dissatisfied that they will secede from the Union if this bill should not pass, and Kansas should not be admitted. All that weighs very little with me. It is no argument. What weight has it? It is lighter than a feather shaken from a linnet's wing.

But we are told, if it is distasteful to the people, they can change it. Is that an argument for imposing a constitution or a law upon a people, that, if unsatisfactory, they can change it? Why, sir, the same remark would hold true of any despotism on the face of the earth. The people under the sway of the Czar of Russia can change their Government if they wish to. So can the people of Turkey; the people of France; the people of any Government, no matter what its principles are. If the people choose to rise up, they can change their Government; but do they? can they, practically? At all events, is it an excuse for those who tyrannize over them, that if the people are not satisfied, they have the power to make a revolution? Are we about to impose a constitution on a people, and say, "we do not know whether you are in favor of this constitution or not; we incline to think you are not; but if you do not like it, we impose it upon your necks, and you have nothing to do but to change it?" That, sir, is an argument from statesmen to statesmen in the Senate of the United States! That the people cannot, except by revolution, change this constitution in any mode differing from the mode specified in it, has been shown.

But then it is proposed, as I understand it, to amend the bill which we pass so as that this constitution shall be made more acceptable, more tolerable, better than it is. I ask where is the power in this body, or in Congress, to change one letter of that constitution, to alter it, to construe it, or to affect it directly or indirectly? We are, it is true, if we pass this measure, assuming a power which would imply that; and we might just as well make a constitution for them, and say, "this is your law, live under it," as to do what, if we pass this bill, we shall do; but after all, does any man, or can any man claim, under our Constitution and laws, that we have one jot or tittle of authority to touch the provisions of that constitution in any manner? I utterly deny any such power to this body. It does not exist. The constitution which comes here we must leave just as it is, and admit or reject the State, leaving the constitution just as it is; or if we make any amendment, or propose any alteration, we can only refer the subject back to the people that they may come in as a State with a constitution satisfactory to us, indeed, but nevertheless made altogether by themselves.

There is another reason assigned for this measure, and that reason is found more fully and explicitly stated in the resolutions of an assemblage of highly respectable gentlemen who met at Tammany Hall, in the city of New York, on the 4th of March, on this subject. At the close of the resolutions by that assemblage of citizens where they give their reasons one after another why Congress, in their judgment, ought to admit Kansas under that constitution, the climax of reasons is this:

"Because James Buchanan, the President of the United States, recommends it. Elevated to a position which enables him most accurately to ascertain the exact truth amid the conflicting statements coming from heated partisans in that distant frontier of the Union," &c.

That, sir, I repeat, is the climax of reasons which I have heard why the Congress of the United States should admit Kansas into the Union as a State under this constitution. It amounts to this: the party require this act to be done; and the President is so situated that he can know the real truth about this matter better than anybody else. In regard to the requirements and the discipline of party, it does not become me, who am an outsider in that particular, so far as the party alluded to is concerned, to say much. I will only say, from my observation of the operations of party on this subject, your party, a short time ago, read gentlemen who were veterans—who had borne the burden and heat of the day under the Democratic banners—out of the party, because they disapproved of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and were honestly opposed to it. It now, as I understand it, proposes to read men of like character out of the party, because they are honestly in favor of the same measure. If, under such circumstances, men can keep afloat on the current of party, I bid them God speed on their voyage.

The other reason, that the President is so situated that he can learn the exact truth and know all about this measure from the distant frontier in consequence of his elevated position, I must say, had it not come from gentlemen who certainly are entitled to respect, I should have thought the most frivolous, I was going to say the most ridiculous, of all statements that I ever heard made. The position of the President of the United States one peculiarly well fitted for learning the truth in regard to a political question! Why, sir, king's palaces are not proverbial for the amount of truth that is uttered in the ears of the king. Indeed, it is probably one of the most repulsive features that surround a man having the kingly office, that from the day of his birth to the day of his death he never hears the honest, simple truth spoken. The President of the United States, it is true, is not a king; but some of the incidents attaching to kings attach to him, and one of those incidents is that he is less likely than almost any other man in the nation to hear the truth spoken. Who are the men that surround him, and what are their purposes and objects? To speak the truth? Does he hear the truth from them? Oh no, sir. They are men having other purposes and other objects than to tell the truth. They have an eye to fat contracts, to gifts, and emoluments. They do not go there to offend the ear of majesty by speaking the truth, unless it should be pleasant to the ear of majesty to hear it. About king's courts, and, I fear, about presidential mansions, there are many who may, without impropriety, be styled toads, who live upon the vapor of the palace. They may have the precious jewel of truth in their heads, but they are specially cautious not to have it on their tongues.

I come, Mr. President, to the result that the excuses urged for the passage of this measure are frivolous, unsatisfactory, untrue. They form no excuse whatever for doing an act which I have before characterized as being despotic and tyrannical. Without occupying the time of the Senate further, I say, then, that my objections to this constitution rest mainly on the fact that it does not embody the will of the people, and is not in harmony with the principles on which our Government rests. For either of these objections I should deem it my duty to stand here in opposition, by my voice and by my vote, to prevent the adoption of the measure. The question of slavery, in one point of view, I pass by altogether. It may be that because slavery is in this constitution the people of Kansas are opposed to it. Of that they are better judges than I. My objection to imposing this constitution upon them is that they are opposed to it. Sir, if it had not one word in it about slavery—on the other hand, if it had a clause abolishing slavery within that Territory forever—if I was as well satisfied that that constitution was as distasteful to the people of that Territory as I am satisfied this is, I would oppose it with the same earnestness that I oppose this. I repeat, I do not know but that it is their objection that slavery is in it. My objection is that they object to it; and I would as strongly resist imposing a constitution on them which made their Territory a free Territory forever, as I would resist the adoption of a constitution imposing slavery upon them, because it would be an act of usurpation in both cases.

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. POLK. I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he would vote for the admission of Kansas under any circumstances, if her constitution tolerated slavery?

Mr. FOSTER. I have said that I should not.

If the gentleman doubts whether he has convinced me, I repeat that I certainly would not.

Mr. POLK. If I had so understood the Senator, I would not have asked the question.

Mr. FOSTER. I stated so the other day, and I repeat it now. I could not, consistently with what I believe to be due to that Territory, vote for the extension of slavery over the line of 36° 30'. I went somewhat at length into that question the other day. I will not repeat now the arguments I then made, but my views are unaltered. I was saying at the present time, that if this constitution was perfectly unexceptionable in regard to the matter of slavery, and if it had a clause in it prohibiting slavery within the Territory forever, still, if I was as well satisfied as I am now that the people of the Territory disapprove this Lecompton constitution, I would not vote to impose it on them. By that I stand, and I stand by the principle also to which the honorable Senator from Missouri has called my attention, namely: the exclusion of slavery from the future States of Kansas and Nebraska.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, at the beginning of the session I did not design or desire to participate in any discussion of the Kansas or slavery issues; for if not identical, they are inseparable. After the protracted debates of those issues, I feel reluctant to weary the Senate or myself with so trite a theme; but having been placed, instead of my colleague, upon the Committee on Territories, during his detention from the Senate by severe illness, it may be expected of me to say something in support of the bill which, as one of the majority, I agreed to report, and recommend to the Senate. Besides, the unanimous action of both Houses of the Legislature of Alabama, in providing for calling a convention of the people of that State to "determine their course of action," in case of the refusal of Congress to admit Kansas into the Union, has been alluded to by Senators in terms of reproach and of ridicule. Identified with Alabama by my birth, education, interest, and affection—regarding her as "my nursing mother and my grave"—indebted to her for the highest honors and greatest trusts she could bestow, and standing here as one of her ambassadors in this Council Chamber of sovereign States, I feel it my duty, as well as privilege, to justify or excuse, as far as I can, all her acts relating to her sister States or to the Federal Government. I shall speak rather in vindication of her Legislature than of my vote, and more of the principles and purposes of the Free-Soil party in Kansas and in Congress, than of their objections or arguments against her admission into the Union.

Mr. President, the people of Kansas ask admission into the Union. Men of all parties and of every political faith have signified in some manner, at some time, their desire to enter the Union. All parties in Congress have indicated at some time, and in some manner, a willingness to admit Kansas into the Union. Disguise it as we may, sir, it is nevertheless true that Kansas would ere this have been admitted into the Union without serious objection or protracted debate, but for the sectional struggle in that Territory and in Congress upon the subject of slavery.

I have heard, with amazement and regret, the assertion, on the part even of southern Senators, that slavery is not implicated in these Kansas issues. Sir, those men must be deaf or blind to the passing events of the hour who can hug to their bosoms that delusion. Parties in a Territory may wrangle and war upon each other never so fearlessly; may dissolve legislative bodies and conventions; may defy Federal authority; may resist territorial laws; may enact rebellion; may do all these, with impunity from Federal legislation, and immunity from Federal or State intervention; provided, they are not divided upon geographical questions, or engaged in a sectional struggle involving sectional rights of property.

Look at Utah, from the settlement of Brigham Young and his followers at Salt Lake, in a state of open, undisguised rebellion against your Government, rejecting Federal officers, refusing obedience to Federal laws, and establishing an insurgent government. Look at Nebraska, dissolving her legislative body, defying her Governor, and enacting anarchy and revolution. Look at Minnesota, dissolving the convention called to frame her constitution, each party segregating to itself, and determining by itself; yet what Senator thinks these matters of momentous concern, or any cause of care and solicitude? What section or what State in the Union has been frenzied, or agitated, or disturbed by these outrages and enormities? None, sir—none. The revolutions of Mexico or of Europe disturb our repose quite as much. The reason is obvious: there is no geographical or sectional issue there; there is no negro implicated. But, sir, the introduction, or the attempted introduction, of his head into a Territory of this Union seems to be regarded by the dominant party of the northern States like the wand bound round with wool, which was carried by the ancient Athenian herald—a declaration of war.

Why was the passage of the Nebraska-Kansas act resisted so strenuously? Because it permitted the introduction of slaves into that Territory. Before that act had passed, an organization of members of Congress was formed with a view of controlling the destiny of that country by emigrant aid societies. The most noisy, active, and efficient agents of that party repeatedly declared that they intended to colonize Kansas with men "who could not do without the aid of that association;" "to be retained in its service;" "to be under its control;" "to be bound by it;" "to be under bonds to make Kansas a free State." To wrest from the South every foothold in that Territory, all the means have been invoked which fanaticism, avarice, ambition, hatred of the South, or lust of dominion over it, could suggest. The western nation in the twelfth century were not more grieved that the Holy Land was in the hands of the Moslem, than this party were, or affected to be, that Kansas, "a soil consecrated to freedom," was opened to the immigration of the slaveholder. Ministers of the Gospel, like Peter the Hermit, traversed the North, inflaming religious zeal, and arousing Christian crusaders to the rescue of that consecrated soil from the sacrilegious tread of the slaveholder. Political leaders aroused the lucrative desires of the North by highly-colored pictures of the exhaustless treasures and the incomparable charms of her virgin soil; or appealed to the lust of dominion, the vengeance of mortified pride, or the indignation of insulted justice against the violations of plighted faith, the aggressions and the outrages of the "slave oligarchy." In the madness of their zeal, or the bitterness of their hate, they declared that if they failed to expel slavery from Kansas by moral means, they would do so by fire and sword. Such a declaration in the northern Republican convention at Philadelphia was greeted with tumultuous applause. Such were the weekly and Sabbath-day counsels of the Beechers and Parkers, who disgraced the northern pulpits and dishonored the cause of the Prince of Peace they professed to advocate. Such were the daily menaces of the leading northern Republican papers. Such were the repeated suggestions in the form of prophetic admonitions to the South, uttered by Senators on the other side of this Chamber.

Sir, the Free-Soil party in Kansas have fully illustrated the principles and purposes of their advisers and advocates in Congress and in the North. In their first meeting to call a convention to frame a constitution, they solemnly resolved that the laws of that Territory were without validity or binding force, and that they would resist and defy them, even to a bloody issue, if they found that peaceable remedies would fail. Governor Reeder, addressing that party, declared "we must conquer, or mingle the bodies of the oppressors with the oppressed upon the soil which the Declaration of Independence no longer protects." The president of the Philadelphia Republican convention of June, 1856, declared "such a rebellion was sanctioned by God and man;" and he but echoed a sentiment we have often heard uttered upon this floor. Hence, in accordance with the edicts of the New York Tribune, whose power over its party is superior to that of any individual, if I may except the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] who is sometimes honored with the sobriquet of "the Wizard of the North," they continued to "pour free settlers into Kansas, well armed with Sharpe's rifles or other convenient weapons." Hence they refused to coalesce or to cooperate with southern men, in elections either to the Legislature or the convention. Hence their secret organizations, their formation of military companies, their preparation for war, and their attempt to establish an insurgent government. These men went to Kansas not so much to build as to destroy a State; not so much to organize as to disorganize; not to promote order, but to produce disorder; not to vindicate acknowledged rights, but to avenge imputed wrongs; not to meet in the peaceful contest of the ballot-box with southern brethren, but to engage in hostile encounters of the cartridge-box with southern enemies. They went, in the language of the same New York Tribune, "not for commerce, but for vengeance." They went to meet southern "enemies," "vandals," "a dishonorable and perfidious privileged class," "heartless, grasping, and tyrannical robbers." Such were the characteristic names applied even by Senators to southrons, or at least to slaveholders. The President truly characterizes this contest in Kansas, when he says:

"The dividing line there is not between two political parties, both acknowledging the lawful existence of the Government, but between those who are loyal to this Government and those who have endeavored to destroy its existence by force and usurpation—between those who sustain and those who have done all in their power to overthrow the territorial government established by Congress."

The President is sustained in that assertion by the declaration of Governors Denver, Stanton, Walker—of all the Governors of that Territory. He is sustained by the confessions—yea, by the bold avowals of that party themselves. He is sustained by the very convention which assembled to frame that Topeka constitution, and by the manner of its presentment here. A convention, called in pursuance of no enabling act of Congress or act of the Territorial Legislature; in accordance neither with Federal or territorial executive authority; in obedience to no expressed will of the people, but called by audacious and violent party leaders, representing, according to their own confessions, as expressed by the Free-Soil papers of that Territory, but seven hundred out of near seven thousand voters—this convention, representing but one tenth of the voters of that Territory, undertook to frame a constitution and State government, and sent that constitution to Congress for admission into the Union. They were so inflated with the spirit of rebellion that they even insulted Congress in their memorial while asking its favor, and renounced Federal authority while invoking its sanction of their work, by declaring that a territorial government was unknown to the Constitution, and extra-constitutional, and could not remain in force against the will of the people living under it. Thus they asserted their will to be paramount to the laws of the United States, and their right to enter upon the public domain, and to annul all the laws of Congress, to be beyond all question. Yet, sir, this constitution, thus presented, met the approval of the northern Republican party, I believe, in both Houses of Congress. They passed a bill to admit Kansas under this constitution through the House of Representatives, and it received the favor of all the Senators of that party. Thus encouraged by the approbation of their party in Congress and throughout the northern States, I am not surprised that these men should have continued to this day in an attitude of rebellion and defiance against the Federal Government. These are the men, or "the people," who oppose the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLASS] understood and portrayed their character truly in his report and speeches during the last Congress. Governor Walker understood and presented them truly in his communications to the President, and the President fairly portrays their character in the paragraph which I have read from his message. Shall we, sir, defer to these malcontents, factionists, and rebellionists? Shall we refuse to admit Kansas because of the opposition of this faction, dignified by the name of party; or the people of Kansas? If so, why shall we do it?

Not because there was no enabling act passed; not because they want the requisite population for admission into the Union; not because the question of calling a convention of the people was not fairly submitted; not because the law providing for a registration of voters was not regular, just, and fair in all its provisions. Nor, I think, because that law was not fairly executed; for the Senator from Missouri on my left, [Mr. PORTER,] in the able argument made by him the other day, showed clearly and conclusively that if that law was not fairly executed, it was not the fault of those who made it, or those who endeavored to execute it. He showed that in some counties where no registration was taken, there were no voters to register; others, where no registry was taken, were attached to adjoining counties and formed one district, in either of which counties they might have been registered, or might have voted; and that in a few counties no registry was taken, because the free-State party would not permit it. In the language of Governor Stanton, "they resolved not to take part in the registration; and we may well attribute any errors and omissions of the sheriffs, to this well-known and controlling fact."

Sir, there are but two objections made to the admission of Kansas, in my opinion, worthy of consideration—the only two which involve any question of principle. One is, the whole constitution was not submitted to the people. I am surprised to hear this objection preferred by Senators at this day, with the experience afforded us by near seventy years of republican government. No support for this objection can be derived either from the practices of our States or Territories, or from the genius and theory of our governments, or from any legislation of the Congress of the United States. In the younger and purer days of our Republic, constitutions were not submitted to the popular vote. The Federal Constitution was adopted by a convention of delegates, in the first instance, from the several States, and afterwards by delegates in conventions in the several States. It was never submitted to the popular vote. Neither of the original thirteen States submitted its constitution to a vote of the people. A majority of the States now in this Union adopted constitutions without ever submitting them to the popular vote. Precedents and authorities are numerous to sustain the course of the conventionists at Lecompton, in declining or refusing to submit the constitution to a popular vote. In my opinion, they would have acted in stricter accordance with the spirit and genius of our institutions if they had not submitted it, in whole or in part, to the popular vote. Our governments are republics, not democracies. The people exercise their sovereignty, not in person, at the ballot-box, but through agents, delegates or representatives. Our fathers founded republican governments in preference to democracies, not so much because it would be impracticable, as because it would be unwise and inexpedient for the people themselves to assemble and adopt laws. They were satisfied from reading, and from reflection, of the truth of Mr. Madison's observation about pure democracies, that they "have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention; have ever been found incompatible with personal security, or the rights of property, and have in general been as short in their lives, as they have been violent in their deaths." They knew from the examples furnished by Greece and Italy, that it is impossible, in a pure democracy, to remove the causes or control the effects of faction; that an absolute majority is oftener swayed by passion than by reason; that its voice is oftener that of a demon than of a god; that it is the most cruel, rapacious, intolerant, and intolerable of all tyrants. They knew that it is a wholly irresponsible power; acknowledging no superior, for it is itself supreme; owing no obedience, for it is its own master; respecting no authority, for it is a law unto itself; subject to no control or restraint, except the still small voice of conscience, which is too often drowned in the tumultuous waves of party or of faction. It might sacrifice public good or private rights to any ruling passion or interest of the hour, with impunity. It had robbed the rich to relieve the poor, and oppressed the poor to aggrandize the rich, with equal ardor or indifference. It had voted hemlock to-day and statues to-morrow, to its best citizens. They suffered no man to be a judge in his own case, lest he should be biased by passion or by interest; and could find no better reason why a large body of men, although a majority, should be the supreme and final arbiter of its cause. On the contrary, they knew that a large body of men is more liable to be controlled by passion or by interest than a single individual, and is more apt to sacrifice the rights of the minority, because it can be done with more impunity. Hence they endeavored to impose restraints upon themselves. Hence they committed the making of all their laws, organic or municipal, to their delegates or representatives; whose crimes they could punish, whose errors they could correct, and whose powers they could reclaim.

The great security of our rights of life, liberty, and property, is in the responsibility of those who make, and of those who execute the law. Establish as a principle that to give sanction to law it must be approved by the majority at the ballot-box, and you take away this security and surrender those rights to the most capricious, rapacious, and cruel of tyrants. I regret to see the growing spirit in Congress, and throughout the country, to democratize our Government, to submit every question, whether pertaining to organic or municipal laws, to the vote of the people. This is sheer radicalism. It is the Red Republicanism of revolutionary France, which appealed to the sections on all occasions, and not the American Republicanism of our fathers. Their Republicanism was stable and conservative; this is mutable and revolutionary. Theirs afforded a shield for the minority; this gives a sword to the majority. Theirs defended the rights of the weak; this surrenders them to the power of the strong. God forbid that the demagogism of this day should prevail over the philanthropic and philosophic statesmanship of our fathers.

But we are told that the will of the majority has not been expressed in this constitution; that it has been achieved by force or fraud. Three times have the voters of Kansas been authorized and enabled to vote upon this question of a constitution: first, whether a convention to frame it should be called; next, in electing delegates to the convention; and lastly, whether the slavery clause should be retained or rejected. Previously to the last vote, two elections for a Legislature, and three for Delegate to Congress, had been held; and in all these elections, except the last for Delegate, the Free-Soilers were beaten, and in that succeeded by only a small majority, and then because of the division of the Democratic party. And yet, notwithstanding oft-repeated defeats, they have ever claimed a larger number of voters than the majority cast at each of those elections—first, they have claimed two to one, ten to one, and even twenty to one, of the pro-slavery party. Admit the assertion, and it follows that this large majority have either from want of courage, energy, and resolution, feared and failed, or from want of patriotism and self-love and concern for their welfare, neglected and refused to assert and exercise their right and power to control elections and possess themselves of the Legislatures and of the convention, and thus form the municipal laws of the Territory, and the organic law of the State, to suit themselves. They either dared not, or cared not, to make the laws and mold the domestic institutions of Kansas. They were either submissionists from cowardice, yielding to the domination of a feeble minority, or anarchists from choice, unwilling to govern or be governed according to the forms of law and theory of American governments. In either case, they are unworthy of our sympathy or countenance, because unfit to frame or execute laws for a State or Territory. Such men should be governed. They are deficient in the moral qualifications for forming or administering free governments. I do not share in the charitable commiseration for that large and oppressed majority, or in the generous indignation towards that small and tyrannous minority, that has been so feelingly expressed on this floor. I feel rather disgust and contempt for that majority, and respect and regard for that minority. These are true popular sovereigns—those, servile submissionists or rebellious anarchists.

But, sir, knowing as I do that northern men are not deficient in wit to discern, or tact to manage, or courage to maintain their rights, I have never believed that the Free-Soilers in Kansas, if in a majority, have ever been cheated out of their rights or had them ravished by force. Often as I have heard that chaste and striking expression—a constitution crammed down the throats of the majority of the people against their will and in violation of popular sovereignty—it has failed to produce in me any qualms of conscience as an accessory after the fact in voting to admit Kansas, although I confess to some revulsion of stomach in contemplating that prodigious and marvelous operation. I have wondered less at the miracle than at those who repeated it. That sage and sober Senators should credit, or seem to credit, or expect intelligent people to credit, this exceeding miracle, is matter of "special wonder." If it had happened but once, I would have believed it; but I cannot believe that so large a majority has been overcome by fraud or by force six or more times in succession; it is contrary to my reason and to my knowledge of the character of American freemen. But, if true, they are unworthy of their rights, because unfit to exercise them.

These are plausible arguments, but cannot be controlling objections to the admission of Kansas into the Union. There is no constitutional, or legal, or moral obstacle to her admission, unless it be that the right of property in slaves is recognized and guaranteed by her constitution. The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] told us truly and frankly, that the question presented to us is, "whether there shall be slavery or no slavery in the Territories." The shibboleth of the party, of which he is the acknowledged leader, was, during the last canvass for the Presidency, and still is, "no more slave States." Many of the most prominent of that party deny that property in slaves is protected or even recognized by the Federal Constitution. Such was the explicit denial of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] All of them deny that it has any sanction in Divine or moral law, or common law, and denounce it as hostile to our republican institutions. The platform adopted by the northern Republicans at Philadelphia, in June, 1856, alleges all these objections to the institution of slavery, and commits them against the admission of any slaveholding State. If all the voters in Kansas desired admission into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, no northern Republican could vote to admit her without violating the principles of that platform; and some have conceded that the recognition of slavery by that constitution was to them an insuperable objection to her admission. There are Senators, I believe, who are not actuated, in opposing her admission, by the principles or sentiments of that party, but they are exceptions to the general rule of opposition.

If, as alleged by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] the principles and sentiments of his party predominate in the northern States; if the toleration of the expansion of slavery has been death to all parties there but the Democratic, and is fast hurrying that on to the same fate; if the North demands the ultimate emancipation of all men, and leaves the South only the election "whether it shall be effected with needful and wise precaution against sudden change, or hurried on by violence;" then it behooves the South to deliberate and determine whether she will yield herself to these northern ministers of her fate, or assert her right to shape her own destiny. Within the Union she cannot control her destiny against the preponderating majority of the North, when imbued and influenced by the principles and sentiments proclaimed by the northern Republicans. When they get the control of the Federal Government, (which they vauntingly predict,) the southern States must elect between independence out of the Union or subordination within it. The principles of that party are not only hostile to the constitutional rights of those States, but to their political integrity and social organization. They are not only unconstitutional and sectional, but radical and revolutionary. Alabama, in common with the southern States, has repeatedly declared that she will not submit to the measures of that party, and especially to the refusal to admit a slaveholding State into the Union; and if she be true to herself, she will resent and resist those measures, or either of them, even to disunion.

Property is the foundation of every social fabric. To preserve, protect, and perpetuate rights of property, society is formed, and government is framed. No government was ever formed to destroy the property of its citizens; although some have been perverted to that end by usurpation. No government ever existed, the design of whose framers was to enable some of them to seize and appropriate, or abolish, the property of others; although, by the tyranny of force or fraud, such results have ensued. On the contrary, the primary, fundamental, and inseparable idea of every social or political organization is, to guard and secure to every member thereof in the freedom, use, and enjoyment of his property. These are self-evident truths which every tyro in political law understands, and no intelligent man will deny. A necessary corollary of these principles is, that Government is bound to take care that foreign Governments do not rob its citizens, and that its citizens do not rob each other; and much more is Government itself bound not to rob its own citizens. These are absolute duties of Government, independent of any injunctions of the organic law. To fulfill these duties, powers are conferred.

But our forefathers were not content to rest their rights to freedom of property upon these necessary implications. They knew that life, liberty, and property are so intimately blended in the social state, that they must coexist in order to preserve the full enjoyment of either, and that sovereignty over one could not be surrendered without imperiling the safety of the others. They had learned from experience, as well as history, the overwhelming and endless evils that flowed from the sovereignty of Government over property, either public or private. They had read that, at one period of English history, kings and barons bestowed and resumed lands at pleasure; and at another, that Parliament enriched the few at the expense of the many, by means of bounties, pensions, titles, monopolies, and exclusive privileges. Hence, in their petition to the Crown for redress of grievances, they declared that they regarded "the giving of their property by their own consent alone, as the inalienable right of the subject, and the last sacred bulwark of constitutional liberty;" that "to deprive them of this right, would be to reduce them to a state of vassalage, which no free people can long endure;" and that "they would be utterly unworthy of their English ancestry, which is their claim and pride, were they tamely to submit." In contending, however, that their property could not be taken without their consent, they admitted, whilst colonies of England, that it might be taken and expended by their representatives, without restraint, in accordance with the English theory of the sovereignty of Parliament. But, when they established their independence, they renounced this dogma, and formed their Constitution upon the theory that sovereignty resides in the people, and that governments are their trustees. They knew that even election and representation, when coupled with a sovereign right over property, afford no refuge of protection to popular rights; and they endeavored to prescribe the duties, limit the powers, and control the action of their representatives, both in respect to persons and property, by a written Constitution. The word sovereign is not found in that instrument, or the Declaration of Independence, and does not belong to our governmental dialect. It would have been inappropriate, because inconsistent with their intention, to form a Government of limited and specific powers, to be held in trust for their benefit. The form, tenor, and spirit of the Constitution, all show a purpose to withhold from Government sovereign power over property, either public or private, and to retain for the people freedom of property, as well as of conscience, and of all other personal rights.

They instituted separate departments of Government, defining the rights and duties and assigning the patronage of each, and divided the powers transferred among them, that they might serve as mutual checks and balances.

They gave exclusive power to originate revenue bills to their Representatives, because they were the servants over whom they could exercise most immediate control.

They required that all duties, imposts, and excises, should be uniform throughout the United States; that no capitation or other direct tax should be laid unless in proportion to the census; that no preference should be given, by any regulation of commerce or of revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another State; thereby inhibiting and restraining a geographical majority from indulging partiality for themselves, or prejudice against a geographical minority, by sectional or class legislation, whereby the property of some States or classes of citizens might be taken and transferred to other States or classes of citizens, or other acts of oppression or injustice might be achieved.

They gave Congress power to pass "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States," because, if that power was reserved to the States exclusively, injustice might be done the bankrupt or his creditors, when they resided in different States, or he held property in several States.

They inhibited the States from "coining money, making anything but gold or silver coin a legal tender, or passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts;" empowered Congress to "coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and to fix the standard of weights and measures;" and declared that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation therefor;" and that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." All of which were precautions for the freedom of property and its defense against the usurpations or assaults of Government.

In the same spirit, to enable citizens of each State to trade or travel in any other State, or to hold property therein, free from confiscation, escheat, unequal taxation, robbery, or other injury, by that State or its citizens, they declared that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

No power was given Congress to define property, except in respect to money, or to discharge any article from being property. These powers were retained by the States or the people. And to "make assurance doubly sure," they superadded two amendments to the Constitution, declaring "the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people;" and "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Thus was sovereignty over property not only withheld from the Federal Government, but specifically guarded against. All these delegations and prohibitions of power were efforts to protect the rights of private property, or the rights of individuals to what belongs to them. They evince the jealous anxiety and care of the people to preserve the free use and enjoyment of their property, and to prevent Government from exerting over it any absolute or indefinite power.

One species of property, held in all the States except Massachusetts, (where it was abolished by judicial construction and not by intentional legislation,) was an object of peculiar solicitude—that was slave property. That property which had existed among the most cultivated nations of the earth from the days of Abraham, was then recognized and tolerated not only in America, (as shown by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BEXJAMIN], in his very able argument a few days since,) but by the first Powers of Europe. It was recognized by customary or common law, or by prescription, in the larger portion of Christendom. And notwithstanding the oft-quoted and misapplied phrase of the Declaration of Independence, "that all men are born free and equal," the author and signers of that instrument were either slaveholders or their representatives. Indeed, a clause reproaching the enslaving of the inhabitants of Africa was struck out of that instrument, Mr. Jefferson says, in compliance to South Carolina and Georgia, and our northern brethren; thereby refusing to acknowledge their right to freedom and equality with white men.

The framers of the Federal Constitution, too, were either slave-owners or their representatives. I believe they were all white men; were not bastards or foundlings, but knew their parentage and race; and were not theoretic amalgamationists, contemplating with complacency the commixture of their blood with that of their negroes, and the transmission to a mongrel progeny of the political inheritance they were amassing. Hence, I presume that by the words "ourselves and our posterity," in the preamble of the Constitution, they meant to secure to white men the blessings of liberty. I am confirmed in that opinion by the intrinsic evidence of the Constitution itself.

As slaves were then recognized as property by nearly all of Christendom, and by all the States of the Confederacy but one, and as no power was given Congress to define property, except as to money, or to abolish property, slave-owners would have been entitled to governmental protection of their slave property without any constitutional recognition of it, by force of those clauses of the Constitution which I have quoted; and even without these, by virtue of those fundamental principles of society to which I have alluded.

But the framers of that charter did not rest their rights upon necessary intentment or implication from those clauses of the Constitution, or from general principles of social organization, but superadded cumulative, specific, and stringent provisions for the protection and preservation of slave property.

It was, as Mr. Madison said in the Federal convention, the most material cause of the division of interests in the United States; and had to be adjusted before a common government was formed. It was one of those "particular interests" the convention had to provide for and defend, in order to secure the union of South Carolina, Georgia, and North Carolina, with the other States. Hence, no power was given Congress to abolish, impair, circumscribe, or restrain that institution, but, on the contrary, the framers of the Constitution provided for augmenting, strengthening, guarantying, and maintaining it.

They recognized, tolerated, and even encouraged it, in sanctioning the importation of slaves, by expressly denying to Congress power to prohibit it before 1808, or to impose on it a tax or duty exceeding ten dollars for each negro imported; and by further inhibiting the States from amending that clause of the Constitution within that period. Here was given the triple guarantee of the States and Federal Government for the augmentation of slavery; in inhibiting Congress from suppressing the slave trade, or from discouraging it by heavy taxes or duties, and in inhibiting the States from empowering Congress to suppress or restrain it, by amending that clause, for twenty years. But, while the power of Congress to prohibit or discourage was thus limited, no limitation was placed on its power to extend, revive, or even perpetuate the slave trade. The Constitution said to Congress, you shall not prohibit the importation of slaves for twenty years, but, thereafter, you may prohibit or allow it. And Congress might, at this day, license that trade with strict conformity to the spirit and intent of the Constitution. Yet, strange to tell, this clause of the Constitution has been cited as proof of its disfavor of slavery!

They not only recognized, but consolidated and strengthened slavery by adopting it as a federal institution, in making it the basis of federal representation and of federal taxation; thus preferring and fostering it above all other property, by making it alone, of all property, an element of political power in the Union, as well as a source of revenue to the Federal Government. Inasmuch as the "revenue is the State"—for without revenue the State could not exist—and as representation is a vital principle of republics, it may be truly said that the Federal Union owes its being at this day, and its birth in 1788, in part to slavery, and that slavery enters into the very life-blood which nourishes the Federal Government.

The Constitution recognizes slavery as a federal institution in providing for its protection and preservation, by inhibiting each State from destroying or impairing the right of property in slaves, by any law or regulation discharging from service any slave that may escape into it, and by requiring that he be delivered up on claim of his master. "At that time," says Chancellor Walworth, in Jack vs. Martin, (14 Wend. 526,) "the existence of involuntary servitude, or the relation of master and servant, was known to, and recognized by, the laws of every State in the Union, except Massachusetts; and the legal right of recaption by the master existed in all, as a part of the customary or common law of the whole Confederacy."

Yet, notwithstanding this customary or common law, the constitutional right of recaption and constitutional obligation not to discharge but to deliver, were superadded as higher and stronger and surer guarantees for the defense and preservation of slavery.

Thus are slaves acknowledged and warranted in the Constitution as property—property to be imported, to be taxed, to be represented, to be delivered upon demand of the master. Thus was slavery shown, in several respects, by the Federal Constitution, peculiar favor instead of disfavor. It is the only property that is specifically provided for and placed beneath the ægis of the Union. The Constitution recognizes it as a reserved right of the people and of the States, but imposes a federal duty on the States and their common Government to respect and uphold it, in several particulars and relations, above all other property. Power to abolish, circumscribe, or restrain it, is withheld; but power is granted, and the duty imposed on the Federal Government to protect and preserve it. Congress cannot touch it, except to take care of it.

The Constitution further guaranties the institution of slavery in two other clauses, by empowering Congress to call forth the militia to suppress insurrections and repel invasions, and by requiring the United States to protect each State against invasion, and on application of her Legislature, or Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence. Thus, by delegations and prohibitions of power, the framers of the Constitution endeavored to hedge about, guard, and fortify slave property against all assaults and above all other property.

But, notwithstanding property is the foundation of the social fabric; notwithstanding slave property was recognized by nearly all Christendom, by all the States of the Confederation, and was held in all but one when the Constitution was adopted; notwithstanding the framers of that instrument were slave owners or representatives of slave owners; notwithstanding it is so zealously and sedulously guarded and guarantied in that Constitution; notwithstanding it formed one of the bases of the Federal Union, enters into the frame-work of the Federal Government, is one of the elements of its existence, is one of the elements of the life-blood that courses through the veins of the Federal Republic, and is entitled to the defense of its sword and shield; the northern Republican party is pledged, by its party platform of 1856, and by the principles and policy of its leaders, proclaimed here, to a war of extermination upon slavery. I shall quote from that platform instead of the speeches of Senators, because they but elaborate the ideas it contains, and it is the most authoritative, as well as the most condensed summary of their party creed. That Philadelphia platform of June, 1856, denounces slavery as barbarous, unchristian, contrary to the law of nature, the Declaration of Independence, and the purpose and design of the Federal Government.

The first resolution pledges the party to maintain the principles promulgated in the Declaration and embraced in the Constitution.

The second resolution specifies those principles to be the right of all men to life, liberty, &c., and declares "the primary object and ulterior design of our Federal Government were to secure those rights to all persons within its exclusive jurisdiction."

It asserts that those principles promulgated in the Declaration are embodied in the Constitution, and to maintain them "is essential to the preservation of our republican institutions."

It denies "the authority of Congress, or a Territorial Legislature, or of any individual or association of individuals, to give legal assistance to slavery in any Territory of the United States, while the present Constitution shall be maintained." It claims "that the Constitution confers on Congress sovereign power over the Territories of the United States for their government, and that, in the exercise of this power, it is both the right and the duty of Congress to prohibit in the Territories those twin relics of barbarism—polygamy and slavery.”

The preamble of the Constitution declares its object was to secure liberty to white men—if, forsooth, by “ourselves and our posterity” the framers meant to designate the Caucasian race. But this platform blackens the faces or the fame of the framers of that instrument, by declaring those words embrace, or were intended to embrace, the African race, or a mongrel race of white and black.

The Constitution recognizes property in negro slaves in at least three clauses, encourages its acquisition, and binds the Federal Government to assist in maintaining the owners’ right to, and possession of, such property. But this platform asserts the inalienable right of all men to liberty, by virtue of the laws of God, the Declaration of Independence, and the Federal Constitution! And northern Republican Senators frequently deny here, in explicit words, that there can be any property in man!

The Constitution guaranteed to each State its reserved right to import slaves, and provided that the Federal Government should participate in the profits of their importation for the first twenty years after the birth of that Government; thus providing for the protection of slave property on board of vessels bearing the Federal flag on the high seas, where its jurisdiction was exclusive of the States and of any other Government. But this platform alleges the primary object of that Government was to secure liberty to all persons within its exclusive jurisdiction!

The Constitution guarantees to slave property representation in Congress; thus recognizing it as one of the elements of our republicanism. But this platform alleges that the maintenance of the right of all men to liberty is essential to the preservation of our republican institutions.

The Constitution recognized slavery as of federal importance and having a federal existence, and encouraged the indefinite multiplication of slaves by importation, and their illimitable expansion by giving its sanction to the foreign slave-trade, and by securing to each State the right of importation of slaves. All power to interdict or interfere with the inter-State slave-trade also was withheld.

One of the arguments used by Mr. Mason, of Virginia, in the Federal convention, against the foreign slave trade was the spread of slavery over those Territories west of Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia. After alluding to the prohibition of slavery by Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina, he said:

“All this will be in vain if South Carolina and Georgia be at liberty to import. The western people are already calling out for slaves for their new lands, and will fill that country with slaves if they can be gotten through South Carolina and Georgia.”

Thus forewarned that slavery would take its way westward, beyond the limits of the original States, and would be used to form other and new States, and urged to prevent this consummation, the framers of the constitution refused to do so, but gave their consent and encouragement to its expansion over the western wilderness. But this platform repudiates slavery as without the pale of the Federal protection, where the Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction, denies the power of Congress, or of any Territorial Legislature, or of any person, to aid or protect it in the Territories, and maintains the power and duty of Congress to prohibit or abolish it in the Territories.

The Constitution provided for augmenting, consolidating, preserving, and perpetuating slavery, by making it one of the pillars of the Federal Government, in securing its representation, and by binding the Government to protect it against foes within or without the Union; in inhibiting the discharge from service of a fugitive slave by any law or regulation of any State, and in pledging the States and their common Government to protect it against foreign invasion or domestic insurrection. But this platform maintains that the primary object and ulterior design of our Federal Government was to secure liberty to all men within its exclusive jurisdiction.

The Constitution conferred on Congress no power to define property, except money. But this platform claims for it power to say what shall, and shall not be property wherever it has exclusive jurisdiction. The Constitution conferred on Congress no power to discharge any article from being property. But this platform claims the right of Congress to discharge negroes from being property. Our ancestors declared they regarded the giving of their property by their own consent, the inalienable birthright of the British subject; but you, northern Republicans, assert your right to take away the property of American people, who are sovereigns and not subjects, against their consent.

Your platform expressly repudiates the obligations of the Constitution. It is hostile to rights of property existing before the Union in all the States, which formed one of the bases of the Union, and which are better guaranteed by the Constitution than any other property in the Union.

If Congress has no authority to give legal assistance to slavery in a Territory, it cannot give it any assistance in this District, in any navy-yard, fort, arsenal, barracks, hospital, custom-house, court-house, or prison, belonging to the Federal Government, or on any spot on sea or land covered by the Federal flag, and not under the jurisdiction of a State.

If it may not pass laws for the recapture of a fugitive slave in a Territory, it may not pass laws for his recapture anywhere within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The power of Congress is certainly as great in this District, or in any navy-yard, fort, or any of the places designated, as in a Territory; for in those places the right of exclusive legislation is expressly granted by Congress.

The Federal flag that covers slave property on board a vessel at sea, or in this District, a navy-yard, or fort on land, instead of being an emblem of protection, is like the blue lights in our last war with Great Britain—an invitation to plunder, held out to foreign and domestic foes.

If Congress cannot pass laws for securing the right of recapture of fugitive slaves in the Territories, or in this District, or in a navy-yard within the States, or in any place where the Federal jurisdiction is exclusive, a fortiori it cannot pass laws for recovery of fugitive slaves in the States, where its power is concurrent; for its power is certainly more limited where it is concurrent than where it is exclusive.

Under the northern Republican administration of the Government, if the slaveholder carry his property into a Territory, this District, a navy-yard, or sea, in a non-slaveholding State, anywhere beyond the limit and jurisdiction of the slaveholding States, he must do so at the peril of its loss. If robbed by a public enemy or a domestic foe, the Government would not enforce restoration of his property or exact indemnity. In such case it must look on an impassive and neutral spectator. It must abdicate its power, or abnegate its duty to protect that property. The Government will be potent to destroy, but impotent to protect. It may and must prohibit, deny, and defeat his right of property, outside of the slaveholding States; but may not, and cannot, admit, sustain, and secure that right. The slaveholder must live in perpetual quarantine, confined to the spot on which he resides, denied all egress by land or sea, in the Territories, non-slaveholding States, this District, or the public vessels, under menace of robbery of his property, without recovery or indemnity. He must keep in his prison-bounds, or become an outlaw, beyond governmental protection.

The Government must not only abdicate its power to protect, it must confederate with his enemies to destroy the slaveholder’s property. It must discriminate against the South in favor of the North; it must denounce southern laws, defining and regulating property, as inhuman and execrable—northern laws as benign and admirable; it must sustain the latter and counteract the former. Congress and the Federal executive officers must become allies of abolition, and, in compliance with the behests of the original American anti-slavery society, established in 1833, “must abolish slavery in all those portions of our common country which come under its control,” or, in the language of this northern Republican platform, “must secure the right of liberty to all persons within its exclusive jurisdiction.” In other words, Congress must abolish slavery in this District, the navy and dock-yards, forts and arsenals, and vessels at sea; must inhibit it in the Territories, inhibit the inter-State slave trade, repeal the fugitive slave act, and, in the language of Abolition orators and essayists, must “sever the Government from all connection with slavery,” and “efface so foul a blot from the national escutcheon.” Thus the Constitution, which was designed to serve as a shield to protect, is converted into a sword to destroy slave property. Such is the programme of Federal legislation laid down by abolition societies for a quarter of a century, and such is the import and meaning of this northern Republican platform. Those societies declare their meaning in language not to be misunderstood. This platform only announces the single measure of inhibiting slavery in Territories; but its declaration of principles and of the power and duty of Congress, commits that party to all the measures of those societies. Those measures are the logical and necessary consequence of the principles of the platform put in act.

Yea, more, the right and duty of Congress to assail slavery in the States may be fairly deduced from the doctrines of this platform, notwithstanding the vain boast that “the rights of the States, and the Union of the States, shall be preserved.” It declares that the principles promulgated in the Declaration are embodied in the Constitution; pledges the party to maintain those principles; asserts those principles, thus promulgated and embodied, to be the right of all men to liberty, &c.; and alleges that the primary object, and ulterior design of the Federal Government was to secure liberty to all men within its exclusive jurisdiction. If true, why should not Congress so legislate as to secure liberty to all persons in the United States? Where in the Constitution is found this right of all men to liberty; or that to secure this right to all men, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government, was the primary object and ulterior design of the Federal Government? Where in the Constitution do you find evidence that it was the design of the Federal Government to secure liberty to negro slaves? Where, in that instrument, do you find a design to secure liberty to negroes wherever the Federal Government had exclusive jurisdiction? Where is the proof of any intention of the framers of that instrument to secure liberty to all men in a Territory, or in this District, but not in the several States? What privilege, immunity, or liberty, is guaranteed in a Territory, that is not equally guaranteed in the States? It cannot be found. There is no evidence of a design to secure other or greater blessings, liberties, or rights to men, within a Territory, or where the power of the Federal Government is exclusive of the State governments, than to men within a State, or where the Federal and State governments may operate concurrently. There can be shown no contrary or antagonistic designs in the Federal Constitution. If it had an anti-slavery design upon the Territories, it had the same design upon the States, and must carry out that design to the extent of its powers—in the latter as well as the former.

There is abundant evidence in the Constitution of the design of its framers to show no geographical, sectional, or personal partialities, but, on the contrary, to secure the same common and equal rights, privileges, immunities, and blessings, to citizens of the United States, wherever they might dwell within the bounds of its operation. It was intended to secure the blessings of liberty to “ourselves and our posterity” throughout the Union, where it was to operate exclusively or directly, and where it was to operate concurrently or indirectly. If it was formed by negroes or for negroes, as well as white men; if the sweeping generalities and cabalistic abstractions of the Declaration about the liberty and equality of all men are embodied in the Constitution; if the words “ourselves and our posterity,” for whom it was formed, embrace blacks, as well as white men, (as alleged by this platform,) then those who administer the Government are bound to exert its powers to the extent given in the Constitution, so as to abolish slavery in the States. It was formed with no double meaning or contrary objects and designs, but with the same meaning, object, and design, in States or Territories. If its objects and design were to secure liberty to all men anywhere, the same object and design in every other place may be deduced from the same premises.

This platform thus pledges that party, if they get the control of this Government, to exert it on the side of negro freedom everywhere. It warrants and encourages assaults upon the right to slave property in the States, notwithstanding its expressed regard for the rights of the States. If its principles be embodied in the Constitution, then its framers were guilty of the insane folly of founding a Government for the destruction of the property of its citizens; for encouraging foreign nations to plunder them, and one class of States or citizens to plunder another class of States or citizens; a Government for taking their property without just compensation therefor; for depriving them of their property without due process of law; for taking their property without their consent. And they did this while protesting against the sovereign power of the mother country over their property, while professing a contrary purpose and design, and while actually providing against the invasion or abuse of their rights of property.

The principles enunciated in this platform and expressed on this floor by northern Republicans, if they ever prevail in the administration of the Federal Government, will place the slaveholding States under its ban and induce abuses and oppressions such as no brave and free people will long endure. They condemn the political and social institutions of those States as barbarous and inhuman. They deny their equality in the Union, and the equality of the slaveholder among the citizens of the Union. They pronounce against him sentence of outlawry. They denounce his title to his slave property to be irreconcilable with the Divine law, the law of nature, or of nations, or even the Constitution of his country! They reprobate the institution of slavery as hostile to our republican institutions, as the crime of the South, and the reproach of the Union.

What can we expect but neglect and disregard of our claims to protection of our property from those who deny our title? What can we expect but habitual and systematic insult, injury, and outrage, from those who profess to abhor, condemn, and loathe our domestic institutions? condemning alike "those twin relics of barbarism, polygamy and slavery." What respect for our right of property in slaves can we expect from those who maintain that they are bound by the Constitution, as well as "higher law," to secure the blessings of liberty to all men? What inducement or motive could the South have to remain in the Union under a Federal Government whose legislative, executive, and judicial departments were administered by men imbued with the sentiments, principles, and opinions, which northern Republicans entertain or profess? The South united with the North in conferring on their common Government certain powers to fulfill certain duties. If it refuses to discharge those duties it betrays our trust. Protection in the enjoyment of equal rights and privileges, in equal security of person and of property, is the political bond of our Union. If such protection be denied, the bond is broken, and she can have no worthy motive for longer preserving the Union. The Federal Government will become towards her a worse tyranny than that of any autocrat. It will exact support without yielding protection. It will extort tribute, not for her advantage, but for northern aggrandizement; not for her defense, but for her despoliation; not to maintain her independence, but to effect her subjugation. It will require of the South payment of taxes and performance of military duty to acquire territory, and yet deny her any share of it, or admission into it—in virtue of the power claimed and the duty felt to prohibit therein "those twin relics of barbarism, polygamy and slavery." It will tax us and our slaves to support armies and navies, and yet refuse to exact or demand indemnity for slave property stolen or snatched from us by foreign foes, upon the ground that such property is not recognized by Christian nations. It will tax us and our slaves to support a judiciary that will always decide for the freedom of the fugitive slave and against slavery—upon the ground that the Constitution does not recognize or protect slave property—in order to achieve that reform the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] so fondly anticipates and so confidently predicts. It will tax us and our slaves to support post offices and carry mails, to disseminate incendiary documents among our slaves and incite them to insurrection, arson, and assassination—in order to prevent any abridgement of the freedom of the press. It will tax us and our slaves to support soldiers to man forts, arsenals, and navy-yards, and to keep a Federal constabulary in our towns to vindicate freedom of speech, or the right to tell our slaves that they are oppressed and should slay their oppressors. It will tax us and our slaves to build forts, arsenals, navy-yards, custom and court-houses, which shall serve as sanctuaries for fugitive slaves. It will tax us and our slaves to keep its janissaries on the highways that lead across the boundaries of the slaveholding States, to prevent the carrying of slaves from one State to another—asserting its right to do so, under the power granted Congress to regulate commerce. It would effect the destruction of the institution of slavery by these indirect means, and within the letter of the Constitution, though in utter violation of its spirit and meaning. It would render that property not only insecure and valueless, but a curse and a torment to the southern people. In fact, it would subvert our State governments and our social organism, without, perhaps, ever passing any act of Congress directly abolishing slavery in the States. Suffer that party to take into its control the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of this Government—extending its Briarean arms around and over the entire southern States—and it would stealthily and gradually achieve their ruin and desolation. It would distill from the fruit of southern fields the fatal poison it would administer to their owners.

None can doubt the justness of these charges who believe you northern Republicans are sincere in the faith you profess, or would redeem the pledges you have given. That you would break through all constitutional restraint, and go to the furthest extreme to despoil and subjugate us, in order to gratify fanaticism, avarice, and ambition, we have full assurance in the sad experience of Kansas, and in the admonitory lessons of the last Congress. If these prophetic warnings are not unnoticed or unheeded by the South, she will be forearmed for those struggles for dominion which we are assured by the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] the freemen of the North will continue in the Territories and in the slaveholding States until the foot of a slave does not press the soil of the United States.

With the control of but one House of Congress, and opposed by the other and by the Executive and judiciary, you tried, with sublime audacity, to seize the reins of Government, and absorb the powers of all its departments, in order to expel slavery from Kansas, and annihilate southern power in that Territory. To achieve that purpose, you endeavored to arrest the wheels of Government and to revolutionize it, to nullify all laws and subvert all authority in Kansas, and to subject its people to all the horrors of anarchy and fratricidal war. Great indeed would be the humiliation and degradation of submission to your demand, by surrendering to you the exclusive occupancy of all the Territories of the United States. But that would not purchase our peace or satisfy your demands. And if the South decide to yield this demand in the vain hope of an inglorious peace, let her check her pride, and make up her mind with becoming meekness and humility to live, while she is let live, in a state of subjugation, subordination, and subserviency to the North, impetrating mercy of her masters, instead of exacting justice of her equals.

I do not doubt that you think she will yield all you demand. I do not doubt you believe you can extort from her fears of your power all that you cannot seduce from her love of the Union. I believe you expect to excite discord among her own sons, and to array against the slaveholders all who are not slaveholders, by persuading these that they are oppressed and wronged. But the example of Kansas, where there cannot have been more than two hundred slaveholders out of six thousand pro-slavery voters, should have taught you that the sons of the South know and feel that they have a common interest in preserving the institution of slavery; that they must keep the negro in his normal condition of slavery or destroy him, or surrender to him their country. I do not fear that you can delude and beguile them to their own self-destruction, or the desolation of their country. I know you count largely upon the defections and desertions of southern leaders; and I confess, with shame and regret, that you have but too good reason for your calculations in the mortifying examples we have furnished of those who have betrayed their trust and broken their allegiance to the South, not, perhaps, because they loved her less, but the Union more, and themselves most. I know it is idle to try to disenchant your minds of impressions which you are fond to retain and wish to be true, but which I think dishonor the South, wrong the North, and may dissolve the Union. Yet, at the hazard of your ridicule, I must tell you that Alabama, in common with all her southern sisters but two, has, by the universal voice of her people, as expressed by party conventions, by popular assemblies, and by her late and former Legislatures, resolved—

"That she will and ought to resist, even (as a last resort) to a disruption of every tie which binds her to the Union, any action of Congress upon the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in places subject to the jurisdiction of Congress, incompatible with the safety, the domestic tranquility, the rights and honor of the slaveholding States; or any refusal to admit as a State any Territory hereafter applying, because of the existence of slavery therein; or any act prohibiting the introduction of slavery into the Territories;" "or any act repealing or materially modifying the law now in force for the recovery of fugitive slaves."

If this be mere bravado, she shares the folly and the shame in common with twelve of her southern sisters. While I have indulged, and shall indulge, in no menace, or promise or prophecy of her course, yet I can, and will say, for myself, that in the day of her self-degradation, by disregarding her pledges and submitting to your Government, I will not sit here to endure the contumely and reproach which you justly may, and certainly will, heap upon the heads of her Senators.

Mr. President, I have not been addicted to singing peans or uttering eulogies about the Union, or accustomed to regarding it as "the paramount political good," or "the primary object of patriotic desire." I have ever felt that I owed my first and highest allegiance to my State, and that her sovereignty, her independence, and her honor, even without the Union, should be dearer to her sons, than the Union and her subordination, dependence and dishonor within it. Yet, sir, the Union of the Constitution, which our fathers made, I love and reverence and would preserve; but this Union without the Constitution, or with it as construed by northern Republicans, I abhor and scorn, and would dissolve, if my power were equal to my will. To this Union, the South is commended as a choice of evils, and commanded with menaces of compulsion. Whether she will choose the Union as a lesser evil, or submit to it by compulsion and abandon her self-government and surrender her destinies to your control, you will surely test, if you get the power, and time will surely prove. If she yield to your advice or to your commands, she will deserve to suffer all the wrong and all the shame you can and will accumulate upon her head. But as honor, interest, self-preservation—all that is dear to freemen—all urge her to maintain her individuality and equality as sovereign States, either within or without the Union, I trust she will give you full demonstration of her courage and self-reliance, by refusing any, the least concession to your demands, and by resenting your menaces and repelling your attempts at coercion in such manner as will prove that the spirit of the fathers, who, at Yorktown and at New Orleans, consummated in triumph our two wars of independence, yet lives in her sons.

Mr. DURKEE obtained the floor.

Mr. BELL. I should like to ascertain from my honorable friend from Alabama whether, in some remarks that he made, in which he alluded to defections, desertions, and betrayals, he alluded to anything that had taken place in the debate yesterday on the part of myself or the honorable Senator from Kentucky? I only ask him if he meant anything personal in relation to myself?

Mr. CLAY. I certainly did not intend to make any reflection upon the Senator from Tennessee.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Clay.

SENATE.

Mr. BELL. That is satisfactory. I did not hear that portion of the Senator's remarks distinctly, and that was the reason why I asked the question.

Mr. CLAY. I had no personal allusion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no expectation of making a speech, nor had I any intention of uttering a syllable upon this subject; but as my friend from Alabama—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. JONES in the chair.) The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I only wish to say a word.

Mr. DURKEE. I yield the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. It was not my intention to have uttered one word in relation to this subject, nor do I now intend to address the Senate upon the topic before it; but an observation which fell from my friend from Alabama, in relation to the passage of the Nebraska bill, demands of me a passing observation. The remark was, that those who opposed the passage of the Nebraska bill, opposed it on the ground that it opened the Territory to slavery. I opposed that bill, sir. My objection was very different from that. I had the assurance of every gentleman from the South within my hearing—others may not have said it—that slavery never would go to Kansas.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I can perhaps save my friend from Texas the necessity of a speech, by telling him that, in any remarks I have made, I certainly intended no moral impeachment of any Senator upon this floor. It may have been a political impeachment. I certainly have regarded these things as a betrayal of trust and of duty to my section of the Union. I did not mean to impute that they intended it as such, or felt it as such. In respect to the vote of the Senator, I made no remark about any man, South or North. I spoke of the general opposition to the bill. I have no doubt that some, on the part of the South, opposed that bill simply upon the ground that they preferred quiet error to boisterous truth; that they preferred living in inglorious peace rather than hazard war in vindication of their rights. Now, sir, I will not say that that influenced the distinguished Senator from Texas, who has a great deal of military as well as civil reputation, and who has illustrated his courage on the field, as well as his wisdom in council. I wish him not to suspect me of intending to impeach his motives in the course of argument which I have pursued. I have indulged in general remarks, without really one particle of unkindness towards any of those whom I regret to find differing with me on this occasion, as well as that to which he alludes.

Mr. HOUSTON. Had I anticipated any personal reflection, Mr. President, I would not have referred to the gentleman as my friend. It was the political reflection that I intend, in a few words, to repel. The gentleman is pleased to compliment me on the score of martial achievements and personal courage. They are properties, I presume, that every American has, or ought to have; and, if I have any attribute of that character justly imputed to me, the glory of my life was, that I had the moral manhood, on that occasion, to stand up against the influences which surrounded me, and to be honest in the worst of times. There are two or three other things I intend to notice. The bill of 1854 was not to open, or to prevent opening, the door to slavery in Kansas; for I had the assurance of honorable gentlemen who participated in the debate, that slavery would never go to Kansas. Was it interposing an objection to the march of slavery if I voted against opening that Territory, when we had the assurance of the oldest and most distinguished Senators in this body that slavery never could go there, because God, by his fiat, had interposed an impediment to its location there? Is that the reason why I voted against it? No, sir; my motives were higher and holier. I was not the enemy of slavery, nor was I its propagandist; nor will I ever be.

My opposition to that measure was because it broke up the deep fountain of bitter waters that were to flow over the land, and that now have deluged it, with occasional spouts of blood mingling with its current. It was to keep that down and to repress it that I voted against the Kansas-Nebraska bill. It was a subject I had not particularly looked into, but I had a right to believe my southern associates were honorable gentlemen, and that they did not intend to introduce slavery there; for it would have been unworthy of southern chivalry, and the nobility of southern sentiments, by base artifice to conceal the primary design of introducing slavery there, when they asserted the contrary. I thought they had pride and chivalry enough to declare their object; and, as I believed it was breaking down the barrier that secured our institutions in the South, and was only opening the door to free soil, and violating southern pledges given to the Indians and recorded at least here, if not in Heaven, I opposed that bill with all the indignation of an honest heart, at least, if I had not the glory of a triumphant defeat of it. These were my objects.

Now that wall of partition is broken down, and what is the result? South of 36° 30' free soil has made its footprints, and where will it stop? Before it had a barrier at that point; but it has none now. I opposed it to prevent a conflict in future time; not to submit to an inglorious peace. My object was to preserve and perfect an honorable peace according to the compromise of 1850. This line had been established by the wisdom of wise men, and it ought to have remained a perpetual monument of peace and harmony. It should have had some manifest dedication to it as a glorious memorial of an occasion that had transformed and given peace to the country. The repeal of that measure dissolved the harmony that existed in the country. It broke peace with the North. I thought there was sufficient free-soil preponderance before this region of country was opened to its inroads, and, as a southern man, I stood up against the repeal of the Missouri compromise.

Sir, I protest against gentlemen speaking of "my State," or "my section." I have heard it long enough. I will have none of it. I am a southern man; and no one has ever raised his arm or bared his breast to give wider extension to its territory, or to vindicate its rights, more than I have done; and I am always ready to do it; but I have no war of words to bandy, I have no agitation to foster. Sir, I have heard too much in the councils of the nation about sections. I know none of your sections. The State from which I come was united to the American Union and confederated with sister States, but she did not come in as a sectional appendage. I want to feel that this is a confederated community and nation, and that it must be preserved. Let us resolve to preserve the Union, and bestow the same pains, care, investigation, and research to give cement and stability to that Union that are now bestowed to create faction and discord, and we shall accomplish a work worthy of gods to contemplate. But factious proceedings are unworthy of men, unworthy of Senators, unworthy of patriots. I have not acted for a section. I will know no section. I am not going to encourage the fell spirit of discord; and when I can interpose an objection of mine to its progress, I will arrest it at the peril of my life.

I wish it to be distinctly understood that there are more people in the South than the statesmen and politicians who are seen in her public assemblages. There is a gallant yeomanry, a chivalrous and generous population, whose hardy hands are adapted as well to toiling for the procurement of the necessities of life and the nurture of their families as they are to the application of arms to vindicate their rights. They are the men whose voice will be heard when you carry the question of union or disunion to their homes in their peaceful cabins, with their little yards surrounded by their domestic animals, and all those things which are endeared to them. Then they will speak of the Union, and they will think of it; and when they contemplate the comforts which they have, and know how uncertain these would be if they were to cast all to the issue of anarchy, they will stand by the Union.

Mr. President, I said that I would not take up the time of the Senate, nor have I any disposition to do so; but I do say that was the best act of my life. My life has been a long and varied one. The only achievement that failed and brought sorrow to my heart was, that I could not defeat that fatal measure which was fostered by demagogues, originated in ambition, was intended for no valuable interest of the country, but to unite the South, and, with a few scattering northern States, make a President, and continue the succession. That was the iniquity of it. I said then that the oldest man living at that time might say he had seen the commencement of trouble, but the youngest child then born would not see the end of the calamities which would result to the South from that measure, if adopted. It has been adopted, and what has been the result? That is a subject on which I have nothing to say. My actions may speak of what I think of it; but I do not desire any misapprehension of my motives or my conduct to be entertained. Whenever a gentleman presents himself who has given stronger assurance of patriotic devotion to his country than I have done to the Union and the Constitution and to every section, then I will defer to him, and hear a rebuke for the sentiments which have been nourished and cherished in my heart while living, and will be buried with me unless they ascend to a higher destiny.

Mr. CLAY. I have no idea of replying at length to the remarks of the Senator from Texas. I think I could show very distinctly, and very satisfactorily and conclusively, that the Missouri compromise, as it was misnamed—or the Missouri restriction, as it really was—which placed the badge of inferiority upon the slaveholding States of this Union; which opposed a bar, a prison-bar, beyond which they dare not go, but at the same time did not oppose (as suggested by the Senator from Texas) any barrier, any resistance to northern immigration south of that line—so far from being a bond of peace, has proven an eye-sore, an evil, a curse to both sections of the Union. I could show that Mr. Jefferson denounced it at the time as a struggle on the part of the North for power, on the part of the South for existence; and that he then predicted, with prophetic forecast, the geographical dissensions and contentions which have been its legitimate and necessary offspring. I could show, by the illustration of popular feeling in the Senator's own State, that he stands in a lean minority in his opinion. Thank God, there are tens of thousands, where you can find hundreds, who, like him, are willing to concede to the demands of power what justice would never accord.

Sir, I am not the trumpeter of my own fame. That is the privilege of older men. I do not get up to make protestations of my patriotism or of my heroism, either in physical combat or moral struggles; but I profess an allegiance to my State, which, in virtue of my State-rights principles, in virtue of the instinctive feelings which animate us to love our mothers rather than any other human being, constrains me to seek her rights and to vindicate her honor, at all hazards and to the last extremity. I confess, sir, to some mortification and regret to find that sentiments, which I regard as honorable as they are natural, meet with rebuke from the Senator from Texas. Perhaps it is the privilege of his age to rebuke me. If he cannot derive it from his seniority, he has no title to that privilege.

I have suggested, what he knows to be the fact, that his own constituency have condemned his course upon that measure; yet in alluding (and I do not know that I did allude) to the repeal of the Missouri restriction line, I had no personal allusion to him; and I have been amazed at the feeling which he has displayed on this occasion. I do not think I have given him cause for it. Indeed, I am conscious that there was no pretext for it. I regret that he has shown it. I sincerely had no desire to wound him, and I do not care to protract this controversy further.

Sir, I want no controversy with any one, but especially not with southern men. I rejoice in the hope and belief that at last party strife and party dissension, which has divided and disabled my section of the Union from the true vindication of her rights, is yielding to that common sentiment of duty, of honor, of self-interest, ay, to that instinctive sentiment of self-preservation, which admonishes us to prepare to defend our rights, and to resist the aggression which is meditated and threatened upon them. I rejoice in the hope and belief that never before, at any period of the history of this country, was public sentiment in the South more harmonious, more accordant, more uniform, than it is at this day on the subject of southern rights and the menaced aggressions on the part of a party in the North. I trust that my northern friends, on this or the other side of the Chamber, have not appropriated what I have said in respect to northern sentiment to them, or to the constituents whom they faithfully represent. I feel that they are my friends; that they are the friends of the South; and what is more, far more creditable to their statesmanship and their patriotism, they are the friends of the Constitution. I feel that they are moral heroes in this strife, who are entitled not only to the thanks, but to the respect, to the love, and the admiration of southern men. They stand as sentinels on the outer wall of the Constitution, resisting the assaults which, if successful, must overthrow the temple of the Union. They have been driven, I know, to the extremest verge, and are now menaced with destruction by that tide of popular fanaticism which threatens to submerge everything that is sacred and dear in the memory of the past, or in the promises of the future. They have displayed a courage which is higher and nobler than that of the mere man of bone and muscle and strong heart, who, like the beast of the field, may display his prowess in physical encounters. They have displayed that high moral courage which distinguishes man from the brute. In any remarks that I have made about the unconstitutional and radical doctrines in the North, I have not intended any allusion to, far less any imputation upon, them; but I have spoken upon the propositions which have been announced in the Republican platform, upon the principles which have been advocated upon this floor, and upon the distinct enunciation which has been made here that this war is never to cease; that from the great northern hive the freemen of the North are to pour down upon the South, as to a banquet of victory, in vindication of the rights of free labor, and the extermination of slavery. It has been in reply to such sentiments, to such assertions of purposes, and such prophecies of the future, that I have endeavored to respond.

Mr. President, I had no thought of saying thus much. I regret exceedingly that I should have unwittingly provoked the remarks of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I am opposed to the extremely improper sentiments uttered in the North, as I am in the South. I am opposed to both extremes; I favor neither. There is a middle ground; and there we shall find rectitude and propriety and all that is desirable. It was not the gentleman personally that I wished to rebuke. I referred to his sentiments. Since he has made allusion to my State, I will say a word on that point. I grant him, very truthfully, that I have received an earnest and gratifying assurance from my constituents that they intend to relieve me from further service here. I say gratifying, for in the recent election they beat me; and it is gratifying, as I had every disposition to retire, on the 4th day of March next, from public life. How it was brought about I can not exactly tell. I know that I had a cavalier and ex-President mounted with boots, spurs, and whip, and a hind rider from Illinois, both after me ever since I voted against the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and that was enough to break down an old gray horse. [Laughter.] Besides, all the Federal influence was marshaled, drilled, and prepared for the combat, and I was defeated. I am very much obliged to my State because they have not disowned me in beating me—they have only preferred another. I have this further assurance, that I made the State, but I did not make the people; and if they do wrong, the State still remains in all its beauty, with its splendid and inviting prospects, with nothing on the earth to surpass it in climate, soil, and productions, all varied and delightful. It remains the same beautiful Texas. I made it. I did not make the people. They came there and they are there; but the State remains, and I am a citizen of it.

The gentleman says he loves Alabama because he was born there. Sir, I, too, love Alabama; I have endearments of the most delicate character connected with Alabama. More, sir, when it was an unbroken wilderness, forty-four years ago; when the savage and the wild beast roamed over it, and every man who went there had to go with his life in one hand and his weapons of war in the other; it was there that I kindled camp-fires and sat by them and kept vigils. I assisted in re-deeming that land from a wilderness and a desert, and I watered it with the richest blood of youth that flowed in these veins. Ought I not to love the South? Yes, sir; I cherish every manly sentiment for the South; and I am determined that, while I live in it, none of the fraternal bonds which bind it to this Union shall be broken.

Mr. DURKEE. After the many and able speeches which have been made on this Kansas conspiracy in both Houses of Congress, it would be idle in me to suppose that I could say anything calculated to change a single vote on the final issue. But there is a higher tribunal to which the friends of "free Kansas" may be called upon to take their appeal—I mean the tribunal of public opinion; and it is in anticipation of this contingency, as not unlikely to be forced upon us, that I desire to add my testimony against this monstrous iniquity. Too great indifference is still manifested throughout the country in regard to this disturbing element, which more than ever threatens the integrity and perpetuity of the Union; and until the whole people become aroused to the true nature of this question, it were better that the discussion should go on.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut thinks slavery might be left entirely out of view in this discussion. Why, sir, it is the very gist of the question on which we are about to vote, made such by the advocates of the Lecompton conspiracy. Not one of them, on this floor or elsewhere, will deny that it was to prop slavery, and strengthen its influence, and increase its power in the Government, that this Lecompton scheme was originally concocted. It is too late to plead blindness in this respect. The avowals of southern statesmen and southern Legislatures and conventions, to say nothing of southern newspapers, have been too frank to leave any doubts on this subject. No, no, Mr. President; it is the slavery question we are discussing, and that, too, in its widest sense. It is that same question, notwithstanding partisans in national convention assembled here, over and over again, "resolved" it out of Congress! And, sir, but for the nationalization of slavery, which the framers of the Constitution intended to be a temporary and local institution purely, our Federative Union might have remained a political Eden to this day. It is the only element of national discord which remains to haunt us; and it is because the enemies of freedom have persisted in transferring this satanic question from a distant Territory to the national Capitol, that this new contest has arisen, and discord been invoked into our otherwise peaceful councils.

Not only have we the slavery question before us, but we have it in its most startling and odious form. Here, in this Lecompton constitution, and its famous—shall I not rather say infamous—"schedule," we have not simply the question whether the colored race have any rights which the white race are bound to respect; but we have the strange and startling question propounded, whether white men there have any rights which white men here, in this Senate Chamber, are bound to respect? Sir, this treasonable constitution which the majority of this body seem resolved to force upon the people of Kansas, is nothing more nor less than an attempt to enslave the freemen of a whole Territory at a single blow! This is, indeed, slavery grown to manhood, and now grasping for empire.

Mr. President, disguise the matter as we may, if we pass the Lecompton constitution, which shall force upon Kansas an organic law disfranchising a large majority of its inhabitants, it will be worse than mockery to prate of the inalienable guarantees of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Nor can we fail, as a people, to suffer for the wrong we may thus allow in utter disregard of all sense of justice, and in direct opposition to every principle of our Constitution. We shall assuredly realize, in the sequel, the truth so often proclaimed by eminent and patriotic statesmen of our own and other countries, that we cannot enslave a part of the community without enslaving the whole. And history, if it has made more clear any one fact than another, has taught us that in popular governments, where power is constantly shifting, the majority may not safely wrong the minority, nor the accidentally powerful those who happen for the time to be powerless.

Not that the white people of Kansas are to be bought and sold as slaves, but they will be deprived of the right of self-government—a tyranny which our forefathers considered too odious to be endured. The majority will be subjected to the will and pleasure of the minority; and what that will and pleasure may be, if sustained by Federal bayonets, can be gathered from the letter and spirit of this whole Lecompton arrangement. Patrick Henry, in his famous revolutionary speech, laid it down as a safe rule that we may judge of future conduct by the past. If this be true, what are we to expect of the pro-slavery party in Kansas? To answer this question, sir, we have only to turn to the code they dared enact when in legislative authority—that code which honorable Senators, who now propose to invest them with this new engine of tyranny, confessed a disgrace to the country and to the age. Familiar as Senators are with these infamous provisions, suffer me to read an extract or two. Here, sir, we have the twentieth section:

"If any free person, by speaking or by writing, assert or maintain that persons have not the right to hold slaves in this Territory, or shall introduce into this Territory, print, publish, write, circulate, or cause to be introduced into this Territory, written, printed, published, or circulated, in this Territory, any book, paper, magazine, pamphlet, or circular, containing any denial of the right of persons to hold slaves in this Territory, such person shall be deemed guilty of felony, and punished by imprisonment at hard labor for a term of not less than two years."

Now, sir, let us see what is the punishment provided for those who should disregard this provision. I will read it:

"Persons found guilty of violating the above enactments shall be deemed convicts; and shall immediately, under the charge of the keeper of the jail or public prison, or under the charge of such person as the keeper of the jail or public prison may select, be put to hard labor, as in the first section of this act specified, [to wit, on the streets, roads, public buildings, or other public works of the Territory—Section 1, page 146;] and such keeper, or other person having charge of such convict, shall cause such convict, while engaged at such labor, to be securely confined by a chain, six feet in length, of not less than four sixteenths, nor more than three eighths, of an inch link, with a round ball of iron, of not less than four, nor more than six, inches in diameter, attached; which chain shall be securely fastened to the ankle of such convict with a strong lock and key; and such keeper, or other person having charge of said convict, may, if necessary, confine such convict, while so engaged at hard labor, by other chains, or other means, in his discretion, so as to keep such convict secure, and prevent his escape; and when there shall be two or more convicts under the charge of such keeper, or other person, such convicts shall be fastened together by strong chains, with locks and keys, during the time such convicts shall be engaged in hard labor without the walls of any jail or prison."—Sec 22d chapter, 2d section, 147th page, Kansas Code.

And yet, sir, Senators are willing to clothe, with new authority, the very men who dared pass such laws. Shame, eternal shame, be upon us for even the momentary entertainment of such a purpose. Should this law pass, then assuredly will the memorable words sent forth by the Richmond Enquirer, during the recent presidential campaign, be indorsed by this so-called Democratic Administration. I allude, sir, to the declaration by that print, "that slavery is right, natural, and necessary, and does not depend upon difference of complexion. The laws of the slave States justify the holding of white men in bondage."

We find in these "bogus" laws still further evidence that the people of Kansas would become the slaves of slavery, in the infamous provision making slave hounds of freemen! If this does not come inside the slavery question, I am at a loss to know what would. And might not even worse be expected of this strong partisan pro-slavery minority, should it be invested with State authority, and backed by the Army?

Mr. President, it is painful to believe that the Chief Magistrate of this great Republic would allow himself to become a party to these treasonable movements. Yet we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that he is lending all the influence of his position to carry out this project. Is it a part of the price that secured his nomination? Of him I will let speak a distinguished Democrat, the first Governor of Kansas, and one who had always enjoyed the friendship and confidence of Mr. Buchanan. It was addressed to the New Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Durkee.

SENATE.

York Evening Post. I ask for it the careful attention of Senators. He says:

"I might go on with this catalogue and enumerate other indications, if necessary, showing that the prevailing tone of the party is hostile to Kansas; but I consider it only necessary to add, that what I have said relates to the North. The South, where the great mass of the party is to be found, makes no pretension, as a whole, to the advocacy of anything but pure border ruffianism.

"What, then, have the free-State men of Kansas to expect from a Democratic Administration, even if presided over by Mr. Buchanan? If he could be left to act upon his own impulses, unaffected by external influences, and free from all pledges and obligations expressed and implied, the case would be very different. But, unfortunately, this is not so. His election would rightly be considered a decision against us, whatever may be his own private feelings. His offices at Washington, in Kansas and elsewhere, would necessarily, to a large extent, be filled with our enemies. His information would come through a distorted medium; and, lastly, he could not aid us without having made up his mind to be abandoned and warred upon by his own party. The South would charge him with violating his pledges, and turn upon him with the bitterest hostility; and at least a portion of the northern Democracy would follow their example. He would thus be left without a party to support his Administration, unless he should cast himself into the arms of the Republicans. We cannot, it seems to me, either ask or expect him to do this upon a question where party lines are so plainly drawn before this election. Like all other men in the same situation, he must obey the party sentiment on which he is elected. That there are Democrats in Pennsylvania who are full of indignation against the conduct of the South in regard to Kansas, I am well aware; and that they would use their influence to redress her wrongs, I am well satisfied; but they are too few, in proportion to the whole party of the Union, to sustain his Administration in a war with his party. They have as yet been unable to make their opinions appear and be felt in the party, and, of course, cannot do so hereafter. I honor their good intentions, but I cannot believe in their power.

"I repeat that I have been forced to these conclusions after no slight struggle with my feelings and inclinations. Should Mr. Buchanan be elected, and his Administration be different from what my judgment compels me to believe, I shall give it my cordial approbation, and my feeble, though willing support. As I believe now, I must regard the Democratic party as fully committed to southern sectionalism, toward which, for some time past, it has been rapidly tending; and I quit it, well assured that my duty to my country demands at my hands the sacrifice of personal feelings."

Sir, could anything be more truly prophetic than these words? And here I must express my surprise that Governors Geary and Walker, and Secretary Stanton, did not exercise the foresight of their predecessor in this "grave-yard of Governors." Had they foreseen the events so plainly "casting their shadows before," what disappointment they might have been spared! what mortification and chagrin! The President would have been left to find more pliant executors of his will than they (to their high praise and lasting honor be it spoken) proved themselves to be. It only remained for them to follow the example of Governor Reeder, and quit forever a party thus committed to outrage and wrong, or, at least, to refuse allegiance to its will and behests at the present juncture.

The public sentiment of the country and of the world will sustain them with the plaudits, "well done, good and faithful servants." In the name of God and humanity, in the name of the freedom-loving State which I, in part, represent on this floor, I thank them for what they have so far done.

As cruel and barbarous as are the measures of border-ruffian control in Kansas already cited, I have even heard some argue their propriety and correctness on the ground that slavery was established by brute force; that its continuance was guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States; and that that instrument necessarily perpetuated the right to use that force, to any extent necessary for its protection and maintenance, utterly regardless of all law to the contrary! This anomalous doctrine was new to me, and yet I can not discover why it is not logical from the premises; and it occurred to me that both the President and his predecessor must have entertained this same view; for how can their administration of affairs in Kansas be explained on any other principle?

The honorable Senator from Louisiana, the other day, said, that the slave trade was guaranteed by the Constitution for twenty years. The Supreme Court also advanced the same idea in arguing the Dred Scott case. Alluding, of course, to that clause which says, "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808," the court say, "the right of property in a slave is distinctly and expressly affirmed in the Constitution. The right to traffic in it, like an ordinary article of merchandise and property, was guaranteed to the citizens of the United States, in every State that might desire it, for twenty years." Now, Mr. President, with all deference to the great names who have put forth this argument, I must be permitted to say that I am not able to discover the least shadow of guarantee to slavery, or the slave trade, in this clause of the Constitution. This prohibition was, in effect, a refusal on the part of the States to confer on the new Government they were about to construct, jurisdiction over the slave trade until the year 1808. In the examination of this subject it should be borne in mind, that the delegates of the constitutional convention represented the sovereignties of States, and were about establishing a new Government and delegating to it certain powers of jurisdiction. The Constitution, as then drafted, would, without this provision, have conferred immediate jurisdiction on Congress, as the tenth clause in the eighth section authorized Congress "to define and punish piracies and felonies on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations." So that all we can make out of this clause, as I understand it, is merely the settlement of a question of jurisdiction. A guarantee presupposes a pledge to aid, if necessary, in the accomplishment of some purpose. The Constitution contains no pledge, either on the part of Congress or the States, to engage, or in any wise support, the slave trade.

To illustrate more fully my meaning, suppose there had been another provision added to the Constitution, like this: that piracies and felonies on the high seas shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808: no one, in such case, would contend that the Constitution guaranteed piracy and felony for twenty years; and yet it seems to me there would be as much propriety in doing so, as in saying that it guaranteed the slave trade for twenty years. But it is not my purpose to enter into an extended argument of this subject: it belongs to another class of Senators more competent to the task. Mr. President, I have to congratulate myself and the friends of freedom, that the leading statesmen of the South have placed this question on higher ground than the Constitution—the ground that slavery is right in itself. You say, and say correctly, that slavery should be maintained in its integrity, or abandoned; that if wrong, it ought to be abolished. Now, since you consent to go into a court of equity, I trust you will not refuse to abide the verdict that may be rendered after a fair adjudication. You place great reliance on the opinion of the United States court in the Dred Scott case. In view of the admission that you are willing to abolish slavery if it be wrong, independent of the Constitution, allow me to call the attention of Senators to a careful reading of this Dred Scott decision. The court, in arguing this case, say:

"The language of the Declaration of Independence is equally conclusive.

"It begins by declaring that—

"When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the Powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitled them, a decent respect for the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

"It then proceeds to say:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal: that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among them is life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights Governments are instituted, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

"The general words, above quoted, would seem to embrace the whole human family; and, if they were used in a similar instrument at this day, would be so understood."

As much as to say the morality of our day would give a literal construction to the Declaration of Independence, and secure freedom to all.

Sir, this admission is creditable to the court, and pays a just tribute to the humanity of the age. It is an acknowledgment, by the highest judicial tribunal of the country, that the principles by which slaveholders retain this unfortunate class of men in bondage are incompatible with the moral sense of the American people. Here, then, Senators, in a court of equity, the decision is against you. It rejoices my heart, not only to hear the Supreme Court, but the great mass of the people, reiterating those undying principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence. Sir, the experiment of a free Government has not proved a failure. These principles are immortal; they can never die.

Mr. President, we have indeed arrived at a most exciting and critical period in the history of this slave-extension controversy. The whole subject is now rescued from the slimy atmosphere of compromises, and placed in the hands of men who are honest and determined in purpose. They will yield to no compromise that violates principle. We are now sure of a living issue, until a final, and, I trust, a happy termination of this question which has so long debated the people and distracted the national councils. The issue seems to be fairly made and clearly understood—freedom of the people on one side; despotic rule on the other. The constitution you seek to adopt disfranchises a large majority of the citizens of Kansas by its test oaths. This feature alone makes it an anti-republican instrument. It was submitted in legal form for adoption or rejection. It was repudiated by four fifths of the people. The facts are established by the President's own agents. With the permission of the Senate, I will here read an extract from a letter of Governor Walker. The Governor says:

"For the first time in our history, an effort is now made to force a constitution and government upon an incensed State against the well known will of a large majority of its people. Nothing can be more clear or conclusive than the evidence demonstrating the fact that an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to the Lecompton constitution. This is indicated by the disfranchisement of half the counties of Kansas in the election of delegates to the constitutional convention; by the skeleton vote given to those delegates, averaging not more than thirty for each; by the withholding of the constitution by the convention, against their well known pledges, from the people; by the result of the election of the Territorial Legislature, in October last, when both parties participated; by the miserable frauds and forgeries perpetrated by the minority, to supply the place of the real electors, and finally rendered certain by a majority of ten thousand against the constitution, in the election held on the 4th of January last.

"The most vital of all the rights of a State is the establishment of a constitution, and if this right can be disregarded by Congress, the whole doctrine of State and popular sovereignty is discarded and overthrown. In doing such an act, we are setting a most fatal precedent; we are undermining the very pillars upon which repose the whole fabric of popular liberty. We are permitting a small minority to supersede a majority in framing a State government, and Congress is becoming the ally and accomplice of that minority in overthrowing the rights of the people. These are solemn and momentous questions; the real issue is, shall the minority or the majority of the people of a State frame their government. That is a vital question; it involves the precise difference between democracy and oligarchy, monarchy or despotism. It is the first, and I fear, the last step towards the overthrow of our free institutions; and if this can be done now, and by an authority so high as Congress, what will be the demand next made by the minority? Why, that they, the minority, shall control not only Kansas, but the Federal Government, under threats of overthrowing the Constitution and the Union. If submission is now yielded to this doctrine, it is very plain to me that the Federal Government itself must pass into the hands of a minority, and that the great fundamental principle of the Constitution must be overthrown and subverted. I cannot, by a single vote, for a solitary moment, sanction a doctrine which must gradually undermine our system, and lead directly to anarchy or despotism.

"It is not the cause of Kansas alone on which we are now deliberating, but upon a great fundamental principle which is now to be sustained or subverted. That principle comes home to the heart and judgment of every elector in the Republic. Shall the elective franchise become an empty form? Shall the votes of the majority prevail, or shall they be superseded by technical quibbles, unworthy the consideration of statesmen, or by an organized system of frauds and forgeries? Shall the most clear and palpable evidence which would carry conviction to the breast of any honest judge or jury, be suppressed or superseded by crimes which should condemn their authors and accomplices to disgrace and punishment? There is a great moral, as well as a political question involved in this controversy. We are asked, not only to sanction the overthrow of a great fundamental principle of public liberty and the Constitution, but to approve, also, a series of frauds and forgeries, the most palpable and the most wicked which have ever disgraced any age or country, and thus forfeit our own self-respect, and that of the whole civilized world, which must be the spectators of this infamy. If there be any crime which is more atrocious than any other, it is the forgery of election returns, and especially in an election involving all the dearest rights of a free people, in the establishment of a State government. It is now proved incontestably, by legal evidence, taken on oath before legislative committees, that in four precincts only in Kansas, where more than three thousand votes were pretended to have been given, that four fifths of the whole were entirely fictitious, and that the returns were forged and fraudulent. No man can or dare deny this testimony. From an intimate and personal knowledge of each and every one of these precincts, I know that this testimony is true:

and yet we are asked to sanction a constitution based upon crimes like these." * * * * *

"But, force this constitution upon the people of Kansas now, against their will, and no mortal vision can penetrate the dark abyss in which lay hidden the deep disasters now menacing Kansas and our country. I cannot take this dark leap into such a vortex of crime and uncertainty. If the people of Kansas submit, nevertheless the damning truth will still remain that the State will have been forced into the Union against the will of her people. She would enter the Union, not as the peer and equal of her sovereignties, but she would be driven into the Union, disgraced by the chains of a usurping minority, and covered all over with shame and degradation. The very parchment on which her constitution was written would be stained by crimes and forgeries. The signet of the people would never have been affixed to the instrument, but in its place a vile counterfeit would have been substituted, there to remain forever upon our and her archives, as a perpetual record of her disgrace and of our injustice. The thirty-second star of our heretofore glorious constellation would not have arisen above the horizon in all the brightness of new-born liberty, but it would have come in shorn of its luster, and casting its darkening shadows over the receding glories of the Republic. The fatal example never could be erased. We could never recall the past; we could never retrace our steps; but onward, still onward and downward, our movements would be toward that destiny which must ever attend outrage, crimes, and injustice. And why should we encounter these dreadful hazards? What is unjust can never be expedient. Expediency has been the plea of tyrants in every age and country. It has placed and retained the crown upon the monarch's brow. It has governed the world by swords and bayonets. It has covered the world with violence, fraud, and injustice."

Permit me to read a short extract from a letter of Governor Wise, a southern slaveholder. He says:

"I have much to add to my Tammany and Philadelphia letters; but I have not the time and opportunity now to show that the fraud of the elections in Kansas was nothing in comparison to the Lecompton constitution itself. The question is, shall a pretended constitution which was not adopted by that convention—for, on the contrary, it was submitted for adoption by the people—and which was not adopted by the people, for they were not allowed to vote against it, be forced, by the intervention of Congress, on a majority of the people against their sovereign will? Shall this be done, too, on the Bourbon doctrine of legitimacy? And, if done, are the people to be driven to the extremity of the Dorr doctrine of the Rhode Island case? It is autocratic, aristocratic, oligarchy, and despotic, thus to constrain popular sovereignty by the onus of legitimacy."

In adopting this constitution, then, you abandon the ballot-box, the voice of the people, and proceed to act on a rule known only to tyrants—that might makes right. Can you succeed, Senators, in this measure—a measure that seeks the overthrow of the doctrine of State rights and the great principles of the Constitution? I leave that question for the future to answer.

But I will say this: that, if you pass the Lecompton constitution, and force it on the people by the Army of the United States, and the citizens of Kansas and the free States tamely submit, I shall be obliged to confess, with shame and humiliation, that the honorable Senator from South Carolina, in his recent speech, was correct in the assertion that a majority of the people of the free States are already slaves.

The President says, pass this bill; and the people of Kansas have the means in their own hands to redress their grievances. How? By swearing to a lie in swearing to support the Lecompton constitution, which guarantees the right of property in man? No citizen in Kansas who disbelieves this could take the oath without committing moral perjury. Let us look at the process. A free-State man, who believes the New Testament to inculcate the sentiment that all men are entitled to liberty, and that it is his duty, so far as he is able, to remove the heavy burdens from the oppressed, is required to take an oath that compels him to violate the very principles by which he swears. They must degrade themselves before they can be free! Sir, this is the argument of the libertine—submit, and then be free! This leads me, Mr. President, to say a word in regard to great public crimes which this Government has already committed, and which it now upholds. Look at the statute-book, and the decision of your courts, and you will see that we have drawn, by legislative enactment, a geographical line, and said to all who desire to engage in the slave trade on one side of this line: you may do so with impunity. On the other side of this line, all who dare to engage in this traffic shall suffer death as pirates! Has not the Supreme Court just decreed that all the Territories between this and the Pacific shall be open to kidnapping and robbery, provided the victims be of a certain race? Now, it should be observed that, while we are so regardless of the rights of humanity in the Territories, we are remarkably nice in protecting the rights of property. To illustrate: a colored man emigrates from Massachusetts to Kansas, buys him a piece of land, settles on and improves it. Now, we have a law there saying: "All persons convicted of horse-stealing shall suffer confinement at hard labor not exceeding seven years." Here, then, if the white man steals the colored man's horse, he is to be punished as a felon; but, if he kidnaps the owner, or his family, it is right and lawful, being guaranteed by the Constitution! Could anything be more absurdly wicked? Sir, such laws, and such a system of reasoning, insult the understanding and shock the moral sense of the world!

Mr. President, I cannot believe Congress will pass this bill. And even should they pass it, it cannot be enforced. In my opinion, any attempt to do so would light up the flames of a civil war that would carry with it general devastation and ruin.

And, sir, war with all its attendant evils, would be far more endurable than loss of honor and self-respect. But there will be no war, or if there should, it would be of short duration. No, sir, there are too many magazines under our feet to permit that; I am yet hopeful of the future. And when I hear able and eloquent Senators advocating the extension of human bondage with such earnestness and sincerity of manner, I am inclined to look upon them as I look upon Saul of Tarsus. I hope yet to see them like Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, lifting from degradation the down-trodden of our land.

The path of duty is plain. Let the President withdraw the troops from Kansas. Let the people make their own constitution, as other States have done. Let the Government cease to wage war against an innocent and unoffending people, and return to its duty—the protection of the weak against the invasion of the strong. Then, and not till then, shall we maintain justice at home, respect abroad, and fulfill the hopes of our fathers in illustrating that great and sublime truth that man is capable of self-government.

Sir, truth is mighty, and will prevail. It will penetrate where bayonets cannot enter. Neither the fugitive slave law, Government patronage, nor the Dred Scott decision, can arrest its progress. In the language of an eminent statesman, "It will march on the horizon of the world, and it will conquer."

SATURDAY, March 20, 1858.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, I oppose the introduction of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. I oppose the enforcement of that constitution upon the people of Kansas. It is not the expression of their will. It is not their free act and deed. It is not the work of their hands. They are not only unwilling to accept it; they are not only unwilling to come into the Union under it; but they utter their most solemn protest against the bonds. As an institution of State government, the Lecompton constitution was not formed in obedience to the will of the people of Kansas, nor in pursuance of their authority, nor yet in pursuance of any legal authority whatever. It is only the product, the consummation of a long series of acts of usurpation, violence, and fraud; of artful devices, and unmitigated outrage, the like whereof this country had never before witnessed within its borders. It was literally "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity." And now Congress is invoked to legitimate this unnatural bantling, and to force its recognition upon a people who disown it; who spurn it, and turn their backs upon it with indignant scorn and disgust, as the offspring of violence and dishonor. They have expressed their abhorrence and repudiation of it in every possible, legal, and authoritative form. They have repudiated it by the popular vote, and by legislative protestation. It is now brought into our presence here in all its deformity, discredited and disowned, and with the stamp of the popular repudiation and rejection branded upon its forehead.

This is the Lecompton constitution. Shall it be imposed upon an unwilling and protesting people? In the name of justice and freedom and self-government; in the name of the persecuted and down-trodden and subjugated people of Kansas; in the name of the sovereign State and equal co-partner in this Union of ours, in whose behalf I am authorized to speak in this august presence, though it may be with feeble and unheeded voice, I enter my earnest and perpetual protest against the consummation of this great iniquity.

And now here, Mr. President, before proceeding further, let me say—and I rejoice in being able to say—that the question before us, the momentous question before us, is not altogether a party question; that it is by no means exclusively a sectional question. It is, more properly speaking, a question of popular rights; a question of the right of self-government; the right of the people to be heard in the framing, and to be consulted in the adoption or ratification, of the fundamental law under which they are to be initiated into the Union of States, and under which they are to be governed. This question rises higher and far above the mere partisan questions of the day. It expands and reaches out far beyond any of the mere local or sectional questions which so unhappily divide and alienate us from the ties of political and social brotherhood. In opposition to this measure of imposing a constitution upon a people who had no voice in its framing, and which they utterly repel and repudiate, I, sir, as a Republican, join hands with the main forces of the northern Democracy. I join hands in this opposition with the leading men—the strong, bold men; yea, sir, with the giants of that party at the North who have led your mighty hosts in many a field of contest; and who, more than once, when success or defeat hung doubtful and trembling in the scale, have grasped your standard with their own strong hand, and borne away the prize in triumph, and laid the crown of victory at your feet. As a northern man, I join hands, in opposing this great wrong, with conservative and strong men, with honored and trusted men; ay, sir, and with pro-slavery men, yet honorable and patriotic men, of the South. I join hands, in resisting this wrong against human rights, with your Walkers and your Stanions and your Wises of the South; and, I rejoice to add, with your Bells and your Crittendens too—men whose fidelity to the interests and the honor and to the institutions of the South, you will not be likely to impugn, and whom you will hardly venture to stigmatize as "miserable fanatics and Abolitionists," as you are sometimes wont to do with flippant tongue—and senseless and unheeded as flippant—all northern men who fail to yield a ready and willing obedience to the behests of the Belial of slavery.

I will further remark, in this connection, that it is a great error to assume that parties in Kansas are divided upon the basis of the political or sectional divisions which prevail in the country at large. The people of Kansas, so far as there is any political division among them, are divided upon the question whether it shall be a free State or a slaveholding State. Hence the only recognized parties there are distinguished and designated as the free-State and the pro-slavery parties. And the free-State party, which embraces at least three fourths of the population of the Territory, is, by no means, composed exclusively of those who sympathize and act with the Republican party of the country; but it embraces a considerable portion of those who sympathize and have always been identified with the Democratic party of the country. Nor is the free-State party by any means composed exclusively of those who came from the northern States; but it embraces a very considerable number of those who came from the southern States. On the other hand, the pro-slavery party in Kansas is not composed exclusively of those who came there from the slaveholding States; but it embraces many, quite too many, who went there from the free States; and among them some who have been prominent and leading actors in the scenes of fraud and outrage which have so long been perpetrated with impunity upon the free-State people of that Territory. Mr. Calhoun, late president of the Lecompton convention, and "vice regent" of the pro-slavery party in Kansas, who had the manipulation of the returns of the January State election, and who will probably let the world know the result just when he gets ready, is a northern man—originally, as I understand, from the State of Massachusetts. Governor Ransom, the late candidate of the pro-slavery party for Delegate to the House of Representatives in Congress, was originally from my own State, and more recently from Michigan, where he had filled the offices of judge of the supreme court and Governor of the State, and then terminated his political career in that State as a defeated Democratic Free-Soil candidate for the Senate of the United States, in opposition to General Cass. Henderson, Miller, McLean, and others, the chief plotters and engineers of the notorious Delaware Crossing frauds, I am informed, were all northern men. The very worst class of "border ruffians" in Kansas; "the chief priests and scribes of the Pharisees;" the active spirits and the file-leaders of the pro-slavery or Lecompton party, and the chief contrivers of the frauds and villainies which have marked the history of Kansas for the last three years, (I am obliged and yet ashamed to confess it,) were from the free States. I am sorry that it is so. I am sorry that truth and justice require this admission. But I am aware, at the same time, that it is no "new thing under the sun." Slavery has always been accustomed to do its most cowardly as well as its boldest works of aggression through the agency of northern men. Let the responsibility and the accountability rest where they belong.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Foot.

SENATE.

The late Secretary and acting Governor of the Territory, himself, informed me that, upon going to Kansas and becoming acquainted with the people, and the condition of parties there, and with their opinions and sentiments, he was not a little surprised to find so many of the inhabitants who had gone to that Territory from the southern States—and some of them his old acquaintances from Tennessee—now acting earnestly and vigorously with the free-State party—men born and reared where slavery existed, who had always been pro-slavery men, and who went to Kansas the friends and the advocates of slavery. But their own observation had satisfied them that the highest interest and prosperity of the State would be promoted by the exclusion of slavery—that the country was vastly better adapted to free labor than to slave labor. It was not that these southern men had any prejudice against the institution of slavery; but they thought it not adapted to the soil and climate of Kansas. I have also been told by persons well acquainted with the state of feeling and of parties in Kansas, that, if the question whether it should be a free State or a slave State, were submitted to those alone who had gone there from the southern States, they would decide, without the aid of a single northern vote, in favor of making it a free State. I have no good reason to doubt the correctness of this statement as an index of the public sentiment there; and among that class of citizens in the Territory, upon this question. I will state another fact in this connection. I am informed, upon good authority, that among the free-State members of the present Territorial Legislature, three of them were originally from the State of Virginia alone, while there were but five of the free-State members of that Legislature from all the New England States. These facts alone, furnish an appropriate answer, and a fitting rebuke to the persistent and reiterated assertion that the free-State party in Kansas is made up, in great part, if not quite altogether, of "northern fanatics and Abolitionists," sent out under the patronage of the "Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Society." I repeat, then, that the question of bringing Kansas into the Union under the constitution recently devised at Lecompton, is not one which divides the people, either in Kansas or in the States, by old party lines, or by geographical lines.

It is not to be denied, however, that this is an Administration measure—most emphatically an Administration measure—and urged on with an infatuation as blind as it must prove to be fatal. Yea, more, sir, it is urged on with a recklessness and desperation of spirit as heedless and as defiant of the popular sentiment of the country, as it is recreant to the principles and pledges upon which it was brought into power; or, as it is false to the promises and assurances by which it lulled, for a time, the storm in Kansas, and inspired hopes and expectations in the country, only to await, as it would seem, the rekindling of the flames of a still fiercer strife, and to meet the fate of a more sad disappointment. This issue is urged on by the Administration against the voice of remonstrance and of warning from the great body of the Democracy of the North, and from many of its earliest and most efficient supporters at the South; and has come to be made the touch-stone of political fidelity to it, and of political favor from it. In the vigor and pertinacity with which this obnoxious measure is urged on by the Administration, we are furnished with another and striking exemplification of the ancient adage—"whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad."

But, Mr. President, the material question presents itself to our consideration—is this Lecompton constitution the act and deed of the people of Kansas? Do they give it the sanction of their approval? Sir, I undertake to say, what the whole country knows full well to be true, that this constitution is not the act and deed of the people of Kansas, and does not receive the sanction of their approval. And by the people of Kansas, I mean the majority—the great mass of her bona fide inhabitants—or, to speak perhaps with more technical accuracy, the majority of her legal voters. I undertake to say that this constitution is but the result, the bitter fruit, the logical sequence, if you please, of a systematic scheme of violence and fraud by which the people of Kansas have been pursued, trodden down, and deprived of their common rights as citizens and freemen; and by which a small, unprincipled, and unscrupulous minority have been able to usurp and to wield all the powers of the territorial government. Sir, I will not weary this body by a recital of the oft-told tale of the wrongs and injuries, the subjugation, and the persecution of the people of Kansas. They are all familiar to the country, or, at least, to those who are willing to know the truth of what it answers a better purpose, for the moment, in others to deny. It is enough for this occasion to say, that this dynasty of usurpation and tyranny was installed in power by an armed invasion from the border counties of a neighboring State, at the first territorial election, on the 30th day of March, 1855, when the bona fide settlers of Kansas were overpowered and driven from the polls in every district save one, and the election was taken, by force and violence, entirely out of their hands. The truth of this fact has become historical. It stands upon the authority of the incontrovertible testimony of Governor Reeder, the investigations of a commission from the national House of Representatives, upon common notoriety, and upon the admissions of the invading parties themselves, when, upon their return to Missouri on the following day, according to the account given by their own organ, published at the time in Weston, they came in with music and banners and loud huzzas, making public and boastful proclamation that "they had made a clean sweep of the Kansas election." Well, sir, they did make a clean sweep of that election. I am quite tempted to ask here, what if the people of Pennsylvania should some time, by preconcert, and in organized and armed companies, rush into Delaware or Maryland or Virginia, on election day, and "make a clean sweep" of their legislative election? I put the question, and leave it, unanswered, for your contemplation. I leave the question to be answered by those who deny our right to inquire into these things, and who deny our power or authority to apply any correction or any means of prevention. I will only remark by the way, that the case of a Territory, being under the peculiar care and guardianship of the Federal Government, is much stronger than the case of a State.

With that spurious Territorial Legislature, was inaugurated a reign of usurpation and of tyranny over the people of that Territory which has no parallel in the history of the country, and which has been maintained by a corresponding system of fraud and violence, with the knowledge and acquiescence, if not with the countenance and connivance of the Federal Administration, and with the aid of Federal troops, from that day to the partitioning of the Lecompton convention; and this usurpation, so maintained, is the natural parent of the Lecompton constitution. Knowing whereof I speak, and to whom and of whom I speak, I abate not one "jot or tittle" from the full measure and significance of these declarations.

A system of terrorism was thus established, under which the most flagrant outrages were practiced with impunity upon the proscribed free-State people of Kansas. All protests against the illegality of these elections were suppressed. A code of laws was enacted by this spurious assembly in keeping with its own origin and character, and in harmony with the purpose of its creation, with a view to maintain the ascendancy of the minority over the great majority of the people, and which aimed a deadly blow at the fundamental principles of free government—which imposed its penalties upon the freedom of speech; upon the freedom of the press; upon the freedom of jury trial; and upon the freedom of suffrage; and which denounced the penalties of felony against all who should call in question the legal existence of slavery, or the right to hold slaves in the Territory. This bloody code was enforced by fitting instruments of the Government, and with a spirit which seemed to exult in its own deeds of blood and barbarism. The free-State men did not see fit to acknowledge the authority of a Legislative Assembly foisted upon them by a foreign invasion. They did not see fit to recognize the validity or the binding force and obligation of its enactments; yet, nevertheless, refraining from all overt acts of resistance to them. They could do no less. They could not acknowledge the authority of that spurious Assembly, or its acts. Had they made any such humiliating submission to the demands of usurpation and tyranny, they would have shown themselves unworthy the title and unworthy the privileges of American freemen.

In this condition of affairs, by a voluntary movement of the people, and with a view of adopting some peaceful measure of relief from the despotism under which they were then suffering, a convention was held at Topeka, in September, 1855, at which a constitution of State government was framed; was submitted to the people at large; was ratified by the popular voice; and was presented to Congress, with an appeal for admission under it into the Union. That application was rejected; these proceedings were denounced as revolutionary and rebellious—rebellious, as against a spurious government in Kansas, set up by invaders from Missouri!—and the name of "Topekaites" has since been the slang phrase of vulgar reproach to the majority of the people of Kansas. It seems to have been quite forgotten that, in the case of the admission of Michigan, a fundamental condition of her admission had been rejected by a regular delegate convention; and that, subsequently, another convention was formed by a voluntary movement of the people, and by the exertion of their own power, which expressed the assent of the people to the prerequisite condition; and that, thereupon, she was admitted into the Union. Congress said then, as we say now, that mere forms and modes of proceeding in such cases are not to be regarded as absolutely essential. The material fact to be ascertained was, they said then, as we say now, is it the will of the people? It matters little, they said then, as we say now, how that will is expressed, or how it is ascertained, provided, always, it be satisfactory, reliable, and certain. The ascertained will of the sovereign people, by whatever mode or manner of proceeding it may have been manifested, they said then, as we say now, must be the rule and the controlling law of the case.

The application of Kansas for admission under that constitution was rejected, and no attempt has ever been made to put it into operation. It was a proper, peaceful, and not an unprecedented mode of appealing to Congress for admission into the Union, and for relief from the oppressions of an alien government within her Territory. For this act, and in not acknowledging the authority of the government which Missouri had set up over them, your President fulminates his anathemas against the free-State people of Kansas, and denounces them as rebels and traitors; as being "in rebellion against the legally established government of the Territory and its laws!" and the unfounded imputation is caught up and rung and reiterated through all the organs of detraction and calumny throughout the country—an imputation as unjust to the free-State people of Kansas as it is unworthy of the Chief Magistrate of the Republic. Sir, in the face of this charge, I will say here in my place, and in this presence, that these people who have been so misrepresented, so maligned, and so calumniated; who have been pursued for years with the most persistent and relentless ferocity by your pampered Government hyenas, are, and ever have been, as orderly and peaceful, as law-abiding, and as loyal, as the most exalted of their traducers—as loyal to the Constitution and laws of their country as any portion of the American people. Whatever excesses or violence they may have committed—and it is not in human nature, hunted and hounded as they have been, that excesses should not have been committed—they have been committed in the necessary defense of their lives, their property, and their households. Persecuted as they have been; indicted upon charges of constructive treason—a crime undefined, and unknown to the Constitution and laws of the country—treason, too, against a spurious government cast upon them by foreign arms; imprisoned upon charges preferred by perjured informers; hunted like wild beasts, and driven from their own homes; their settlements broken up; their villages sacked; their dwellings burned down; their families and friends massacred before their eyes; themselves trodden down, subjugated, and worried as they have been, what people on earth ever exhibited a more extraordinary and long-enduring forbearance? Had they taken speedy vengeance into their own hands, and driven these lawless marauders from the Territory, or “delivered them over to the tender mercies of fire and faggot,” they would have stood approved and justified before God and all mankind.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Foot.

SENATE.

Rebels, are they? So, then, were the fathers and their compatriots of the American Revolution—yea, much more rebels than these; for they actually took up arms against the recognized Government of the mother country; whilst these people have as yet made no practical resistance to the spurious government to which they owe no allegiance, and which grinds them to the dust. They have thus far done no more than to protest against its usurped authority, and to appeal to Congress, though yet in vain, for relief. Rebels, are they? If they are rebels, and if this is rebellion, then commend me, henceforth and evermore, to such rebels and to such rebellion. To just such rebellion, in principle, are we indebted for our national independence. To just such rebellion are we indebted for the privilege of sitting here to-day in this council chamber of the nation. To just such rebellion is every American citizen indebted for the birthright of his freedom. To just such rebellion are we all, as American freemen, indebted for all that we have, and all that we are, and all that we can hope to be on earth, which is worth living for, or worth dying for. Sir, the active operative principle of just such rebellion has been the origin, and laid the foundation, of all free governments. The living principle of just such rebellion has been, in times past, as it shall be in times to come, the redemption of down-trodden humanity from the bondage of oppression and from the tread of a deaf and dumb and blind despotism. It is the spirit which animates just such a rebellion which is to wake up the nations of the Old World from the stupor, and to dispel the thick darkness, which have hung upon them through a long polar night of despotism. It is this spirit, though yet silent and unseen it may be, before whose resistless power the rotten and crumbling dynasties of the earth, now grim and hoary with the age and with the crimes of departed generations, are yet to fall and no more to plague the nations of men. It is this spirit which is to arouse the slumbering and oppressed millions of the earth to a new and a higher life—to the assertion and realization of God's own gift to man—his inalienable right to freedom, independence, and self-government. Sir, I commend this spirit in the people of Kansas. Call them rebels, if you please; persecute them; oppress them as you may; yea, annihilate them if you can; but you will never permanently subdue them. By the arbitrary exercise of your power, you may make them all martyrs to freedom; but, as God liveth, no power on earth shall be able to make one man of them the slave of your despotism. If the voice of my counsels could reach them in their far-off western homes, where the sun goes down in lurid light upon their humble dwellings, it should be, “stand firm;” “make no dishonorable concessions to usurpation and tyranny;” “demand justice and nothing less than justice.” “If that be denied you,” “if submission or death must come at last,” then, “better die all freemen than live all slaves.”

So much, begging pardon, Mr. President, by way of episode, in response to the charge of rebellion as applied to the action of the free-State people of Kansas. But now, how is it with the other side? How is it with the minority of usurpers in the Territory—with the real authors of all the strifes and mischief which have so long afflicted Kansas, and filled her people with lamentation and woe? How is it with those who have let loose their sluit-hounds upon the heels of free-State men—with those who have plundered freemen and despoiled them of their goods, and have destroyed free presses, and who, with equal measures of meanness and of malice, have indicted, as common nuisances, bridges over which free-State men were accustomed to pass, and hotels in which free-State men were accustomed to lodge? How is it with those who have turned adrift women and children without home and without protection, and with those whose hands are red with the blood of assassination? How is it with those who have carried the elections by force and violence, or by schemes of wholesale fraud and forgery—with those who make false certificates, and copy into the returns whole pages of names from old Directories to swell the lists of pretended voters, and insist, with semi-serious and sanctimonious visage, upon their being counted; and who openly denounce the Governor of the Territory as derelict in official duty or as exceeding his powers, when they find him quite too honest a man to answer their purposes of knavery and crime? Who are they who have practiced these abominable frauds and villainies, wherewithal to rob freemen of their most sacred rights? Who and what are they who have done these things with unblushing effrontery in the face of high heaven, and who have violated all law, human and divine? Oh! They are the “law and order party,” says the President in his special message. They are the “law and order party,” says the report of your committee. The perpetrators of these outrages and crimes untold, instead of being brought to justice, instead of being visited with condign punishment, are suffered to go at large, unwhipped of justice. All these acts of violence and of villainy, and the authors of them, are passed over without notice and in silence. Not a word of reproof, not a word of censure, not a word of discountenance, not a suggestion that they have done anything wrong, is heard from the President, nor from any who speak or do his will. But what is more significant still, the foremen and leaders in these wrongs and outrages which make humanity weep and common decency blush, instead of receiving any mark of displeasure, seem to be in the full enjoyment of the executive favor, and in the possession of the choicest offices in the gift of the Federal Government within the Territory. Sir, is it any wonder they have grown so bold, so defiant, and so shameless in the practice of their iniquities? Think you they do not know full well where their security lies? Think you they do not know their master's will, and that in doing his pleasure there is abundant safety? See who most enjoy the smiles and benedictions of the national Executive, and then see who have most incurred his disfavor, and suffered removal from office in Kansas and outside of Kansas, and for what cause. Then we may cease to wonder that the most stupendous frauds, and the most flagrant outrages go unchallenged and unrebuked, and go with entire impunity, provided only and always, they are committed by the “law and order party!” The most high-handed and atrocious schemes of fraud and villainy for cheating freemen of their birthright, have been committed by this “law and order party” under the patronage of the Federal Government, and have now reached their culminating point in the production of the Lecompton constitution. No wonder, indeed, it is the adopted pet of the Administration. No wonder the Administration come forward now and assume the relation and office of god-father to the limping and ill-shapen brat at the baptismal font. It is the offspring of the “law and order party.”

Mr. President, there is nothing in the history of the proceedings in which this Lecompton constitution had its origin and its completion to commend it to our favor. Indeed, the more we examine it, the more reason we find why we should reject it. We see its whole history, from beginning to end, marked with fraud and violence. The grand objection to it, already noticed, and which stands in the foreground of all the others—that it is the work of a small minority, which, by the aid of an armed invasion from an adjoining State, had usurped and held the control of all the powers of the Territory, to the exclusion of any participation in it, even to the exclusion of the free exercise of the right of voting, by the majority—is decisive, controlling, and unanswerable. The very clear and able argument of my honorable colleague, [Mr. COLLAMER,] as contained in his report and in his speech upon this subject, and especially in reference to this point, has not been met, and, in my judgment, cannot be successfully met. This likewise answers the assumption and the assertion, often made, that those who stood aloof from the elections, and took no part in them, even though they were in a majority, are concluded by the action of those who did take part in them, and who did vote. As a general proposition, this is true. It is a common political axiom which nobody disputes. But it has no application in this case; it has no application in a government of usurpation, which can impose no obligation upon the people, nor claim allegiance from them. Moreover, the majority were not allowed the exercise of the privilege of voting if they would. They were not allowed the privilege of wresting the power from the hands of the usurpers in this way. They did not vote, simply because they were not allowed to vote. At the first territorial election they did not vote, because they were driven from the polls by force of arms. At the second territorial election, in October, 1856, they did not vote, because they were denied the exercise of the right of suffrage by test-oaths and other unconstitutional and tyrannical restrictions, imposed upon them by the first spurious Missouri Assembly, for the very purpose of excluding the majority of the people from voting, and thus for the purpose of maintaining the political ascendancy of the minority, and so of keeping up the government of usurpation. At the delegate election in June, 1857, they did not vote, because, in addition to these restrictions, most of which were still in force, although a few of the most obnoxious of them had been repealed by the second Territorial Legislature at the instance of Governor Geary, a census and registration act for this particular election, which had been passed by the same Legislature, was so executed as to disfranchise a large portion of the free-State men, to say nothing of the unequal apportionment of the election districts under that act, and to say nothing of their just apprehensions of a repetition of the scenes of violence and fraud which they had before experienced, and to say nothing of their indisposition to do any act which could be tortured into a recognition of the authority of the usurpation.

But aside and independently of all these considerations, they had the assurance of Governor Walker and Mr. Secretary Stanton, speaking by authority of express and explicit instructions from the President of the United States and his Cabinet, that the constitution, when framed, should be submitted to a direct vote of all the bona fide inhabitants of Kansas for ratification or rejection. This pledge was given over and over again, in the most solemn and positive manner, by the President and his Cabinet; by the organs of the Administration through the country; by Governor Walker and Mr. Stanton through their official instructions and by public proclamation; by a portion, at least, of the candidates for the convention themselves, and by the press of all parties in Kansas. This was the universal understanding, not only in Kansas, but throughout the country.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator give way to allow me to make a request of him?

Mr. FOOT. Certainly.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Foot.

SENATE.

Mr. GREEN. My request is that the Senator will produce, as I may, perhaps, hereafter make some remarks on the subject, the evidence to show that Mr. Stanton ever gave that assurance while he was the acting Governor; that Governor Walker ever gave that assurance; that the President ever gave that assurance; that the law which clothed the convention with authority to form a constitution ever gave that assurance; or that the people themselves ever understood there was such an assurance. If the Senator will produce that evidence, I shall have something to answer when the time comes.

Mr. FOOT. The reason I have not already done it is because I thought it a work of supererogation. That evidence has been incorporated into more than a dozen speeches already made on this floor; and that is the reason why I have not taken up the time of the body by producing it and reading it to the Senate. But if it be desired by the Senator, before this debate shall close, I will procure that evidence and read it again. I have not the documents now before me.

Mr. COLLAMER. Here is the report of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] containing some extracts from the instructions of the President to Governor Walker on this point, and from Governor Walker's inaugural address.

Mr. FOOT. My colleague places in my hands the report of the honorable Senator from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Territories, from which I will read the following extracts, which fully maintain my assertion, and I hope will be quite satisfactory to the Senator from Missouri on the point of his inquiry:

"The President, in his instructions to Governor Walker, through his Secretary of State, under date of March 30, said: 'When such constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence.'

"Governor Walker, in an official dispatch to the Secretary of State, under date of June 2, said:

"On one point the sentiment of the people is almost unanimous—that the constitution must be submitted for ratification or rejection to a vote of the people who shall be bona fide residents of the Territory next fall."

"And in his inaugural address to the people of Kansas Governor Walker said:

"With these views, well known to the President and Cabinet, and approved by them, I accepted the appointment of Governor of Kansas. My instructions from the President, through the Secretary of State, under date of 30th of March last, sustain the 'regular Legislature of the Territory in assembling a convention to form a constitution,' and they express the opinion of the President that when such constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument; and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

"I repeat, then, as my clear conviction, that unless the convention submit the constitution to the vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and quietly conducted, the constitution will be and ought to be rejected by Congress."
